PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

(HANSARD)

SIXTH SERIES—VOLUME 309

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OFFICIAL REPORT

FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT
OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
FORTY-SEVENTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF
HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SESSION 1997–98

COMPRISING PERIOD
23 March—2 April 1998

HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

MEMBERS OF THE CABINET

(Formed by the Rt. Hon. Tony Blair, MP, May 1997)

Prime Minister, First Lord of the Treasury and Minister for the Civil Service—The Rt. Hon. Tony Blair, MP
Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions—The Rt. Hon. John Prescott, MP
Chancellor of the Exchequer—The Rt. Hon. Gordon Brown, MP
Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs—The Rt. Hon. Robin Cook, MP
Lord Chancellor—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Irvine of Lairg
Secretary of State for the Home Department—The Rt. Hon. Jack Straw, MP
Secretary of State for Education and Employment—The Rt. Hon. David Blunkett, MP
President of the Board of Trade (Secretary of State for Trade and Industry)—The Rt. Hon. Margaret Beckett, MP
Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—The Rt. Hon. Dr. John Cunningham, MP
Secretary of State for Scotland—The Rt. Hon. Donald Dewar, MP
Secretary of State for Defence—The Rt. Hon. George Robertson, MP
Secretary of State for Health—The Rt. Hon. Frank Dobson, MP
President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons—The Rt. Hon. Ann Taylor, MP
Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport—The Rt. Hon. Chris Smith, MP
Secretary of State for Social Security—The Rt. Hon. Harriet Harman, MP
Secretary of State for Northern Ireland—The Rt. Hon. Marjorie Mowlam, MP
Secretary of State for Wales—The Rt. Hon. Ron Davies, MP
Secretary of State for International Development—The Rt. Hon. Clare Short, MP
Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Lords—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Richard, QC
Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—The Rt. Hon. Dr. David Clark, MP
Minister of Transport—The Rt. Hon. Gavin Strang, MP
Chief Secretary to the Treasury—The Rt. Hon. Alistair Darling, MP

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND MINISTERS

Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—
Minister—The Rt. Hon. Dr. John Cunningham, MP
Minister of State—Jeff Rooker, Esq, MP
Parliamentary Secretaries—
Elliot Morley, Esq, MP
The Lord Donoughue

Cabinet Office—
Minister Without Portfolio—Peter Mandelson, Esq, MP

Culture, Media and Sport—
Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport—The Rt. Hon. Chris Smith, MP
Minister of State—
Minister for Film and Tourism—The Rt. Hon. Tom Clarke, CBE, MP
Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
Mark Fisher, Esq, MP (Minister for Arts)
Tony Banks, Esq, MP (Minister for Sport)

Defence—
Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. George Robertson, MP
Ministers of State—
Minister for Defence Procurement—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Gilbert
Minister for the Armed Forces—Dr. John Reid, MP
Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State—John Spellar, Esq, MP

Education and Employment—
Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. David Blunkett, MP
Ministers of State—
Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Disability Rights—The Rt. Hon. Andrew Smith, Esq, MP
Minister for School Standards—Stephen Byers, Esq, MP
The Baroness Blackstone
Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
Ms Estelle Morris, MP
Dr. Kim Howells, MP
Alan Howarth, Esq, CBE, MP

Environment, Transport and the Regions—
SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. John Prescott, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
Minister of Transport—The Rt. Hon. Gavin Strang, MP
Minister for the Environment—The Rt. Hon. Michael Meacher, MP
Minister for Local Government and Housing—Ms Hilary Armstrong, MP
Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning—Richard Caborn, Esq, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Nick Raynsford, Esq, MP (Minister for London and Construction)
Ms Glenda Jackson, MP (Minister for Transport in London)
The Baroness Hayman (Minister for Roads)
Ms Angela Eagle, MP

Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs—
SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Robin Cook, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
Derek Fatchett, Esq, MP
Tony Lloyd, Esq, MP
Doug Henderson, Esq, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE—The Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean

Health—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR HEALTH—The Rt. Hon. Frank Dobson, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
Alan Milburn, Esq, MP
Minister for Public Health—Ms Tessa Jowell, MP
The Baroness Jay of Paddington
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE—Paul Boateng, Esq, MP

Home Office—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT—The Rt. Hon. Jack Straw, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
Alun Michael, Esq, MP
Ms Joyce Quin, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
George Howarth, Esq, MP
Mike O'Brien, Esq, MP
The Lord Williams of Mostyn

International Development—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT—The Rt. Hon. Clare Short, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE—George Foulkes, Esq, MP

Law Officers' Department—
ATTORNEY-GENERAL—The Rt. Hon. John Morris, QC, MP
SOLICITOR-GENERAL—The Lord Falconer of Thoroton, QC

Lord Advocate's Department—
LORD ADVOCATE—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Hardie, QC
SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND—Colin Boyd, Esq, QC

Lord Chancellor's Department—
LORD CHANCELLOR—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Irvine of Lairg
PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY—Geoffrey Hoon, Esq, MP

Northern Ireland Office—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR NORTHERN IRELAND—The Rt. Hon. Marjorie Mowlam, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
Paul Murphy, Esq, MP
Adam Ingram, Esq, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
The Lord Dubs
Tony Worthington, Esq, MP

Paymaster General's Office—
PAYMASTER GENERAL—Geoffrey Robinson, Esq, MP

Privy Council Office—

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—The Rt. Hon. Ann Taylor, MP

LORD PRIVY SEAL AND LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Richard, QC

Public Service, Office of—

CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER—The Rt. Hon. Dr. David Clark, MP

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY—Peter Kilfoyle, Esq, MP

Scottish Office—

SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND—The Rt. Hon. Donald Dewar, MP

MINISTERS OF STATE—

Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution—Henry McLeish, Esq, MP

Minister for Education and Industry—Brian Wilson, Esq, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—

The Lord Sewel, CBE

Sam Galbraith, Esq, MP

Calum Macdonald, Esq, MP

Social Security—

SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SOCIAL SECURITY AND MINISTER FOR WOMEN—The Rt. Hon. Harriet Harman, MP

MINISTER OF STATE—

Minister for Welfare Reform—The Rt. Hon. Frank Field, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—

John Denham, Esq, MP

Keith Bradley, Esq, MP

The Baroness Hollis of Heigham

Ms Joan Ruddock, MP

Trade and Industry—

PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SECRETARY OF STATE FOR TRADE AND INDUSTRY)—The Rt. Hon. Margaret Beckett, MP

MINISTERS OF STATE—

Minister for Trade—The Lord Clinton-Davis

Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe—The Lord Simon of Highbury, CBE

Ian McCartney, Esq, MP

Minister for Science, Energy and Industry—John Battle, Esq, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—

Nigel Griffiths, Esq, MP (Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs)

Mrs. Barbara Roche, MP (Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry)

Treasury—

PRIME MINISTER, FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND MINISTER FOR THE CIVIL SERVICE—The Rt. Hon. Tony Blair, MP

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER—The Rt. Hon. Gordon Brown, MP

CHIEF SECRETARY—The Rt. Hon. Alistair Darling, MP

PAYMASTER GENERAL—Geoffrey Robinson, Esq, MP

FINANCIAL SECRETARY—Ms Dawn Primarolo, MP

ECONOMIC SECRETARY—Mrs. Helen Liddell, MP

MINISTER FOR TRADE AND COMPETITIVENESS IN EUROPE—The Lord Simon of Highbury, CBE

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY—The Rt. Hon. Nicholas Brown, MP

LORDS COMMISSIONERS—

Robert Ainsworth, Esq, MP

Graham Allen, Esq, MP

Jim Dowd, Esq, MP

John McFall, Esq, MP

Jon Owen Jones, Esq, MP

ASSISTANT WHIPS—

Clive Betts, Esq, MP

David Clelland, Esq, MP

Kevin Hughes, Esq, MP

David Jamieson, Esq, MP

Jane Kennedy, MP

Greg Pope, Esq, MP

Ms Bridget Prentice, MP

Welsh Office—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WALES—The Rt. Hon. Ron Davies, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Peter Hain, Esq, MP
Win Griffiths, Esq, MP

Her Majesty's Household—
LORD CHAMBERLAIN—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Camoys, KT, GCVO
LORD STEWARD—The Viscount Ridley, KG, GCVO, TD
MASTER OF THE HORSE—The Lord Somerleyton, KCVO
TREASURER—George Mudie, Esq, MP
COMPTROLLER—Thomas McAvoy, Esq, MP
VICE-CHAMBERLAIN—Janet Anderson, MP
CAPTAIN OF THE HONOURABLE CORPS OF GENTLEMEN-AT-ARMS—The Lord Carter
CAPTAIN OF THE QUEEN'S BODYGUARD OF THE YEOMAN OF THE GUARD—The Lord McIntosh of Haringey
LORDS IN WAITING—The Lord Haskel, The Lord Whitty, The Lord Hoyle
BARONESSES IN WAITING—The Baroness Farrington of Ribbleton, The Baroness Ramsay of Cartvale

---

SECOND CHURCH ESTATES COMMISSIONER, REPRESENTING CHURCH COMMISSIONERS—Stuart Bell, Esq, MP

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS

THE SPEAKER—The Rt. Hon. Betty Boothroyd, MP

CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS—Sir Alan Haselhurst, MP

FIRST DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS—Michael J. Martin, Esq, MP

SECOND DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS—Michael Lord, Esq, MP

CHAIRMEN'S PANEL—
Mrs. Irene Adams, MP, Donald Anderson, Esq, MP, Peter Atkinson, Esq, MP, Joe Benton, Esq, MP, John Butterfill, Esq, MP, Dr. Michael Clark, MP, Frank Cook, Esq, MP, Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, MP, Roger Gale, Esq, MP, Jimmy Hood, Esq, MP, Barry Jones, Esq, MP, John McWilliam, Esq, MP, John Maxton, Esq, MP, Mrs. Ray Michie, MP, Edward O'Hara, Esq, MP, Mrs. Marion Roe, MP, George Stevenson, Esq, MP, Bowen Wells, Esq, MP, Andrew Welsh, Esq, MP, The Rt. Hon. Miss Ann Widdecombe, MP, Mrs. Ann Winterton, MP, Nicholas Winterton, Esq, MP

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION—
The Rt. Hon. The Speaker (Chairman), Archy Kirkwood, Esq, MP, The Rt. Hon. Sir Peter Lloyd, MP, Dr. Lewis Moonie, Esq, MP, The Rt. Hon. Gillian Shephard, MP, The Rt. Hon. Ann Taylor, MP

SECRETARY OF THE COMMISSION—M. R. Jack, PhD

BOARD OF MANAGEMENT—
W. R. McKay, CB, (Chairman) (Clerk of the House of Commons), P. N. W. Jennings (Serjeant at Arms), Miss J. B. Tanfield (Librarian), A. J. Walker (Director of Finance and Administration), I. D. Church (Editor of the Official Report), Mrs. S. J. Harrison (Director of Catering Services)

SECRETARY OF THE BOARD OF MANAGEMENT—B. A. Wilson (Head of the Establishments Office)

SPEAKER'S SECRETARY—N. Bevan, CB

SPEAKER'S COUNSEL—J. S. Mason, CB, J. E. G. Vaux

SPEAKER'S CHAPLAIN—Rev. Canon D. C. Gray, TD, PhD

PARLIAMENTARY COMMISSIONER FOR STANDARDS—Sir Gordon Downey, KCB

23 March 1998

THE
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES
OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
[WHICH OPENED 7 MAY 1997]

FORTY-SEVENTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF
HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 309

SIXTEENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1997–98

House of Commons

Monday 23 March 1998

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Retirement Pensioners

2. Sir Teddy Taylor: If she will make a statement on the total number of retirement pensioners (a) at the latest available date, (b) five and (c) 10 years ago. [34043]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. John Denham): There were 10.7 million retirement pensioners at 30 September 1997. Five years ago there were 10.3 million pensioners and 10 years ago there were 9.9 million pensioners.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Retirement pensioners are now a substantial proportion of the community. Is the Minister aware of the genuine concern and alarm among pensioners about reports of a fundamental review that might lead to the retirement pension being means-tested? Can the Minister give a clear and categorical statement that that is untrue? Can he confirm that he and his fellow Ministers will resign if there is any such Government proposal?

Mr. Denham: I am pleased to make it clear to the House that we have a manifesto commitment to retain the basic state pension as the foundation for retirement provision and to uprate it at least in line with prices. We have more than honoured that commitment by taking the unprecedented step of issuing winter fuel payments to all pensioners who have fuel bills this winter.

Mr. Duncan Smith: More than a week and a half ago the Minister attended a dinner held by the Association of Consulting Actuaries at which the chairman told the Government that "they must stop loosening the foundations on which the hitherto robust system of Occupational Schemes is built."

The chairman also said that the ramifications of the Government's first Budget on coming to power

"were clearly not thought through at the time of the Mini-Budget."

The Minister was sitting next to the chairman. Did he agree with those sentiments?

Mr. Denham: At that enjoyable dinner, which the hon. Gentleman also attended, I was able to make it clear that the Government wish to support and strengthen the framework for occupational pensions. During the pensions review we are looking at the regulatory system for occupational pensions and how the best occupational schemes can be marked by a quality pensions award. We are also examining ways to improve pension scheme members' understanding of their schemes and their entitlements.

Sir Teddy Taylor: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In view of the Minister's unsatisfactory and ambiguous reply, I give notice that I intend to raise this matter on the Adjournment.

Violence Against Women

3. Ms Squire: If she will make a statement on the Government's plans to tackle violence against women. [34044]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Ms Joan Ruddock): The Ministers for Women have been working with Ministers from across Government Departments on this issue. A national strategy for England and Wales on tackling all forms of violence against women will be published in the autumn. The Scottish Office is producing a strategy on tackling all forms of violence against women in Scotland, along the same lines as the national strategy.

Ms Squire: I welcome my hon. Friend's statement about a national strategy. Is she aware that the demand for refuge accommodation by victims of domestic violence throughout England, Wales and Scotland has increased? For example, last year, in Dunfermline, 246 women had to be turned away, and throughout Scotland more than 4,000 women and 6,000 children were turned away because of a lack of suitable accommodation. Does she agree that there is no excuse for violent criminal behaviour that causes women and children to flee their homes and that it is vital that combating domestic violence remains a Government priority?

Ms Ruddock: One of the prerequisites of any effective national strategy is access to accurate statistics. In our early discussions between Departments, we found many gaps. My hon. Friend will wish to know that in Scotland a research survey was commissioned by the Scottish Office to review service provision for women who had suffered domestic violence. It was published on 16 March.

I wish to announce to the House today that, with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, our women's unit is commissioning a survey and a research report that will review the current accommodation and support needs of women fleeing domestic violence in England. Local authorities and the Women's Aid Federation (England) Ltd. will be involved and we will ensure that our Scottish colleagues are kept informed of the methods and results.

Mrs. Gillan: Given the concern about violence against women, will the Minister tell us whether she agrees with the Secretary of State for Social Security, who believes that it is only by appointing more women judges that the Government can show that they are taking domestic violence seriously, or with the Lord Chancellor who, when putting down the Secretary of State, said that

"We cannot have positive discrimination" in making judicial appointments and that he had

"the fullest confidence that all judges, regardless of gender, already deal with cases of domestic violence with impartiality and consideration for the victims of domestic violence"?

I can see the Secretary of State prompting the Minister. Will she tell us independently who she agrees with: the Secretary of State or the Lord Chancellor?

Ms Ruddock: I assure the hon. Lady that we are all concerned with achieving equality of opportunity. The Lord Chancellor has made it absolutely clear that he believes that more women should have the opportunity to reach the highest levels in the court and justice system. We are all engaged in that and we have every confidence that, whatever judge is sitting on domestic violence issues, justice will be done.

Child Support Agency

4. Mr. McNulty: If she will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of reform of the Child Support Agency. [34045]

11. Mr. Baker: If she will make a statement on the principles underlying the Government's review of the Child Support Agency. [34052]

The Secretary of State for Social Security and Minister for Women (Ms Harriet Harman): This Government believe that all children are entitled to the financial and emotional support of both their parents, wherever they live. We are examining closely all aspects of the child support system and we expect to bring forward our proposals for consultation by the summer.

Mr. McNulty: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response. Most people will agree with the principle of the CSA, but not with the cack-handed way in which it was introduced by the previous Government. Will she ensure that the outcome of any review is both fairer and simpler not just for parents and children, but for CSA staff, and that it is clearly linked both with the excellent Budget proposals on families and children and with the forthcoming Green Paper on welfare reform?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Hon. Members on both sides of the House agree on the principle that parents should support their children. We further agree that that principle has not been put into practice properly by child support legislation and the agencies that work under it.

I invite the House to consider three further points. We face some difficult choices in the necessary reform of child support. First, what is the appropriate balance between the interests of the first and second families? Secondly, what is the right balance between a clear, simple and straightforward system and a complex system that deals very closely with individual needs? Thirdly, what is the right balance between the need of parents with care to receive income for their children and the interests of taxpayers not to have to support other people's children? Those are the three issues that the House will have to discuss further and come to an agreement on.

Mr. Rendel: Does the Secretary of State expect any new formula to apply only to new cases, or will it apply also to cases that have already been agreed under CSA regulations—which would lead to difficulties such as cases being reopened and redecided and a lot of losers?

Ms Harman: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. We are trying to reform a system, but it is difficult to do so when we have a great tangle and a sense—and the reality—of injustice. For people who have had incorrect awards made and those who have had correct awards made but who have failed to pay, the issue of transitional arrangements will be critical in achieving public confidence in the new and reformed system that we should like to see evolve. We will discuss with the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues how to deal with the transitional arrangements.

Mr. Wicks: Given that the great majority of mothers and children on income support receive no child maintenance from their fathers, will the Secretary of State consider setting a new target to tackle the tough cases: the men who are determined never to pay a penny? In my advice surgery on Friday night, I met a mother who had supplied all the information that was needed to the CSA. Two years on, she is still not receiving a penny.

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: there is a huge sense of grievance among absent parents—usually fathers—when there is a delay in assessing maintenance and then, suddenly, they are hit with large arrears that might turn out to be incorrect; there is also a burning sense of grievance among parents with care—usually mothers—that although a correct award has been made, fathers sometimes avoid paying.

We are dealing with difficult issues. We need to keep a sense of principle—that parents should be prepared to pay—but the system must also be fair. The problem is that the principle of parental payment has been undermined by very poor delivery and a failed administration.

Miss McIntosh: Does the Secretary of State agree that the Child Support Agency plays a crucial role in helping abandoned families? What percentage of staff time is spent processing matters relating to absent parents, whether they be male or female? How many appeals under the new procedure are being processed?

Ms Harman: There are 8,000 members of staff dealing with the 600,000 live case load, as it is called, but there are 800,000 further cases where no assessment has been made. I will write to the hon. Lady with any further detailed information that she wants.

It is not always a matter of an abandoned family. It is difficult to talk in absolutes about first or second families. The fact is that many marriages end in divorce, with faults on one or the other side, or on neither. Many children start life without their parents living together. We must strip away the ease of moral judgment and get a system that is fair to the taxpayer, the parent and, above all, the child.

United Nations Commission on the Status of Women

5. Jane Griffiths: If she will make a statement on the recent meeting of the UN Commission on the Status of Women. [34046]

Ms Ruddock: In my role within the presidency of the European Union, I was delighted to represent the views of the European Union at the meeting of the Commission on the Status of Women at the United Nations earlier this month.

The issues addressed were women and violence; women and armed conflict; human rights of women; and the girl child. A copy of the statement I delivered at the UN has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Jane Griffiths: Is my hon. Friend aware of the importance attached by women's organisations to the previous UN meeting in Beijing in 1995 and the criticism levelled at the previous Government for having taken no action following that meeting? In view of that, have this Government taken action, in particular to protect the girl child against all forms of exploitation?

Ms Ruddock: I thank my hon. Friend for her question. The United Kingdom's participation in the CSW this year has been very successful. Throughout, our delegation has led on the need fully to implement the aims of the global platform for action. On the human rights of women, we argued for an end to customary and traditional practices that are harmful to women and girls such as female genital mutilation. On women and armed conflict, we proposed the creation of an international criminal court that would integrate a gender perspective in its statute. On violence against women, we called for national plans such as those that are in train in this country. On the girl child—a matter specifically mentioned by my hon. Friend—we were able, against very tough opposition, to get agreement on the provision of information and counselling services, to be carried out on a confidential basis, for both adolescent boys and girls, especially on the subject of personal relationships.

Disabled People

6. Mr. Keith Simpson: What the benefit status of people with disabilities who take part in the welfare-to-work scheme will be. [34047]

Mr. Denham: The Government's new deal for disabled people will be offered to people with disabilities or long-term illnesses in receipt of the following out-of-work benefits: incapacity benefit, severe disablement allowance and income support.

Mr. Simpson: I thank the Minister for that answer, but can he give the House an assurance that people with disabilities who participate in the Government's welfare-to-work programme will not lose any of their entitlements, especially if they are put on to the jobseeker's allowance?

Mr. Denham: Yes. Participation in the programme will be voluntary, but the House will recognise that the Government are implementing a strategy with several strands: we want to improve the quality of personal advice for disabled people who are seeking work; we want to tackle discrimination in the workplace; we want to make work pay—in last week's Budget, we announced the introduction of a tax credit for disabled people; and we want to reform the benefits system by, for example, introducing the 12-month linking rule for those on incapacity benefit.

Mr. Skinner: Does my hon. Friend agree that we do not need lectures from the Tories, whom we constantly had to fight during those tawdry years of Tory government to get disability legislation that would give equality to the 6 million disabled people in Britain? Will he also bear in mind the fact that the last thing we need from a Labour Government is a tax on disabled people's benefits? I was associated with the group Disability Rights Now in campaigning against the Tories. To prevent Downing street from being daubed with paint again, would not it be a good idea for the Prime Minister to stop inviting tinpot so-called music makers to No. 10 and instead to invite the disability rights people to discuss these important matters?

Mr. Denham: I can assure my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has met organisations of and for disabled people to discuss welfare reform. I am sure that my hon. Friend welcomes the announced introduction of a disabled persons tax credit and that he will also recognise the importance of establishing the disability rights task force, which will lead to a disability rights commission and comprehensive and enforceable rights for disabled people.

Mrs. Browning: Is the Minister aware that there are types of disability whereby people fail to find work because of basic communication problems, despite their intellectual ability and training or higher education qualifications to do that work? What plans does he have to build on the previous Government's piloting of the mentoring system, under which such people had someone alongside them, both at interview and in the workplace, not to do training or the job, but to deal with communication difficulties?

Mr. Denham: We are anxious to explore a variety of ways in which we can enable disabled people who want to work to get into work. This Government—unlike the previous Government—have allocated £195 million from the windfall tax to fund a series of innovative schemes to consider the different ways in which the barriers that disabled people face in getting into work can be overcome. Bids are being received for the first 20 of those additional schemes. The hon. Lady will, I am sure, be keen to see which schemes have been put forward by the wide variety of voluntary organisations and others who have been involved in that process.

Lone Parents

7. Mr. Fitzpatrick: If she will make a statement on measures relating to child care in the Government's new deal for lone parents. [34048]

Ms Harman: The new deal for lone parents is, for the first time, offering lone parents an opportunity to work. It is already available in eight areas of the country and it will be rolled out nationally to new claimants of income support next month. The new deal is backed by our national child care strategy, which includes substantial help with the cost of child care through the new child care tax credit that was announced in the Budget last week.

Mr. Fitzpatrick: I thank my right hon. Friend for that positive response. I recently had the opportunity to visit the Alpha Grove lone parents association on the Isle of Dogs in my constituency. It was very enthusiastic about the opportunities being offered under the new deal. Will she ensure maximum co-ordination between her Department and the Department for Education and Employment in introducing the new child care provisions so that lone parents can access them as soon as possible?

Ms Harman: I am working closely with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to ensure that we develop a national child care strategy that meets the needs of women for affordable, high-quality and accessible child care in all neighbourhoods. That is important not only for children's development, but particularly in helping lone parents into work. I know that the Benefits Agency—and the jobcentres—will work closely with voluntary organisations such as the Alpha Grove project to ensure that the new deal for lone parents serves the community.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Last week there seemed to be a bit of a dispute between the Institute for Fiscal Studies and the Department of Social Security and the Treasury about the cost of child care credits. The Red Book allowed for £1 billion for the programme, but the IFS estimated that it could cost £4 billion, assuming that take-up rates are in line with present take-up rates for general benefits. The family credit take-up rate of 70 per cent., which is sometimes criticised by the Government, would not seem out of line with the cost of £4 billion.

What take-up rates have the Government allowed for in the child care credit assumptions? If their estimate is wrong and take-up is higher, will they guarantee that they have no intention of capping the amount that can be paid out?

Ms Harman: With new proposals such as this, we cannot simply refer to the take-up rates of existing benefits. The previous Government got into all sorts of problems when they grossly overestimated the take-up for child care allowance under the old family credit rules. Indeed, that is one of the reasons we have had to make a change and get rid of the child care allowance under family credit, introducing a proper new child care tax credit.

We do not think that the IFS figures are right. We think that the Treasury assumptions are right. The estimated cost of £250 million a year is based on expectations of demand and of the ability of the registered child care base to respond to that demand.

Ms Hewitt: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a comprehensive strategy must include time for parents to care for their children themselves, as well as nurseries and child minders? Does she further agree that the opportunities for part-time, as well as full-time, work under the new deal will enable many lone parents who so choose to combine earning a living and taking advantage of the working families tax credit with looking after their own school-age children?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Those who have received the new deal for lone parents have warmly welcomed the fact that, so long as they can work 16 hours, which many can manage during a school week if their children are at school full time, they will get the top-up on their pay. Just as we will help people whose pay is depressed by ill health or disability, we will help those who can work only 16 hours or so to have decent take-home pay. What is more, we will help them with the costs of child care so they can be in work and make work pay.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I want to reinforce the point made by the hon. Member for Leicester, West (Ms Hewitt). Is the Secretary of State aware that a growing number of mothers feel insulted by the Government's apparent denigration of the contribution of women who choose to care for their children at home? She needs to emphasise strongly the point that she made in reply to the hon. Lady.

Will the Secretary of State repeat her assurance of co-ordination with the Department for Education and Employment? She might care to meet the group of women, working part time for a well-known national company, who have been told that, as a result of the Government signing the social chapter and other measures, it is no longer in the company's interest to employ them part time so they have the choice of being full-time mothers or full-time employees: a choice that they were not forced to face under a Conservative Government.

Ms Harman: I do not know what company the right hon. Lady is talking about, but if she wants to suggest a meeting, I shall be more than happy to consider it. I take exception to her suggestion that we appear to denigrate mothers who stay at home to look after their young children. Our proposals are simply a recognition of the fact that women are voting with their feet and going out to work. Nearly half the people in the work force are women and more than half the women with children under five—let alone those with children over school age—are working. The previous Government took no notice of that and did not support women in their choices.

We simply say that when women go out to work, instead of leaving them to struggle on their own to balance home and work responsibilities, we will help them with a flexible benefit system, advice and help regarding work, and proper child care. Mothers who stay at home will also receive the extra child benefit that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in the Budget last week.

Stakeholder Pensions

8. Mr. Flight: What representations she has received on the expected participation rates in the proposed stakeholder pension. [34049]

Mr. Denham: We have received more than 200 responses to the recent consultation on stakeholder pensions. The majority are from organisations including financial services businesses, employers, employee groups and trade unions. The Government see a key role for such organisations, particularly in partnership with each other, in developing and promoting stakeholder pensions.

Mr. Flight: If the pension fund industry recommends overwhelmingly that for the stakeholder scheme to succeed—in terms of adequate participation—it will need to be compulsory or have some degree of compulsion, is that something that the Government will consider?

Mr. Denham: It is true that a number of submissions to the pensions review strongly support compulsory second pensions. We already have a compulsory pensions system—the vast majority of employees are compelled to be members of both the basic state pension and a second pension. We made it clear that we would consider all representations received by the review, including those on compulsion, and would respond in due course.

Mr. Flynn: Will the Minister say that he is not minded to hand over the running of stakeholder pensions to those very firms that mis-sold at least 2 million personal pensions and left a large number of people facing poverty in their retirement years? Has he seen the Eagle Star submission, which lavishly praises the state earnings-related pension scheme, saying that it is the most portable of all pensions, is best value and has charges down to one tenth of those charged by the private firms? Indeed, Eagle Star complained that the only fault with SERPS is that its merits are not properly understood. Will he ensure that SERPS is properly considered and that we can have a rejuvenated form of it, independently funded and run, and separate from the national insurance scheme?

Mr. Denham: I have indeed read the Eagle Star evidence to the pensions review and can assure my hon. Friend that those are important issues for consideration by that review. He will also want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary for her action to clear up the problems of pensions mis-selling—in stark contrast to the record of the Conservative party, which did nothing to tackle that scandal although it was obvious for years that it needed to be dealt with.

Mr. Viggers: Despite numerous references to low-cost pension schemes, does the hon. Gentleman agree that in fact pension costs will inevitably be high and that if any new scheme is not compulsory it will lead to a pensions benefit trap, which will be unfair and unacceptable?

Mr. Denham: On his question about compulsion, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago. I do not accept that it is inevitable that funded second pensions have to be as expensive and as inappropriate for those on low incomes or those who suffer intermittent working patterns as many personal pensions are today. I am confident that stakeholder pension schemes will be able to offer value-for-money, flexible second pensions to many people who cannot get such a pension at present.

Benefit Integrity Project

9. Mr. Oaten: What representations she has received about the benefit integrity project. [34050]

Ms Harman: I have received a great many representations about the benefit integrity project. I have taken action to improve the quality of decision making in the project and am discussing it further with organisations of and for disabled people.

Mr. Oaten: Is the Secretary of State aware that one of the impacts of the benefit integrity project is that each month up to 80 disabled people lose their vehicles and have no means of transport? Does she regret that? Will she step in to stop it taking place?

Ms Harman: I very much regret the fact that if it is decided under the benefit integrity project that people are not entitled to higher-rate mobility allowance, their Motability car is taken away, but that if the benefit is restored on review it is by that time too late because the car has gone. The hon. Gentleman raises an important point that disability organisations have raised with us. We are talking to Motability about it and are determined to sort it out.

Mr. Blizzard: I welcome the extra safeguards that my right hon. Friend has introduced into the benefit integrity project to protect people when it appears that their benefit may be reduced or disappear under the project. Will she consider suggestions made by DIAL, the disablement information and advice line, that would result in fairness for disabled people under the project? For example, where additional evidence is required from a doctor, it suggests that the doctor concerned should interview the disabled person before responding, because doctors often do not know that person as, frequently, disabled people are not ill people.

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The Government have a responsibility to ensure that, when we pay benefit, those in receipt of it are properly entitled to it. However, we are also concerned that, in checking people's benefits, we do not take benefit away from people who are entitled to it. As I said to the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), giving it back later after review or appeal does not sort the situation out. We want to ensure that we get decisions under the benefit integrity project right first time. On 9 February, I introduced an extra safeguard so that no decision to reduce or remove altogether entitlement can be made simply on the evidence of the claimant; we should have a further check. We are always open to suggestions about how to ensure that that happens. It is our duty to ensure that recipients do not receive benefit to which they are not entitled but we must also do all that we can to make certain that we do not take away from disabled people income to which they are entitled and on which they are dependent.

Mr. Boswell: Given that the Secretary of State has made much of the new safeguards, how many further such checks have been made and how many cases are outstanding? Is she satisfied that, after the safeguards have been implemented, there will be no more cases of inappropriate withdrawal of benefit?

Ms Harman: We do not yet have a breakdown of cases after 9 February, but I shall let the hon. Gentleman know as soon as we do because of his long-standing interest in the issue. Two thousand cases have been reviewed following a benefit integrity project decision to reduce or altogether remove benefit. Of those, 500 have had benefit instaured. Those figures showed us that too many decisions were going wrong and that we had to put in the extra safeguard. We do not yet have the analysis of the outcome of reviews and the ratio of correct decisions after 9 February but the intention of that change was not only to make things look better or to assuage people's fears but to get a better quality of decision making. If that has happened, the number of people whose benefit is restored under review should fall because we would hope not to have taken away the benefit in the first place.

Mr. Swinney: The House will welcome the 9 February announcement about improving decisions under the benefit integrity project. Before 9 February, many people had their benefit withdrawn and have lost appeals. I met one of those people at my surgery on Saturday in Brechin, a desperate lady who failed to secure an appeal. I suspect that, if her case had been examined after 9 February, she would have been in a much better position. Will the Secretary of State undertake to re-examine all cases considered before 9 February where benefit was reduced? The problem is causing enormous hardship to many vulnerable people.

Ms Harman: The objective of the 9 February change was to make the initial decision under the benefit integrity project more likely to be correct. We are trying to speed up reviews so that people do not have to wait 10 or 20 weeks before their cases are reassessed. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the rule for examining entitlement under the review involves considering legal entitlement and the evidence. The review is a second check. He knows that the appeal system is independent. Hon. Members will agree that we must check that people in receipt of benefit are entitled to it and that their circumstances have not changed in such a way that they are no longer entitled to it. We must ensure that the initial benefit review decision is correct.

Dr. Iddon: I am sure that my right hon. Friend realises that those who are mentally ill and who have the threat of losing benefit hanging over them can experience special problems. Are any special instructions given to the benefit integrity project on the reassessment of people with those special difficulties?

Ms Harman: MIND is one of the organisations that have been prepared to talk to us about how we can improve the initial letter that lets people know that there is a review process under way and tells them what their rights are in relation to that. There are clearly difficulties regarding people suffering mental ill health and we want to make sure that we work fairly by them. One of the problems is that, because we wanted the letter not to be alarming and frightening, the original letter notifying people that they were going to be reviewed lulled them into a false sense of security about what the process was about; as a result, people did not always bring forward the necessary information. A balance must be struck between letting people know what the exercise is about and not unduly scaring them. We are grateful to MIND and other organisations for working with us to try to get the situation right.

Low-income Home Buyers

10. Mr. Webb: What plans she has to improve the help given to low-income home buyers with their mortgage interest payments. [34051]

The Minister for Welfare Reform (Mr. Frank Field) rose—

Mr. Burns: Ah.

Mr. Field: The hon. Gentleman says, "Ah"—

Madam Speaker: Order. This is taking much too long. Members should put their questions briefly and Ministers should answer them briefly. The previous question, although an important one, took eight minutes, which was far too long. The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) has asked his question and is waiting for an answer.

Mr. Field: The best form of protection for all home owners is private insurance, and we are working with the industry to develop better products and to improve take-up. We shall consider changes to the benefit arrangements as that work progresses.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that response. Is he aware that, when it surveyed unemployed people on income support, his own Department found that, whereas only one in six mentioned child care, one in three mentioned loss of help with housing costs in low-paid work? Does he accept that the lack of help with mortgage interest for people in low-paid jobs is a serious barrier to moving off welfare and into work? Does he have any plans to deal with that?

Mr. Field: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government are reviewing welfare reform and will report on their findings on Thursday. The House should be aware that the scheme favoured by the hon. Gentleman, if it was modelled on housing benefit, would cost about £750 million. If there were £750 million spare, it would be interesting to see whether the House decided to spend it in the way the hon. Gentleman wants, or in other ways.

Mr. Pike: Can my hon. Friend confirm that, as soon as MIRAS is changed next month, the benefits system will be changed to ensure that people are not put in difficulties with their interest payments?

Mr. Field: As my hon. Friend knows, the payments made for mortgage interest are a tracking arrangement and we shall, in due course, take into account changes in the mortgage interest rate.

Disability Benefits

12. Mr. Winnick: If she will make a statement on the proposed changes to disability benefits. [34053]

Mr. Denham: As announced in the Budget statement, we shall provide extra help for disabled people who want to work through the extension of the invalidity benefits linking rule and the removal of voluntary work limits from October this year. In addition, the transformation of disability working allowance into the more generous disabled person's tax credit from October 1999 will mean extra financial help for those who get a job.

Mr. Winnick: Does my hon. Friend accept that the Labour party has always been the champion of the disabled? I hope that we shall always remain so. If he does, does he also accept that those who are disabled and not in a position to work should in no way be penalised and that there is no justification for means-testing or taxing the benefits received by the disabled? In that way, we could demonstrate our continued support for those who suffer disability.

Mr. Denham: My hon. Friend is right to say that there will be those who are not able to work, but who are sick or disabled, and I can assure him that they have nothing to fear from this Government. The Government will always provide support for those in genuine need and, in the course of the welfare reform reviews that are taking place, we shall look at the best ways to provide support for those disabled people who are unable to take opportunities to work.

Mr. Gibb: Will the Minister now answer the question asked by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and say whether the Government intend to tax or means-test the disability living allowance?

Mr. Denham: We have clearly set out the basis on which we are approaching welfare reform. We recognise the extra costs involved for those who have disabilities. In the course of that welfare reform, we must identify the right way of providing support for those who need it.

Benefit Payments

13. Mr. Simon Hughes: What is the average delay between applications for benefits and payment of benefits by agencies accountable to her Department. [34054]

Mr. Field: This Department deals with over 20 benefits. There are 48 targets measuring performance on the clearance of new applications. We are currently achieving 90 per cent. of those targets.

Mr. Hughes: That was a pretty obscure answer, but no doubt it can be pursued. Does the Minister accept that, whatever the general position may be, in some places there are huge delays between the application for, and the payment of, benefits? That can mean the loss of entitlement. I understand that the causes of delay are often overstretched staff, people off sick, posts unfilled and a 25 per cent. cut in finance. Does the Minister accept that one thing he could do would be to reinstate district office factors, so that terribly over-pressed offices, such as mine in south London, which have to deal with many asylum seekers, mentally ill people and other difficult cases, have the funding to deal with their heavy and difficult case load? That would allow such applicants to get their benefits as soon as anyone else.

Mr. Field: If the hon. Gentleman writes to me, I shall consider that idea seriously.

Mr. Burns: Would the right hon. Gentleman care to comment on the delays in the payment of winter fuel benefits to non-income support pensioners, who are having to wait up to nine weeks for what is becoming a summer supplement, not a winter fuel benefit? Would he also care to comment on the 9,000 pensioners on income support and living in residential homes who have erroneously received cheques—some of which have been cashed while others have not? Will the Government seek to claw back that money?

Finally, on the question that the Secretary of State failed to answer last Thursday, is the Minister aware of the developing problem among some non-income support pensioners which has meant that, instead of couples receiving two cheques for £10 each, some are receiving two cheques for £20 in winter fuel benefits? What will the Government do to rectify that cock-up?

Mr. Field: In answer to that eight-minute question, I should like to remind the hon. Gentleman that, probably by the end of this week, all 10 million or so pensioners will have received their payments. Only 15,000 are still waiting to receive them. The benefit had to be introduced from scratch because the Opposition, when in government, did not think it important to deliver extra help in that way.

When the hon. Gentleman was in government and the Government of the day used to come to the House waving pieces of paper, not a day went by when he did not get up and tell the House about how important those pieces of paper were—the most important, in fact, since the previous day. His approach to Government initiatives could not have been more constructive. Since going into opposition the hon. Gentleman has fallen among bad friends. I believe that his constituents would prefer the constructive Member whom they had representing them in the days when the hon. Gentleman sat on Government Benches to the person who has clearly become a whinger in opposition.

Old-age Pension

14. Mr. Corbyn: When she expects to announce the basis on which the state old age-pension will be calculated. [34055]

Mr. Denham: We said in our manifesto that the basic state pension will be retained as the foundation of pension provision in retirement and be increased at least in line with prices. We are considering all aspects of the basic pension as part of our pensions review, which will report later this summer.

Mr. Corbyn: Can the Minister confirm that, since the Conservatives broke the link with earnings in 1980, £11 billion has been taken out of pensioners' pockets; and that to reinstate the link would cost £500 million a year? Reinstatement would eliminate poverty among some people in retirement and reduce the pressure on those approaching retirement to take out expensive and inefficient private pensions instead of relying on state provision. Will the Minister ensure that the pensions review guarantees a return to the link with earnings which the Tory Government so cruelly broke?

Mr. Denham: The pensions review is considering all those issues and we are consulting closely with representatives of pensioners' organisations—something that the Conservatives never did in their 18 years in government. Ahead of the outcome of the pensions review, the Government have taken the unprecedented step of making £200 million available for winter fuel payments this year, and will do the same next year.

Cancer Treatment (Women)

15. Dr. Gibson: What steps she is taking to ensure that women receive equality of treatment for ovarian and other cancers throughout the United Kingdom. [34056]

Ms Ruddock: The Ministers for Women are deeply concerned about women's health and are routinely in contact with colleagues at the Department of Health. I am aware of a recent parliamentary meeting on ovarian cancer organised by my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen) and concerns that were expressed at that meeting about inequalities of treatment. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has set out the Government's intention to improve the consistency of treatment for cancer in our White Paper "The New NHS".

Dr. Gibson: I thank the Minister for that answer. She will be well aware that, each year, 6,000 people are diagnosed with ovarian cancer and 4,000 women die from it. Does she agree that clinical treatments should be equalised throughout the country, and that women should be provided with all the clinical options so that they can participate in decision making on the treatment? Does she further agree that, in the national health service, treatment with Taxol is not provided equally across the country, and that that is a sad indictment of the NHS internal market and the high cost of that drug?

Ms Ruddock: Since the meeting that I mentioned, I have raised that issue with the Department of Health. That Department is aware of variations in cancer services, and the availability of drugs such as Taxol is one aspect of that variation. I understand that health authorities and trusts are working to remedy that, but we must leave them some discretion to tackle first what they regard as the most pressing local needs.

People are, however, right to expect broadly similar services wherever they live. The White Paper guarantees that everyone with suspected cancer will be able to see a specialist within two weeks of a request by their GP for an urgent appointment, and that guarantee will apply to those suspected with breast cancer from April 1999, and to all other cases of suspected cancers from the following year.

Pension Funds

17. Dr. Julian Lewis: What representations she has received on the impact of the abolition of the advance corporation tax dividend on pension funds. [34058]

Mr. Denham: A number of organisations with an interest in pensions have written about this matter.

Dr. Lewis: Will the Minister encourage private pension fund managers to inform their pension holders by how much they must increase their monthly contributions to make up the shortfall in their pension funds—or would the Government rather keep their victims in ignorance, in the finest traditions of the late Robert Maxwell?

Mr. Denham: That is a remarkable question from the party that was responsible for the mis-selling of personal pensions on an unprecedented scale. I make it clear that it is a responsibility of private pension providers to provide best advice to holders of their policies.

The best thing that we can do for pension provision is to lay the basis for sound, sustainable economic growth, which achieves high levels of investment and produces the wealth from which all our pensions will be paid. I believe that both the Budget in July 1997 and last week's Budget will achieve just that.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is it not important that people are given accurate information about their pensions, whether from the private or the state sector? Is my hon. Friend aware that it was a previous Labour Government who sent in the inspectors of Mr. Robert Maxwell and produced a report which said that, under no circumstances, should he ever be given any support, and that a Conservative City of London proceeded to lend him as many millions as he asked for?

Mr. Denham: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. I agree that it is important to ensure that people receive accurate information about their pension provision. That is why the Government have set up the pensions education working group to examine how to raise the level of awareness about financial and pensions information. I anticipate receiving that group's report in the next few weeks.

Violence Against Women

18. Ms Southworth: What plans she has for tackling violence against women. [34059]

Ms Ruddock: The purpose—

Ms Southworth rose—

Ms Ruddock: I think that hon. Members are trying to follow your diktat, Madam Speaker, and make their questions rapid and brief.

Madam Speaker: It also applies to Ministers.

Ms Ruddock: I shall try, Madam Speaker.

The purpose of the national strategy on tackling all forms of violence against women is to create a safer environment for women at home and in the outside world by working to eliminate all forms of violence against women and to empower women to challenge abuse. It will cover the safety of women in personal relationships, on transport, at work and in the community.

Ms Southworth: Will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the two-day conference that will be held in my constituency next month, when local agencies will meet to develop a community plan to take action against domestic violence? Does my hon. Friend agree that those kinds of partnerships are essential if we are to deal with domestic violence, which is an abhorrent crime in which the perpetrators attempt to intimidate the victims so that they are too afraid and ashamed to speak out? Can my hon. Friend confirm that the Government will speak out on behalf of the victims and will root domestic violence out of our society?

Ms Ruddock: I thank my hon. Friend for her question. I confirm that the Government are absolutely clear about the fact that domestic violence must be stamped out. I certainly commend the conference to which my hon. Friend referred and I commend partnerships. I recently witnessed an excellent partnership in Norwich involving the local authority and the housing department, which have worked with the police to enable a community care alarm provision for the elderly to be used also by victims of violence. There are many good practices out there from which we can all learn.

Mr. Brazier: I welcome the Minister's earlier answer. Will she confirm that one form of domestic violence that is even more common than violence against women is domestic violence against children? Will she reassure the House that children, who have no votes or voices, will be included in the Government's consideration of domestic violence issues?

Ms Ruddock: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: the whole Government are deeply concerned about all aspects of child abuse. When we examine domestic violence—which is categorised as violence affecting adults—we also take into account the effects of such violence upon children. The hon. Gentleman is correct to believe that we are building that consideration into our strategy of concern. My colleagues across government are also paying particular attention to all aspects of child abuse, which we wish to see removed from our society.

Lorna Fitzsimons: Although we acknowledge the insidious crime of domestic violence, it is important that the Government strategy makes people aware that our priority is not only domestic violence but all forms of violence against women. Will my hon. Friend tell us something about the cross-departmental workings that are going on to ensure that women can participate fully in the home, in the world of work, on transport and in the community without the fear of violence?

Ms Ruddock: I reiterate that the strategy that we are developing seeks to combat all forms of violence against women, including violence against women on transport. In terms of cross-Government working, I assure my hon. Friend that the women's unit and the Ministers for Women are having key input into the co-ordinated transport strategy document being developed by our colleagues in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. It is essential to put women's concerns into all aspects of Government policy. We know that women fear violence when travelling on public transport and we hope that we can do much to make it safer for them in reality while addressing their real fears.

Winter Fuel Payments

19. Mr. Baldry: What percentage of those entitled have received their full entitlement of help towards winter fuel costs. [34061]

Mr. Denham: Winter fuel payments have been an enormous and unprecedented exercise involving the issue of almost 10 million payments to more than 7 million pensioner households. As of today, payments have been dispatched to more than 99 per cent. of eligible pensioners. About 15,000 payments remain to be issued over the next few days.

Mr. Baldry: I am sure the Minister will agree that, until recently, the scheme was a bit of a shambles, with large numbers of payments being made very late in the day. After all the problems this year, can he give the House an undertaking that, if the scheme continues for a further year, it will run more smoothly next year?

Mr. Denham: I do not agree that winter fuel payments have been a shambles. They have been a great success. The Opposition did nothing to provide pensioners with help with their winter heating bills over 18 years in office.

The winter fuel payments will be made again next year, and we shall examine the procedures to see what, if any, lessons can be learnt from this year's successful exercise.

Pensioner Incomes

20. Mr. Dismore: What assessment she has made of inequality in pensioner incomes. [34062]

Mr. Denham: We want today's and tomorrow's pensioners to enjoy security in retirement. Income inequality between the best and worst-off pensioners has grown since 1979, and estimates show that that inequality is set to widen in the future.

Mr. Dismore: Is my hon. Friend aware that a quarter of pensioners are on income support, and that pensioner poverty is a serious problem, particularly in Burnt Oak and Colindale wards in my constituency? Next week, I am due to visit a pensioners luncheon club. Can my hon. Friend tell me what progress I can report to those pensioners when I meet them?

Mr. Denham: A quarter of pensioners are entitled to income support, but many of them are not receiving it. That is why, next month, we are launching nine pilot projects using the most up-to-date computer data techniques to identify those pensioners. We shall work with local authorities and local voluntary organisations to find the best ways of encouraging them to do so. I hope that, on my hon. Friend's visit to the lunch club, he will raise awareness of the Government's action for the poorest pensioners.

Police Complaints and Discipline

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): With permission, Madam Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the Government's response to the Home Affairs Committee report into police disciplinary and complaints procedures. I am placing in the Library a copy of the response to each of the Committee's conclusions and recommendations. I thank all members of the Committee for the thoroughness of their work.

I begin by praising the honesty and integrity of the vast majority of police officers in this country. Their job is a difficult and dangerous one. As a society, we make huge demands of them. We have a police service that is one of the finest in the world.

The reputation of the service is put at risk, however, by a very small minority of officers whose behaviour falls below the standards that the public rightly expect. The actions of those officers undermine the work of honest officers, and shake public confidence in the service as a whole.

I am therefore determined to give the police service the powers it needs to deal effectively with that small but corrosive minority of bad officers. The Home Affairs Committee's report made a compelling case for change. I am announcing today the steps that I am taking to implement most of its recommendations.

A debate on reform of these procedures has been going on for five years, since the previous Government launched a consultation paper in 1993. At the heart of that debate has been the issue whether arrangements in the service should be brought more into line with normal employment practice in other fields. The burden of the Home Affairs Committee's report is that they should.

The time has come for the Government to take decisions on the report's recommendations and to act upon them. I have been helped in this by the constructive and professional approach adopted by the Police Federation, the Police Superintendents Association and the Association of Chief Police Officers.

One illustration of this approach is the widespread agreement already achieved with the staff associations that the police need new procedures for tackling poor performance by individual officers, and procedures that are separate and different from those needed to deal with disciplinary matters. I accept the Committee's recommendation that the new procedures should be introduced without delay.

Let me deal first with procedures for discipline. First, I have decided that the standard of proof in disciplinary cases should be changed from the criminal to the civil standard. I am alive to the argument that some officers might be less likely to tackle criminal behaviour through anxiety that this change could leave them vulnerable to unfounded or malicious complaints. However, the civil standard of proof has operated fairly in the police service in Scotland, and there is no evidence that this has undermined officers' effectiveness there.

Moreover, I have every confidence that, with this change, police officers as a group will continue to act in the public interest. Nevertheless, I am discussing with the police associations the possibility of conducting attitudinal research to monitor the effect of the change among police officers.

There are circumstances in which conduct may constitute a breach of discipline although it has not been proved to be a criminal offence. However, at present an officer acquitted of a criminal offence may not be charged with an equivalent disciplinary offence, principally because the standard of proof is the same in criminal and in disciplinary proceedings. In future it will be possible for officers to face both disciplinary and criminal action on the same facts. This will bring the police into line with the position of most others in the public and private sectors.

I am also accepting the Committee's recommendation to end the "right of silence" of officers in disciplinary hearings, and to apply the same modified caution as laid down in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

At the moment, officers who face the loss of their job or rank as a result of a disciplinary proceeding are entitled to legal representation at all stages of formal disciplinary action. The Committee recommended that this right should be maintained only for those officers who are at risk of losing their jobs.

However, I have decided to retain the status quo, so that officers facing reduction in rank also retain their right to legal representation. In addition, I am rejecting the Committee's recommendation that discipline hearings should be held in public—although the public have a right to know the outcome of proceedings, it would in my view be manifestly unfair to officers facing discipline to have their cases dealt with at a public hearing.

For the most serious cases, the Committee recommended that chief officers should have available to them a system of "fast track" dismissal. I have decided to accept this recommendation. This system will need detailed and careful work before it can be ready for implementation. There will be discussions with the police staff associations about the appropriate procedure. The fast-track procedure will be within a framework of a fixed timetable of no more than six weeks from beginning to end. The procedure would include the right to legal representation and the right of appeal. Officers will be able to be suspended from duty immediately, as is the case now.

There is one serious defect in the present practice that causes very great public concern. This is where a police officer's retirement on ill-health grounds is agreed before disciplinary proceedings can be completed, thus ending all prospect of disciplinary action against an officer. As the House knows, the inability to complete disciplinary hearings after the Hillsborough disaster has quite rightly been a cause of great anger and frustration to the families of victims.

The procedures will therefore be strengthened so that where accused officers claim that they are unable, through ill health, to appear at disciplinary hearings, matters can be decided in their absence, but with appropriate safeguards. I shall also be securing a rigorous application of the existing regulations so that any outstanding disciplinary matters have to be completed before any application for early retirement can be considered.

I intend to take firm action against officers convicted of criminal offences connected with their work. At present, police authorities may apply to me for a certificate to forfeit the pension of any such officer, but this is at their discretion. In future, police authorities will be asked to refer all such cases to me automatically. It is abhorrent that public money should be paid out to those very few officers who are convicted of criminal offences and who abuse their position of trust.

[Mr. Jack Straw]

It is my aim to introduce all these changes in England and Wales with effect from 1 April 1999. As the Northern Ireland discipline regime mirrors the one for England and Wales, I have consulted my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on my response. My right hon. Friend agrees with my proposals, and will be implementing them in Northern Ireland.

Let me turn now to the Committee's recommendations on complaints, which need to be considered separately. Independence and openness are the key to greater public confidence in the police complaints system. The Committee's proposals point the way forward. However, some of its proposals require legislation, and many have significant resource implications. Against that background, I intend to make progress on those changes that do not require primary legislation.

I accept the Committee's recommendation that the Home Office should conduct a detailed feasibility study of different arrangements for an independent police complaints investigation process. I also accept the Committee's view that, in the absence of a totally new investigative body, fundamental changes to the complaints process would be premature, but that, in the meantime, the Police Complaints Authority should make robust use of its existing powers.

I accept in principle the Committee's recommendation that the PCA be given the powers and the funds to commission independent investigations in cases where there is reason to believe that the existing process is inadequate. However, that would involve significant extra costs, which I am afraid make early change here unlikely.

The Committee recommended that either the PCA or any other independent review body should be able to undertake investigations whether or not the matter has been the subject of a complaint. In the light of this, I am minded to propose that, as Home Secretary, I should be given a power to request or require the PCA to initiate and oversee such investigations where this is in the public interest.

Many people make a complaint about the police, which, for one reason or another, is not then recorded. The Committee proposes a relatively straightforward change to the recording of complaints, which would make the current system more responsive to public concerns. It suggests that all representations that could constitute a complaint should be registered by the police, with a right of appeal to an independent body for the complainant where there is a disagreement; and that it should be possible for a complaint to be registered directly with the PCA in certain circumstances. I accept those recommendations.

I have considerable sympathy with the criticism of the Committee that the existing arrangements are not sufficiently open to public scrutiny. The Committee therefore recommended that investigating officers' reports should be subject to disclosure on the same basis as other documents relating to a complaint. It also recommended that investigation files relating to deaths in custody should generally be made available to the deceased's family before inquests.

Those recommendations raise difficult issues. The reports of investigating officers form a class that the courts have ruled is entitled to public interest immunity, although the police can be directed to disclose a report where a court is satisfied that the public interest of disclosure would outweigh the public interest of preserving confidentiality.

On inquests, the High Court has held that a person is not entitled in advance of the inquest to see copies of statements provided by the police to coroners. At the moment, the release of such documents is at the discretion of the police, but I accept some of the Committee's criticisms, and I am therefore giving further consideration to the scope for changes in this area.

My detailed response to the Committee deals with other confidence-building changes that it has recommended. Some of the recommendations on the complaints system that I have accepted will require primary legislation. The Government will look for suitable opportunities to introduce such changes. Much detailed work and consultation is required with ACPO, the police staff associations, the Association of Police Authorities, and other interested parties. This further work and consultation will begin straight away.

In considering the Committee's recommendations, I have paid full regard to the implications for all police officers who every day fight crime and disorder, and who protect the public. I have no intention of making police officers more vulnerable to malicious complaints about the way in which they do their jobs; but, equally, we must deal robustly with wrongdoing by a very small minority of police officers if public trust is to be preserved. Uppermost in my mind has been protecting the deservedly high reputation and standing of the police service as a whole.

In this country, we police by public consent, and that consent depends on public confidence and trust. The measures that I have announced today will strengthen the people's trust and confidence in their police service, and I commend them to the House.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): I am grateful to the Home Secretary for letting me have a copy of his statement in advance. As I think he already knows, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), the shadow Home Secretary, is unable to be present because he is at a funeral.

Before making a number of detailed points, let me ask the Home Secretary whether he agrees that the overwhelming majority of our policemen and women are honest, decent and brave, and that they are as anxious as anyone for the small minority whose conduct falls below the required standard to be dealt with effectively.

Is the Home Secretary satisfied that the new arrangements following the change from a criminal to a civil standard of proof in disciplinary cases will contain sufficient safeguards to protect honest and decent police officers from unfounded and malicious complaints? In particular, is he satisfied that there will be sufficient safeguards in cases in which serious allegations have been made, and in which serious sanctions could follow? Will the same standard of proof—which is now to be the civil standard—apply in both the less serious and the more serious types of case? What will the position be in cases that could lead to criminal charges?

The Home Secretary has said that he is alive to the risk that some officers might be less likely to tackle criminal behaviour through anxiety as a result of the changes that he has announced today. Will the research into attitudes to which he referred take full account of that, and will that research be wide-ranging and cover each of the 43 police forces? Does the Home Secretary accept that there is a difference between criminal behaviour on the part of an officer and inadequacy on the part of an officer in the face of a particular situation, and does he agree that the disciplinary procedure should reflect that?

On the fast-track procedures, will regard be given in future to the need not to prejudice a criminal trial when such procedures are operating? There is also the question of retirement on ill-health grounds before disciplinary proceedings. Will it be possible for disciplinary hearings to be held under existing arrangements when an officer cannot be present as a result of ill health?

If hearings can be held under existing arrangements, will the Home Secretary tell us exactly what changes he is proposing? Will he also say whether any of the measures that he proposes will have an effect on police officers' own pension contributions? Will he tell us what will be the remit of the feasibility study for an independent complaints process, and whether its report will be published?

Finally, does the Home Secretary agree that, in seeking to deal with corrupt and bad police officers, we should never lose sight of the need to protect good and honest police officers, who form the vast majority?

Mr. Straw: I entirely accept that the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) cannot be present because he is attending a funeral. I also entirely concur—as was suggested by my opening remarks—with the opening and closing observations of the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) about the high levels of probity among the vast majority of police officers. The changes in the disciplinary process are needed to protect not only the public, but those officers.

The hon. Gentleman asks eight specific questions; I shall deal with them as quickly as I can. Will there be sufficient safeguards to insure against unfounded malicious complaints that lead to disciplinary action? Yes, I believe that there will be. One of the matters that the Select Committee considered is whether there should be a new offence of making a malicious complaint, but it decided against that. The associations, which made the suggestion, are not especially enthusiastic about it, although I have already told them privately that if they can make a strong argument in the light of experience, I shall consider it. The vast majority of investigations that lead to serious disciplinary action being taken against police officers are not promoted by complaints from members of the public, but arise through internal investigations by the police.

The hon. Gentleman asks whether the burden of proof would be the same in serious, less serious and more serious cases. Yes, it would be, but the application of that burden of proof in practice will be higher the more serious the case, because that is the way in which tribunals operate.

The hon. Gentleman also asks whether the research into attitudes, which we are discussing with the police associations, would take full account of the anxieties of police officers—yes, it would. He also asks whether it would examine practice in all 43 forces. I doubt whether that would be possible, because it would inevitably be a sample survey, but we shall cover as much of the country as we can.

The hon. Gentleman asks whether I accept that there is a clear distinction between criminal behaviour by a small minority of officers and officers' inadequate conduct in the heat of circumstances. I accept that. One of the changes that the associations have already embraced is a need to deal with poor performance in a separate way from disciplinary processes.

The hon. Gentleman asks whether the fast-track procedure should be set up in a way that should not prejudice criminal trials. That will be a sine qua non of using that procedure. Disciplinary action that leads to the dismissal of an individual but does not prejudice a subsequent criminal trial can be taken in many other walks of life, such as the Prison Service and the police service in Scotland.

The hon. Gentleman asks whether existing arrangements provide for the hearing of cases of officers who are absent on grounds of ill health. In practice, they do not. I shall write to him about whether the small print provides that they should, but, whatever it says, the truth is that at the moment officers can evade proceedings on disciplinary grounds if they put in a sick note.

The hon. Gentleman asks whether the feasibility study into complaints will be published. I intend to publish as much of it as possible.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement: rarely has a Select Committee report been responded to as swiftly and as fully as this one. Will he accept from me that this is a good day not only for those of us who care about upholding public confidence in the police, but for the Select Committee system as a whole?

It is now up to chief officers robustly to use the new disciplinary powers that they have been given and not, as some have in the past, to fail to use the powers at their disposal when they should have done.

I was not sure what my right hon. Friend was saying on complaints, but one of the difficulties presented to us during our investigation was that chief constables occasionally refused to refer a complaint to the Police Complaints Authority: the authority wanted to pursue a complaint, but it was hamstrung. Is my right hon. Friend saying that he will allow the PCA to pursue complaints that it deems should be pursued?

Mr. Straw: I thank my hon. Friend, who is the Chairman of the Select Committee, for his remarks. I pay tribute to members of the Select Committee for their work, but I particularly want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend. I entirely share his view that this is a good day for the Select Committee process.

In 1979, the Leader of the House, Mr. St. John-Stevas, as he was then, proposed the establishment of the departmental Select Committee. There was some scepticism about whether the process would advance the work of the House. I am in no doubt that it has, and this report shows that a Select Committee is far better placed than an interdepartmental inquiry to bring out the issues that are central to the problem of police complaints and discipline. It is a good example of Parliament and Government working together.

[Mr. Straw]

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) that I shall urge chief officers to use these powers robustly. The Police Federation has said that chief officers have not used some of their present powers robustly, and that is a fair criticism. They have the power not to allow retirements on ill health until disciplinary processes have been completed. Too often, they have taken the easy way out and have got rid of a bad apple by allowing him to retire early: they must stop doing that.

My hon. Friend asked whether the Police Complaints Authority will be able, of its own volition, to initiate an inquiry if a chief officer fails to pass a case on to the authority. I propose that the Home Secretary of the day should be given the power to direct the PCA to initiate an inquiry in such circumstances.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): The Liberal Democrats welcome the Select Committee report, and are pleased that the Home Secretary has responded to it so positively. Will he explain how he plans to widen access to the findings of the complaints procedure?

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) and I expressed concern about the use of public interest immunity to block a recent report into the goings-on at Harrogate police station after allegations of serious sexual harassment. Does the Home Secretary share our view that greater rather than less access is in the public interest? Will he rectify the current situation whereby large amounts of taxpayers' money are spent but no findings are published?

Will the new restrictions on retirement and ill health apply to all ranks, including the most senior? Some of the more controversial cases in recent years have involved senior ranks up to chief constable. Will they be subject to the same rules? Will the Home Secretary consider putting in place a mechanism whereby junior officers can raise issues of concern about the use of the lower burden of proof? We share the Committee's view that the lower standard of proof is appropriate, but junior officers have a legitimate concern about possible abuse by senior officers. Does the Home Secretary plan to offer junior officers a way to raise such concerns?

I hope that the Home Secretary shares our view that the outcome of these changes should be an increase in the morale of the police by sorting out the odd few bad apples, and an increase in public confidence, which should be a good measure of whether the system is effective. People should go through the formal procedure rather than resort to the civil courts, as they have increasingly been doing.

Mr. Straw: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support for my statement and for the work of the Select Committee.

I am giving further consideration to the complicated problem of providing greater public access to the findings of the complaints procedure. People who are subjected to the disciplinary process have rights, which is why the courts have taken the view that public interest immunity should apply to them as a class, save if a court decides that PII should not apply in the interests of justice.

We are considering whether, under the Freedom of Information Bill, some of the constraints on the publication of reports by the Police Complaints Authority should be lifted. I shall inform the House of my conclusions at a later stage.

The new proposals will apply to ranks up to and including the rank of chief superintendent. Discipline of ACPO ranks—chief officers—are dealt with by police authorities. I accept that there may be some implications for police authorities, and we shall discuss those matters with the Association of Police Authorities, the Association of Chief Police Officers and the new staff association for chief officers, whose new acronym I forget.

The hon. Gentleman asks whether I accept that police officers may have some legitimate concern about the way in which the new process, particularly the lowering of the burden of proof, will work. I accept that there is some concern, and I have discussed that with the Police Federation. I hope that, over time, the concern is allayed. It has not been a problem for the police service in Scotland, or within the Prison Service. Even after a chief officer's disciplinary finding, there is a careful, two-stage appeal process, first to an independent tribunal and then to the Secretary of State himself.

Lastly, the hon. Gentleman asks whether I believe that the changes will raise police morale. Yes, I firmly believe that, because police morale and the dedicated, hard-working majority of officers are severely and disproportionately damaged by the work of a bad minority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe): Is the Home Secretary aware that the only occasion on which I received a certain amount of barracking from a small section of the audience at a Police Federation conference was when I announced proposals on police discipline that were exactly the same as those that he has announced? Would he not be deterred by that, because I think that, in the many years that have followed, opinion has moved yet further, and that the vast majority of honest, hard-working police officers in the federation and elsewhere will accept that the proposals will enhance the already high reputation of the police service and not be a threat to it?

Has the Home Secretary firmly decided beyond further consultation that the possibility of disciplinary proceedings following acquittal on a criminal charge will proceed? It must be right to say that the facts that might demonstrate innocence on the criminal charge could still illustrate conduct that falls far below that which is expected of a serving police officer. It must be right for chief constables to consider that.

As many cases can give rise to criminal proceedings against a police officer or against a complainant and to possible disciplinary proceedings against a police officer, following his earlier reply, would the Home Secretary say that, in all ordinary circumstances, it must be right for the question of criminal prosecution and criminal proceedings to be disposed of altogether before any disciplinary proceedings start? It is difficult to conceive how, under the fast-track procedure or in any other way, criminal proceedings might not be prejudiced by findings at a disciplinary proceeding to the disadvantage of either the officer or the cause of justice if the complainant benefits from a rather abrupt disciplinary hearing.

Mr. Straw: I pay tribute to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his work on this matter. I am sure that the robust line which I have no doubt he took in dealing with this matter before the Police Federation some five or six years ago has helped to open up the debate. It is a matter for regret that, although his successor as Home Secretary initially endorsed the position that the right hon. and learned Gentleman when he was Home Secretary set out in a speech to the Police Superintendents Association in September 1993, he later backed off from making those changes. Some of them could have been introduced some time ago if it had not been for that.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asks whether I accept that the changes may result in officers being dealt with under the disciplinary process although they have been acquitted by a criminal court. The answer is that, by changing the burden of proof, that must be the case. In some instances, officers either will not be proceeded against on a criminal charge because of the Crown Prosecution Service's view of the evidence, or will be proceeded against and acquitted but may still, rightly, be found guilty under a disciplinary process.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asks whether I accept that, in all but the most exceptional cases, the criminal trial should be dealt with before any disciplinary processes are disposed of. I do not accept that. It depends on individual circumstances. It is rare for a police officer to face a charge of dishonesty, except in grave circumstances, and I am advised by the chief officers concerned that, in many such cases, it is essential for the officers to be dealt with, disciplined and away from the police service before the inevitably much longer criminal processes take their course.

However, I have made it clear that it is self-evidently critical that disciplinary processes in these circumstances would precede a criminal process only where the Crown Prosecution Service has taken the view that subsequent court proceedings would not be prejudiced.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. Does he agree that the big difficulty is that the police are still seen to be investigating complaints themselves? I urge him to drive on as quickly as possible with measures to enable a more independent Police Complaints Authority to handle these matters sensibly, fairly and effectively, to attract the support of both police and public.

Mr. Straw: I certainly accept that part of the problem with the perception of the existing system is that the police are seen to be investigating themselves. This is a system that has grown up. It has been the subject of criticism by the Select Committee on Home Affairs, by hon. Members on both sides of the House and, it is fair to say, by the Police Federation, which represents the majority of officers, who also want an independent investigative process.

That said, my experience is that, precisely because the police investigate themselves, they conduct almost all these investigations with great rigour and considerable independence. However, there remains the problem of public perception.

It is for that reason that I have undertaken to conduct the feasibility studies to find out ways in which we can inject greater independence into the process of investigation of serious matters. I do not think that there is any case for greater independence in the process of investigating less serious matters, which, in other walks of life, are dealt with by internal management in any case.

My hon. Friend calls for a more independent PCA. The PCA is robustly independent. The issue is not its independence, but the independence of the investigative process itself.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): I welcome the Home Secretary's statement, and agree with much of it. However, may I direct the right hon. Gentleman to two issues: the balance of burden of proof, and pensions? Does he accept that, in serious cases, there must be great concern if the burden of proof is the civil one rather than the criminal one? Will he please look at that again?

Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, although it is right that forfeiting a pension entitlement should be considered when a police officer is convicted, it is also right that the rules of proportionality should be observed, and that pensions should not always be forfeited; that should happen only in serious cases? Will he deal with the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) on a police officer's contributions? Those are contributions that the police officer has made. Are they to be forfeit as well? That would seem to be a form of expropriation.

Mr. Straw: I do not accept the right hon. and learned Gentleman's view that there will be great concern about the change in the burden of proof. I know that he took a different view when the matter came before the Select Committee. I think that, overwhelmingly, the advantage is in changing the burden of proof. There is no question of that in my mind. The only result of the present very high burden of proof is that police officers who are obviously guilty of the most serious corrupt practices are able to get away with their crimes—and crimes they are.

However, I have already said that I accept that there are anxieties among police officers. We will monitor the case. We will discuss how to do so in a positive way through attitudinal research, the terms of which we will agree with the police associations.

On the issue of forfeiting pensions, the right hon. and learned Gentleman asks whether I accept that the rules of proportionality should apply. Yes, of course I do. The sorts of case that we are thinking of are those in which police officers have been convicted of very serious corruption charges. In those circumstances, I do not believe that it is right for such officers to go on drawing pensions at public expense even while they are still in prison. That is unacceptable and has to end, but what I am talking about—to answer his third question—is that part of the pension that has been provided at public expense, not that part of a pension that is being provided out of the deferred salary of the police officer himself or herself.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): I welcome my right hon. Friend's reference to the tragedy suffered by the families involved in the Hillsborough disaster. Does he accept that one of the greatest griefs felt by those families is that one of the senior police officers involved was able to avoid disciplinary proceedings by retiring? Can he assure the House that that will not happen in similar cases in future? Will he take this opportunity to deal with the concern of those families that what he is introducing today cannot be made retrospective?

[Helen Jones]

Mr. Straw: As I said in my statement, I accept that the families and friends who lost loved ones at Hillsborough are right to be angry about the fact that disciplinary proceedings were avoided by an early retirement. That matter is made even worse because the regulation that exists today, and which I believe existed eight or nine years ago, gives police chiefs a discretion not to allow a retirement in such a case. Therefore, I am not changing the regulation: I am ensuring its rigorous enforcement.

My hon. Friend asked why I could not make the changes retrospective. It is a fundamental principle that new criminal or disciplinary proceedings cannot be imposed retrospectively. It would not stand up in a court here, where it would plainly be seen as an abuse of process; nor would it stand up in the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): Further to the exchanges about Hillsborough, and as the right hon. Gentleman made it clear that the start date is to be 1 April, will he clarify whether any new disciplinary cases opened after today, which relate to alleged offences that have either already taken place or that take place before the start date, will be covered under the old procedures for burden of proof?

Mr. Straw: I think that the hon. Gentleman may have misheard me. The start date is 1 April 1999, not 1998. There is a great deal of work to be done to ensure that the regulations are properly drafted. I wish that we could begin before that date, but we cannot. I will write to the hon. Gentleman in detail about the point at which the start date will come into operation. My anticipation is that it will operate from the point at which a disciplinary offence is committed.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): My right hon. Friend may be aware that I have tabled a number of questions about disciplinary procedures in each police authority, asking for information on the number, the duration, the cost and the outcome, including any early retirements by any officers involved. Is my right hon. Friend aware that there has been some concern about the number, the duration, the cost overall, and the lack of outcome from those inquiries? That is why I welcome the proposals that he has announced today.

Does my right hon. Friend accept that the number of police inquires are a direct reflection of a failure in management? What measures will be put in place to strengthen management within the police service to accompany the reforms?

Mr. Straw: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the lack of outcome in quite a number of the inquiries. They can be enormously disproportionately expensive, continue for years, tie up huge numbers of officers, and then produce no outcome. No one is satisfied with such a process.

The issue of management is a bit of a chicken and egg situation. Managers in the police service, from sergeants upwards, know that bad officers can plead a right of silence that is now far more comprehensive than that available to their criminal suspects. They also, rightly, have very good legal advice made available to them. Therefore, they can give the run-around to managers, especially those who may not be at the highest level. In some forces, that has led to a management retreat from taking on officers who are corrupt or who operate below the standards expected of them.

It is my hope and anticipation that these changes will strengthen the management of the police service at every level, and I certainly intend to ensure that that happens.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid–Sussex): In joining the Home Secretary in congratulating the Home Affairs Select Committee on its excellent report, may I ask him to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the House this rare occasion on which a Select Committee report has been dealt with so promptly, to the added credibility of the Select Committee system and its importance in holding the Executive to account?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also explain how, given the fact that disciplinary hearings have rightly been held in private, matters will enter the public domain so that those who have made the complaint will know the results of that complaint?

Finally, will the regulations apply to the Ministry of Defence police as well?

Mr. Straw: I shall pass on the hon. Gentleman's point about Select Committee reports to my right hon. Friend the President of the Council. Meanwhile, I concur with his congratulations to the Select Committee and—if I may say so—I accept his congratulations to myself.

The hon. Gentleman asks how complainants will know what has happened to the complaint; as happens now, they will be written to. He also asks whether the public will be able to attend disciplinary hearings against police officers. That does not happen in any other employment cases, so I thought that it would be unacceptable to apply it to the police.

It is worth drawing to the attention of the House the fact—if I may repeat it—that the overwhelming majority of disciplinary cases, particularly those involving serious allegations against police officers, have not arisen as a result of a complaint either by a suspect or by members of the public: they have arisen as a result of internal investigations by the police. The hon. Gentleman asks whether the changes will apply to the Ministry of Defence police. No, they will not specifically apply to them, but I shall certainly draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, but I think that he said that the police force involved in the Hillsborough tragedy could have required the senior officer responsible to undergo the disciplinary proceedings that he was finally spared by retiring on the ground of ill health. If my right hon. Friend encountered such a situation in future and felt that a senior officer had been let off the hook, what steps would he take, or be able to take, to ensure that the senior managers of the force discharged their responsibility in carrying out disciplinary proceedings more fully?

Mr. Straw: I hope that, following the changes that I have announced today—they will come into force on 1 April next year—such a circumstance will not be able to arise. We are tightening up the regulations and imposing much clearer guidance, both on police authorities and on chief officers, about the operation of the disciplinary procedures.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): I add my appreciation to that of other hon. Members of the Home Secretary's endorsement of the majority of the Select Committee's recommendations on the enhancements of police discipline and performance in the service.

In the concluding remarks of his statement, the right hon. Gentleman said that consent in policing depends on public confidence. Is he absolutely confident that, when the new police authority for London is established, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis will receive the full political backing that he will require to take on some of the tough cases of corruption that we know exist in the Metropolitan force? Currently, that backing is provided by the Home Secretary in person, who is answerable to the House of Commons.

Mr. Straw: I am quite sure that the police authority for London will give the Commissioner of the day full backing for the investigation of any complaints against individual police officers on disciplinary matters. The hon. Gentleman uses the phrase "full political backing". I make it clear to him that chief police officers have duties that are entirely separate from those of police authorities in disciplinary matters up to and including the rank of chief superintendent.

Chief officers across the country decide to initiate proceedings—or have them initiated—against members of their forces not on political grounds, but on the basis of the evidence that is put before them. I have no doubt whatever that that will continue to be the case in the Metropolitan police district.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my right hon. Friend recall that, in the past year, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and the chief constable of the West Midlands both stated that they were unable to deal with dishonest and corrupt police officers under the present circumstances?

I welcome the announcement that my right hon. Friend has accepted a change in the disciplinary system. Does he agree that it will be welcomed not only by chief constables but by the vast majority of honest police officers—the very people he mentioned—who are ashamed of having in their ranks the small number of corrupt and dishonest officers who are rotten to the core, and that the sooner the bad ones go, the better it will be for the police, good order and the community as a whole?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is quite right to draw to our attention the remarks of a number of senior chief officers who gave evidence to the Select Committee, including the current Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, Sir Paul Condon, who complained about the inadequacies of the present system. He said:

"The system must allow for the effective investigation and punishment of wrongdoers" within the police service.

My hon. Friend was also right to say that the changes will be welcomed by police officers of every rank. The issue reminds me of the situation with teachers: the people who suffer most from bad teachers are the overwhelming majority of good teachers. Those who suffer most, alongside the public, from bad police officers are the overwhelming majority of good police officers.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I welcome the Home Secretary's statement. Does he recognise the role of police authorities in assuring, in the public interest, the probity and rigour of the complaints and disciplinary procedures? Will he consider the value as a tool of police management of assessing the pattern and number of complaints, whether substantiated or not, against individual officers or units of command?

Mr. Straw: I certainly recognise the importance of police authorities in ensuring that adequate procedures are established for dealing with discipline and complaints within their services. I acknowledge that the pattern and number of complaints may be an indicator of a police force's performance, but such figures should be used with care, because the number of complaints arising in a difficult-to-police inner-city area is always likely to be higher than in quieter, more rural areas, and that is no criticism of the police concerned.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Seven hon. Members are rising who have been doing so for a long time. If we can proceed without repetition and with a little speed, I should like to call them all.

Gillian Merron (Lincoln): I welcome my right hon. Friend's clear and pragmatic statement, and in particular his commitment to greater openness, which, as he will know, is a big issue in Lincolnshire. I discussed that issue at a recent meeting with him arising from the case of Inspector Dena Fleming, who alleged sex discrimination against her employers and was suspended for two years on disciplinary charges that were subsequently dropped, following a report by Humberside police that remains under wraps, and an industrial tribunal ruling of victimisation.

Will my right hon. Friend give me some assurances about the fast-track dismissal proposals, especially when victimisation is involved, as Inspector Fleming might have had more of a struggle to clear her name had the chief constable had the opportunity to dismiss her earlier?

Mr. Straw: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns. As she said, they have already been the subject of a meeting between us. The proposal for fast-track dismissals is not for the kind of case that she has in mind but for a situation in which a police officer has been caught red-handed committing a serious crime of dishonesty or corruption; the evidence against him or her is overwhelming; and it is in the public interest for that officer to be removed from the service as quickly as possible. Even in those circumstances, the officer would have full legal representation, and there would be a proper right of appeal.

[Mr. Straw]

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): Does my right hon. Friend agree that nothing saps the morale of police officers more than going through an investigation, giving evidence in court and finding that it is not accepted by the jury because of their lack of confidence in the police? Does he equally agree that, if police officers give evidence in court and it is not only not accepted but shown not to be correct, counsel, the Crown Prosecution Service and other officers ought to have a duty to ensure that disciplinary action is considered promptly and efficiently against the officer in such circumstances?

Mr. Straw: In the interests of brevity, the answer to both my hon. Friend's questions is yes.

Ms Jenny Jones (Wolverhampton, South–West): My right hon. Friend says that disciplinary hearings will not be heard in public. Therefore, who will have access to the written record of such proceedings?

Mr. Straw: The outcome of the proceedings would be made public to the complainant if there were one, and otherwise to the police authority. As I said, in the overwhelming majority of serious cases there is no public complainant, because the investigation has been prompted by internal police processes and not by a complaint from a member of the public.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): Is the Home Secretary aware that deep outrage persists over the Hillsborough tragedy, partly because officers were allowed to escape disciplinary procedures, despite the Police Complaints Authority's claim that they had neglected their duty? Can he offer any hope whatsoever that the officers concerned will have to face justice; and can he offer any other forum to enable parents to pursue their concerns?

Mr. Straw: As my hon. Friend knows, and as I have explained in her presence to parents and relatives of those who died at Hillsborough, with great regret, I cannot offer any comfort to those seeking a disciplinary process at this distance against officers alleged to have been responsible through negligence for what happened. It would be wrong of me to hold out that hope, because it cannot be fulfilled.

We want to ensure that such a circumstance does not happen again and that the Police Complaints Authority does not, as happened at Hillsborough, again recommend disciplinary action against officers who then retire through ill health and so escape any disciplinary process. That is wrong, and everyone knows it. I am trying to ensure that it does not happen again.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): May I welcome the speed of this response? If the same action had been taken following the speech by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) in 1993, how many officers would not have walked away without being the subject of disciplinary investigations?

On his suggestion about examining more independent inquiries, will my right hon. Friend consider whether it would be appropriate to establish an automatic system of independent inquiry into cases of members of the public who are shot dead by an armed policeman? One of the great strengths of this country is that our police are not armed. There are questions about how effective the PCA is in investigating such matters, and there is a case for inquiries to be automatic on such occasions.

Mr. Straw: On my hon. Friend's first question, when the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) was Home Secretary, he proceeded with great vigour on the issue. Sadly, he was translated to Great George street as Chancellor of the Exchequer in May 1993, and then, as far as police discipline was concerned, the system went into reverse. I cannot say how many corrupt police officers escaped their just deserts as a result of the failure of my immediate predecessor to implement the recommendations of his predecessor, but some must have done so.

My hon. Friend also asks whether, under the PCA, there could be an automatic independent inquiry if someone was shot by the police. Such matters should not be subject to a system that is wholly separate from the other procedures that we are establishing.

At the moment, if a death appears to have been caused by police action—however justified that action—the PCA automatically launches an inquiry. By definition, at the moment that investigation is undertaken by a police force, but by a different police force. Any changes should wait on general changes to the system and the introduction more generally of an independent element for investigations.

Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): As a member of the Home Affairs Select Committee, may I, too, warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's statement? Is not the answer to the point about the standard of proof raised by Conservative Members that the civil standard operates in other comparable jurisdictions and for other professional bodies perfectly satisfactorily?

Mr. Straw: The answer is yes.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): I thank my right hon. Friend for keeping his promise to the Hillsborough families by making these proposals. I know that he has met them, and has been closely involved.

I am concerned that, while the officer involved, Chief Superintendent Duckenfield, was thought unfit to be able to carry on, the families had to go through independent inquiries, mini-inquests, inquests and further emotional, difficult time—and they are still fighting. That is an ironic comparison.

Given that disciplinary proceedings were at one time contemplated, I am worried about the behaviour of the South Yorkshire force. Disinformation and propaganda were used to try to defend the police officers in charge. That was not helpful in respect of subsequent disciplinary proceedings. In considering the detail of his proposals, will the Home Secretary examine how police forces react to high-profile disciplinary cases?

Mr. Straw: I thank my hon. Friend for his first remarks. There is no doubt that the families are right to feel a strong sense of injustice about the failure of the system to secure disciplinary process against those who appear to have been responsible, through their negligence, for the dreadful disaster at Hillsborough so many years ago.

On the more general point about the behaviour of forces, the way in which some in the South Yorkshire police tried, quite wrongly, to minimise what had happened was a very unedifying saga, to say the least. In the words of Lord Justice Stuart-Smith, some, including Chief Superintendent Duckenfield, uttered "disgraceful lies" about who was responsible, in order to evade their own responsibility.

I cannot say that such circumstances will never happen again, but I can say that there has been a profound change in the culture and attitude of the police service since Hillsborough. I believe strongly that my announcement today will reinforce that change, and ensure much higher standards should such a disaster happen again.

Statements by Ministers

4.31 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid–Sussex): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, relating to a question that I asked the Leader of the House last Thursday. Given that there was a Government statement last Thursday on the expenditure of £45 million on replacing outdoor lavatories for children, could you impress on the Government the importance of Ministers coming to the House when they have important news to impart?

You will be aware that the Foreign Secretary has returned from arguably the most important trip of his presidency of the European Union Council of Ministers, which touched on matters vital to this country. I and many other Conservative Members believe that he handled it extraordinarily well. Given that comparison, is it not right that he should come to the House and make a statement on what happened?

Madam Speaker: I take very seriously the hon. Gentleman's point of order. I know that a number of statements are forthcoming this week. Perhaps we shall hear from the Foreign Secretary, but I do not know yet. I will do what I can.

Concessionary Television Licence (Amendment)

4.33 pm

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to create greater flexibility in the definition of sheltered housing that is eligible for concessionary television licences, to reflect developments within the structure and management of sheltered housing.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to propose this Bill, which is designed to deal with some of the anomalies inherent in existing legislation on granting concessionary television licences to areas of sheltered housing. The issue came to my attention as a result of constituency cases where sheltered housing complexes have found it difficult to secure concessionary television licences.

The sages of the House will have a wry smile at a new boy discovering an issue that he considers a gold mine of anomalies, only to discover that he is not the first to arrive at the treasure. As I looked further into this issue, I discovered that many hon. Members had raised it before. I pay tribute to those hon. Members who have asked questions, led debates in the House and written letters to Ministers on the subject. I noticed from Hansard extracts that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were involved in pursuing the previous Government on this matter.

I am grateful to those hon. Members who have pioneered the issue and who have agreed to support my Bill. I am delighted that it has attracted cross-party support, especially from several of the supporters of a recent early-day motion, led by the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace).

Current regulations stipulate that four qualifying criteria must be satisfied to ensure that a sheltered housing development can successfully apply for a concessionary television licence. First, sheltered housing must form part of a group of at least four dwellings within a common and exclusive boundary, with a concession that up to 25 per cent. of units in a scheme can be properties purchased under the right-to-buy legislation. Secondly, the accommodation must be specially provided for occupation only by disabled people or retired people of pensionable age. Thirdly, the units must be provided or managed by a local authority, a housing association, or a development corporation. Fourthly, the accommodation must have a person—for example, a warden—whose function is to care for the needs of the residents and who lives on site, or works there for at least 30 hours each week.

At one time, those regulations would have been an accurate reflection of the nature and characteristics of sheltered housing—that is, blocks of housing units constructed by local councils and with a resident warden living in a flat within the complex—but the world has moved on, and the regulations appear to relate to a very structured type of sheltered housing complex. Indeed, within the origins of the concessionary television licence scheme was a desire to ensure that sheltered housing benefited from a concession that was available to residential homes. The four criteria I mentioned bear a greater resemblance to the characteristics of a residential home than to sheltered housing as we know it today.

The criteria do not relate to the increasingly varied characteristics of sheltered housing complexes. As the right-to-buy legislation came into force in the 1980s, it became almost impossible for local authorities to justify the construction of new family-style accommodation. Limitations were therefore placed on local authorities, and they increasingly concentrated what housing development work they undertook on the construction of sheltered housing. To their work was added the contribution of a plethora of other housing associations, which came forward with a number of innovative schemes to provide that type of housing.

[Mr. John Swinney]

Some smaller units were constructed as part of a wider housing development. Care for elderly residents is provided not by a resident warden, but by giving residents security through providing them with, for example, an alarm system linked to a communications network. If the elderly resident requires assistance at any time during the day or night, he or she simply rings the alarm, and help is at the end of the telephone. Help can be sent via mobile assistance units targeted at the needs of individual residents.

I visited the headquarters of such a system at Fairlie house in Kirriemuir in my constituency. It is or can be in contact with thousands of pensioners in sheltered housing throughout the county of Angus, and help is on hand all the time. It is an efficient and comforting method of giving security to fiercely independent elderly people. However, that system would lead to a range of sheltered housing complexes in my constituency failing the test of the four criteria, because the complex would not involve a resident warden, despite the fact that the care support and the type of protection available to the elderly residents are not really that different.

Early-day motion 930 raises the problem that concessionary television licences can be withdrawn because of circumstances over which the individual resident has absolutely no control. In the current climate of local authority financial constraints, which inevitably lead to cuts, there is an increasing trend for wardens to be removed from residential accommodation or to work fewer hours.

Such a change in practice, effected by the local authority, will result in one of the four criteria not being fulfilled, and the concessionary television licence being forfeited. In such a case, the individual's circumstances have changed not one iota, but the arrangements of the sheltered housing complex have changed as a result of the local authority's action. There appears to be no flexibility in the system to take account of such difficulties.

I am aware that many Members have constituency cases related to the issues raised in the Bill, and I am grateful to a number of them for calling me in the past few days to discuss the cases that they have in mind. One case in my constituency—I have discussed it with the Television Licensing Authority—relates to Priory cottages in the village of Lunanhead in Angus, a sheltered housing complex separated from a larger complex at Carseview terrace. The two units share support services, but are not physically linked, being separated by a few other houses. Carseview terrace receives a concessionary licence, but Priory cottages does not; one complex passes all four criteria, but the other does not.

My Bill aims to modify the strict nature of these criteria and to define a more flexible set of criteria that can be applied, for the benefit of the residents and the organisations that care for them. At the very least, the criteria must be revised to make them more representative of sheltered housing patterns; and the absolute requirement that all four criteria must be satisfied should be modified.

The Government have said that they intend to revisit the concessionary television licence as part of the funding review of the BBC that will be concluded in advance of 2002. I welcome that commitment to a far-ranging review, but I believe that the Government must be encouraged to deal with some of the anomalies so as to make the application of these provisions more practical. If the Bill is not successful, I hope that the Government will look at the substantial proposals that emerge, and consider them as the review gathers pace.

I hope that my Bill will be successful in providing additional support and continuity for elderly and disabled people. The system is not working at present, and it should be simplified to expand assistance to these key groups in society. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Swinney, Mrs. Margaret Ewing, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mr. James Wallace, Mr. Huw Edwards, Mr. Peter Bottomley, Rev. Martin Smyth, Mr. Paul Keetch and Mr. Alasdair Morgan.

CONCESSIONARY TELEVISION LICENCE (AMENDMENT)

Mr. John Swinney accordingly presented a Bill to create greater flexibility in the definition of sheltered housing that is eligible for concessionary television licences, to reflect developments within the structure and management of sheltered housing: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 24 April, and to be printed [Bill 155].

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [17 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for varying any rate at which that tax is at any time chargeable; or

(d) for any relief, other than a relief which—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description.—[Mr. Gordon Brown.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: The Third Report of Session 1997–98 from the Social Security Committee, on Tax and Benefits: Pre-Budget Report (HC 423), and the First Report of Session 1997–98 from the Environmental Audit Committee, on the Pre-Budget Report (HC 547).]

4.42 pm

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): It is both a great pleasure and an honour to open the final day of debate on this, the first full Budget of the new Labour Government: a Budget that starts to shape our future; a Budget that is radical and reforming. It begins to heal the divisions in our society and to tackle the weaknesses in our economy—a bold Budget from a Government who, I remind the House, have held office for less than a year.

We came to office pledged to promote economic stability and sound economic management, to restore our public finances and to repair our damaged and divided country. This Budget makes further progress on all those aims. The announcement of a long-term framework for business taxation, following the steps last July to place interest rates in the hands of the Bank of England, contributes to the economic and policy stability that helps British business to plan ahead and which business called on us, when we were in opposition, to promote should we become the Government.

As we have been in office for less than a year, we must remind ourselves and the country of what led the business community to make that universal and heartfelt plea. I refer of course to the economic legacy of the Tory party. Business failures reached all-time highs; more than 24,000 businesses went bust in 1992 alone. Manufacturing investment was at an all-time low. For the first time ever, we had a manufacturing trade deficit. Interest rates soared to a peak of 15 per cent., and inflation was in double figures. Hundreds of thousands of homes were repossessed, and millions were condemned to a lifetime of hopeless unemployment.

What about the public finances? National debt doubled under the Government led by the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), with interest alone costing income tax payers about £1,000 a year. This was the burden that we were all forced to carry because of the sheer incompetence of that Tory Administration. When we came to power, the Tories were spending far more repaying the interest on their debts—the cost of their failure—than they were investing in our schools.

All week, the Conservatives have been boasting of what they claim is our golden legacy—but what about their golden dowry? They ran up all these debts despite having the full benefit of the biggest windfall gain in our long history. To them and them alone fell the full bounty of North sea oil—£139 billion at today's prices. That was on top of income from privatisations that yielded further billions for the Exchequer. From those two sources alone, the Conservative party had well in excess of £200 billion at today's prices—approaching £30 million every single day for 18 years. What should have been a great opportunity to invest in all our futures and prepare for the next century was instead frittered away on incompetence and dogma.

So much for the idea that the Tories are the party that knows how to run a tight ship. One would think that they would learn from their mistakes—to say nothing of the verdict of the British people on those mistakes—but the same blithe indifference and ignorance still apply. The same rhetoric is deployed about the wickedness of the minimum wage or the social chapter, as if the British people had rejected, not endorsed, those policies.

The same sleight of hand is displayed in the Tory pretence that we are breaching policy promises which in fact exist only in the fevered imaginations of Conservative Members. In this vein, the Leader of the Opposition claimed to be quoting me when I was attacking certain Tory proposals in 1988 as being the same as the measures in this Budget—when almost the only thing they have in common is the use of the word "credit".

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Does the right hon. Lady think that DM3.06 to the pound is a good rate for British industry? Does she fear that it will mean big reductions in exports, a big surge in imports and a lot of factory closures?

Mrs. Beckett: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman raised that matter. I shall come to interest rates and the exchange rate later on. I am looking forward today to hearing from the right hon. Gentleman what the Conservative party proposes that the Government should do—

Mr. Redwood indicated assent.

Mrs. Beckett: I am very pleased to see that. We hope to hear a great deal from the right hon. Gentleman about the policies that his party now supports—because there have been some abrupt and rather surprising changes. When we introduced the competition and spectrum pricing Bills, the right hon. Gentleman attacked policies that his party had broadly supported before the election. That must have come as a surprise to the Leader of the Opposition. Before I had even begun discussions with Jaguar over Government support for a new project, the right hon. Gentleman put the jobs of thousands in Halewood at risk by attempting a crass bit of interference in the negotiations. That, too, was rather awkward for the Leader of the Opposition.

[Mrs. Beckett]

Then there was the debacle over Chancellor Kohl, which would be almost hysterical were it not so serious. A senior member of Her Majesty's Opposition managed to insult both the City of London and the Chancellor of Germany, one of Britain's most important trading partners, in one fell swoop. This time, the Leader of the Opposition had had enough and hauled the right hon. Gentleman publicly over the coals—sorry about the pun. Now there seems to be a public tug of war about economic and monetary union, and whether policy on it will or will not be softened.

Today, in a fascinating article in The Times—it reads a little as if written by Conservative central office, as if preparing the ground for a policy U-turn—the right hon. Gentleman does at last observe that there will be a cost to staying out of EMU. He says that, when dealing with continental companies,

"The British company has to take the exchange rate risk as the pound will continue to fluctuate against the euro".

As I understand it, the right hon. Gentleman will have our companies facing that type of cost for ever, on principle, which does not seem to be in the interests of British business.

The article says:

"The compulsory introduction of the euro in some European countries may change some business views of the balance of advantages and disadvantages of a European currency".

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman intends during his remarks to explain whether, as it appears, his position on that is changing.

While the Opposition are ditching many of the policies on which they fought the most recent general election, we in government are working to deliver on our proposals, despite, not with the benefit of, their legacy. Make no mistake: whatever they say now, and however glowingly they paint the picture, we inherited what was, in many ways, a shambles. We inherited a health service burdened by bureaucracy while struggling to care for the sick, an education system that was failing our children, and an economy with fresh inflationary pressures after years of opportunistic manipulation for short-term political advantage.

When one inherits a mess, it takes time to sort it out, especially after 18 years; but from day one, the Government have been delivering on our promises. We are delivering a new deal for young people, funded by the tax on the windfall gains of the privatised utilities, opposed by both the largest Opposition parties. That new deal is up and running already in pathfinder projects, and will go nationwide before our first year in office is over.

A Low Pay Commission was established, and had its first meeting within 100 days of our taking office. The National Minimum Wage Bill is already through the House of Commons, and the wage should be in place next year.

We are providing more resources for health and education; we have provided £3.8 billion already.

Ours is an impressive record of delivery on our pledges. Moreover, let us not forget that not one bit of it would have been done by the Conservative party or by those on its Back or Front Benches. Now we have—

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Someone has an electrical device that is going off. I am sure that hon. Members are aware that Madam Speaker takes a very dim view of that.

Mr. Bruce: As the Low Pay Commission met so quickly and no doubt will have to come up with a rate every year, will the right hon. Lady tell us what rate she expects for the minimum wage—not least because it has an impact on the Chancellor's Budget?

Mrs. Beckett: No, I am not prepared to speculate about what the recommendations of the Low Pay Commission will be. We set it up as an independent body to do its own research and come to a view and make recommendations, and those recommendations will be before the House and the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) in the not too distant future.

In this Budget, building on the one delivered in July 1997, we are taking the implementation of our pledges further forward for families, for the health service and education, and for the economy.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: I shall continue a little further if I may.

This is a Budget for the long term. It moves us still further from that legacy of short-termism, boom and bust and under-investment. Under the previous Administration, Britain's record of economic instability was one of the worst among the G7 countries. Under the previous Government, Britain suffered the two deepest and longest recessions since the war, separated only by an unsustainable boom. How could industry take a long-term decision when it did not know what to expect from week to week? We are creating a macro-economic framework for long-term stability and investment, giving our companies, at long last, the opportunity to thrive.

We are not only giving the Bank of England a key role in controlling inflation, but working to follow the golden rule that Government borrow only to invest over the economic cycle—a principle of sound public finances that the Tories never even had the vision to contemplate. Moreover, we have launched the code for fiscal stability, which will be given statutory basis in the Finance Bill. That code sets out the requirement for an open, transparent and accountable approach to managing the public finances, which will ensure that fiscal policy continues to be set in Britain's long-term interests.

We have sought to promote stability in tax policy, too.

Mr. Gibb: Am I right in thinking that, in opposition, Labour pledged not to raise taxes when it was elected—and has it now breached that pledge in both Budgets?

Mrs. Beckett: No. We did not give the pledge to which the hon. Gentleman refers. We said very specifically that we would not raise—[Interruption.] Yes, I have read the record. I am very well aware of what we said, and I have no illusion about what it was. We were very clear and careful in what we said and what we promised. We promised not to raise either the standard rate or the higher rate of income tax. We promised to cut VAT on fuel, as we have done, and we promised—

Mr. Gibb: Backtracking.

Mrs. Beckett: No. We were most careful to say on all occasions that of course no Government could rule out making other changes, in various tax allowances and so on. We were determined not to repeat the crass errors of the Conservative party in telling the British people a pack of lies and then complaining when they came home to roost.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): Why is it that, on 20 January 1997, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer said on "Newsnight":

"It is my aim to get the burden down for ordinary people", yet he has increased taxes across the board, which impacts directly and indirectly on such ordinary people? What is the right hon. Lady's answer to that?

Mrs. Beckett: I could not quite hear all of the end of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but I can say to him that, as he pointed out, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made it clear that he wanted to make people on low incomes better off, and that is precisely what we are already doing in this Budget.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Is the right hon. Lady saying that the statement by the then Leader of the Opposition, reported on 21 September 1996 in the Financial Times, that is untrue? Is she saying that the Financial Times has given credence to an untruth?

"We have no plans to increase tax at all",

Mrs. Beckett: My right hon. Friend was being asked about personal taxation. Of course—[Interruption.] What we said about tax before the general election was clear, and the British people completely understood it. We made it absolutely clear that we would not change the rates of income tax. We also made it clear that we would have a windfall tax on the privatised utilities. We made it plain that we would cut VAT on fuel.

Mr. Bercow: Burden.

Mrs. Beckett: No one believes any of this nonsense from the Conservative party, for the simple reason—

Mr. Ruffley: Try reading the facts.

Mrs. Beckett: Yes, I am looking at the facts. No one believes what the Conservatives say, for the simple reason that what they say now about our proposals is as inaccurate as what they said about their own before the 1992 general election.

We have sought to promote stability in tax policy, too. We undertook a major review—

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: I am sorry; I have finished with that point.

We undertook a major review of company taxation and have already introduced reforms that remove the disincentive to invest for the future—the implicit incentive, instead, to pay dividends. By abolishing advance corporation tax, we have simplified company taxes and removed the distortions that affected our international companies.

We have heeded the comments of the business community and excluded all small and medium-sized companies—those with profits below £1.5 million—from the obligation to pay corporation tax by instalments. The main rate of corporation tax will be 30 per cent. and there will be a small companies rate of 20 per cent. Those are the lowest rates since the tax was introduced in 1965—3 per cent. lower than they were under the Conservative party, and with the lowest main rate of any major country. Once the package is fully in place—

Mr. Redwood: To clarify matters for the House, can the right hon. Lady confirm that the Red Books for this and the previous Budget make it clear that, during this Parliament, there will be an increase in business taxation, including utilities tax, of £25,000 million? That is the Treasury figure. Can she confirm it?

Mr. Bercow: Tell her, Gordon.

Mrs. Beckett: I am not familiar with the final figure that the right hon. Gentleman gives, but I am well aware that we are proposing a package of changes in corporate taxation. That package of changes, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is well aware—[Interruption.] Ah; the right hon. Gentleman is including the windfall tax; that is why the figure that he gives is different from that given by most others. All I can say to the right hon. Gentleman is that we are indeed introducing a full package of changes in corporate taxation, which will make the tax system simpler and more stable, and which will encourage investment and long-term development. That is what the Government wish to achieve.

As I said, once the package is fully in place, companies will pay £1.5 billion a year less in tax. Overall, the reform of corporate taxation in this Budget is worth £9 billion to business in present value terms. We have given a commitment not to increase corporation tax rates for the lifetime of this Parliament. That is all excellent news for businesses, and it was welcomed by them. Jeremy Peat of the Royal Bank of Scotland said:

"The promise of a stable corporation tax framework and lower tax rates and enhanced reliefs for small and medium-sized companies . . . are all moves in the right direction."

With the low rates of tax that we shall have in place from April 1999, a business with profits of £500,000 a year will pay £15,000 less in corporation tax than it paid under the previous Government.

Small and medium-sized enterprises that pay dividends will gain a cash-flow advantage of about £1 billion from the abolition of ACT. Small firms will also benefit from accelerated capital allowances for at least another year. As a result, they will pay £300 million less in tax in 1999-2000 and 2000-01. For a typical small company investing about £100,000 in the coming financial year, that will mean £3,150 less in tax for that year.

[Mrs. Beckett]

Because this is a Budget for entrepreneurs, more people with great ideas for business opportunities will be able to turn those ideas into action. Capital gains tax will now encourage investment and enterprise, with a new effective rate of 10 per cent. or less on long-term gains on business assets. Important changes to the enterprise investment scheme and capital gains tax reinvestment relief will stimulate the provision of equity finance for smaller, higher-risk trading companies. That is an important set of fiscal changes for small firms, but we have done more.

For many small firms, the administration associated with paying tax can be very costly. That is why we have announced a new payroll assistance scheme provided by the Inland Revenue and the Contributions Agency. The service will provide one-to-one help for new employers getting to grips with tax, national insurance and benefits. By making it easier and cheaper for small businesses to take on their first employee, it will reduce one of the major barriers to setting up and running a business. It is a straightforward, practical change that should have been made long ago, but the previous Government—who claimed so loudly to be the champion of small business—failed to act in this instance, as in so many other instances.

Mr. Bercow: I am most grateful to the Minister for her courtesy in giving way. Will she take this opportunity to confirm to the House that small companies, many of which are technology or knowledge-based and employ highly paid staff, will face a bigger national insurance burden as a result of this Budget—yes or no?

Mrs. Beckett: Overall, small businesses will benefit from this Budget—as I am sure the hon. Gentleman is perfectly well aware. The changes that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made to national insurance contributions alongside the changes to corporation tax and all the other issues to which I have referred will mean a benefit to small business. That is why small businesses have welcomed the Budget—and obviously the hon. Gentleman wishes that they had not.

Small and medium-sized enterprises are the bedrock of the future growth in jobs and investment upon which we, as a nation, depend. A vibrant SME sector is quite simply vital to the future competitiveness of Britain, and tax changes and simplified regulation can help to promote enterprise.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The Minister is making a very good point about the need to encourage small and medium-sized businesses. Does she acknowledge that, although the operators in the North sea are large multinational companies, many businesses that supply and service those industries are small and medium-sized? Does she agree that an adverse change in the regime when oil prices are at an all-time low could threaten both the home market and export opportunities for those businesses?

Mrs. Beckett: Those small businesses, like others, will benefit from the overall package in the Budget. The hon. Gentleman makes a different point about the review of taxation in the North sea. He is well aware that my right hon. Friend is continuing to examine that matter. My right hon. Friend has heard the hon. Gentleman, and we shall have his observations at the back of our minds when we consider the overall regime for the North sea.

Mr. Ian Bruce rose—

Mrs. Beckett: I have given way once to the hon. Gentleman and I am beginning to be concerned about time. If he does not mind, I shall make a little more progress.

Those changes are only part of our aim to create a more entrepreneurial culture—a culture in which those who succeed in enterprise are praised and where failure does not stop people trying again. Risk taking, innovation and taking a long-term view are crucial elements of a successful economy today, and we want to encourage them. The tax measures and the initiatives to support entrepreneurs will help to create a more enterprising Britain. Other actions that we have taken in my Department—from the new Competition Bill, to a major review of corporate governance and company law, to an important shake-up of the foresight process—are part of our drive to foster an innovative economy.

This Budget, too, will support innovation and research and development. It is increasingly recognised in the business community that innovation must be a continual process, taking place throughout the economy and involving every business and every employee. All types of innovative activities have a role to play, but there is an increasing premium on the successful exploitation of new technology—something that the previous Government either did not understand or did not seem to care about.

Again, the previous Government's legacy speaks for itself. Total expenditure on research and development as a proportion of gross domestic product has fallen to below 2 per cent. for the first time in many years. The United Kingdom now ranks fifth among the G7 countries in terms of total business enterprise R and D, down from third in 1981. The latest figures released yesterday suggest that, in 1996, civil R and D spending fell as a proportion of GDP. Our R and D scoreboard shows that larger United Kingdom firms spend significantly less on R and D than their overseas counterparts. Fewer than half of all manufacturing SMEs employ qualified scientists and engineers.

The Government are determined to improve Britain's investment in research and development—of course, that is not exactly the same as innovation, but it is an important component. The framework that we have put in place to promote stability and long-termism is the seedbed upon which innovation can bloom. With the Budget papers, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and I have launched a national consultation—in a document entitled "Innovating for the Future—Investing in R&D"—on how we can improve our R and D performance.

It will be a wide-ranging review. It will cover all aspects of the business environment that affect R and D, including sources of finance, the accounting treatment of intangible assets, the rules protecting intellectual property, how management affects firms' propensity to innovate, and access to technology. We must examine what other countries are doing in areas such as tax incentives for

R and D, to see whether we can apply any lessons here. We also want to ensure that our review reflects the views of business, investors, employees and outside experts, so we have announced a consultation period lasting until the end of June 1998. The results of that consultation will influence the competitiveness White Paper that I plan to publish in the autumn, as well as the preparations for the next Budget.

Our commitment to R and D and innovation also lies behind the announcement of a new university challenge fund to encourage the commercial exploitation of university research. Under that scheme—which will create £50 million in venture capital—universities will be able to compete for funding provided by the Government in partnership with the Wellcome Trust and the Gatsby Trust. Challenge winners will be expected to lever in additional funds in partnership with the private sector. The Government are also considering several other initiatives designed to promote smaller high-tech businesses, where some of the most exciting and productive R and D is carried out. For example, we are consulting on ways of attracting experienced managers to small firms through equity-based remuneration schemes. We are determined to improve the United Kingdom's performance, and this Budget marks the start.

This is a Budget for business—all business. However, when looking at the climate for British business today, we cannot and do not overlook the fact that the level of sterling—particularly against the major continental currencies—is causing difficulty and concern for some companies. Sterling has of course appreciated by much less against the dollar, so with whom one trades and in what currencies matters a great deal.

We must look at the steps taken by other countries that have faced similar problems in the past. For example, the Germans and the Japanese sought competitiveness through a drive for quality and through the pursuit of less price-sensitive markets. Those approaches lie in the hands of business, although the drive to compete on quality, high standards and high added value is part of what sharply distinguishes this Government's approach to competitiveness from the sweatshop mentality of our predecessors. Those same predecessors, now the Opposition, complain continually that there must be further action that the Government can take, and call on us to take it.

Let me at once remind the House that this Government's aim is to have a stable but competitive exchange rate. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made it plain in his Budget speech that he understands and shares the anxieties, in particular, of exporters.

What are the steps that the Opposition are calling on the Government to take? They complain that placing interest rates in the hands of the Bank of England means that the Chancellor himself no longer decides their level. Are they planning to reverse that step—even though it has led to a drop in long-term interest rates? A comment by the right hon. Member for Wokingham in an article this weekend suggested that he did indeed think that that step should be reversed. I hope that he will tell us whether that is the case.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs) rose—

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman will have to forgive me. I am interested in knowing the policies of right hon. and hon. Members on his Front Bench.

The present level of interest rates—one of the factors that will influence the exchange rate—is itself a direct result of the Conservatives' politically driven refusal to put up interest rates to tackle inflationary pressures just before the general election. The Opposition's present stance suggests that they would again take Britain on the roller-coaster of boom and bust that cost so many jobs and homes in the 1980s and early 1990s.

How else could we ease pressure on the exchange rate? Classically, by fiscal means. That means either a tight rein on public expenditure or higher taxes, or a mixture of the two. We have a tight rein on public spending—a very tight rein. Both in July and last week the Chancellor tightened the fiscal stance, and he does not believe that it needs to be tightened further.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the right hon. Lady accept that although the fiscal stance has been tightened a little, the tightening in the previous Budget was completely wrongly targeted, in that it attacked savings rather than attacking expenditure by the public? That is the reason for the present state of the economy.

Mrs. Beckett: No, my right hon. Friend did not attack savings, either in his previous Budget or in this one. As for an inadequate tightening of the public finances, I think that 2 per cent. of GDP is an extremely adequate tightening of the public finances.

If the Opposition think that the fiscal stance with regard to public expenditure should be tightened more, as the hon. Gentleman has just implied, that presumably means that they oppose the extra priority that we have given to health and education, the release of capital receipts for house building and repair, the new involvement in transport, the help to pensioners for heating bills and the help for families.

Mr. Butterfill indicated dissent.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Although he says that we should be doing more to tighten the fiscal stance, when it comes to saying what we should not be doing, he is silent.

What about taxes? The Opposition have made many claims that we are increasing tax on business, but they oppose all those taxes, so what are they calling for—higher VAT? We know that they wanted 17.5 per cent. VAT on fuel, and were embarrassingly defeated following a revolt among their own Back Benchers, among others.

The shadow Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Wokingham, wrote in an article in The Birmingham Post on 20 March that we had "an overheating consumer side of the economy . . . Labour talk about 'hard choices', but they don't make them."

I look forward to hearing from the right hon. Gentleman how he proposes that pressure on consumption should be tightened.

Are the Conservatives seeking higher personal taxation, or just less for education, health, welfare or transport? It is hard to avoid the conclusion that they are in opposition just as they were in government—incompetent, short-sighted and irresponsible. Neither their policies nor their numbers added up then, and they clearly do not now.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe): The right hon. Lady says that we were politically irresponsible. Our measures are producing an inflation rate of 2.6 per cent. She says of the present strong exchange rate that it is entirely a matter for the Governor of the Bank of England, but does she not accept that the exchange rate will not begin to ease until the markets expect that the next movement of interest rates will be downwards? Does she further accept that the narrative that she has just given explains why the Chancellor's fiscal policy will do absolutely nothing to create the climate in which that movement might begin? The Chancellor has raised taxes on business and on savings, and he has done so for populist reasons, because as she has just revealed, the Government think that short-term political reasons rule out taking any other step.

[Mr. Kenneth Clarke]

Mrs. Beckett: For the right hon. and learned Gentleman to complain about people taking decisions for short-term political reasons is truly a case of the pot attempting to call the kettle black. Everything that he has said about the present position in the economy is certainly not due to the inheritance that he left us, which left the country in a position of some instability. My right hon. Friend is taking steps to redress that, and those steps will, I believe, work in the longer term.

By promoting stability and enterprise, the Budget helps to underpin the three pillars upon which our future competitiveness is based: strong markets, modern companies and an enterprising nation. Open and fair markets are good for business as well as for the consumer. Bad regulation should not hold them back. The Budget cuts the burden of red tape on large and small firms, freeing them to compete and to prosper.

By simplifying tax, reducing compliance costs and recognising the importance of R and D and innovation, the Budget works to build a framework in which innovative modern companies can emerge. It is an important step to creating an enterprising nation that encourages entrepreneurs, backs good ideas and is alive to the opportunities of the future.

It is also a Budget built on partnership. An important element in that partnership is that we have a Budget combining fairness with economic efficiency, a Budget that is alive to business needs and to the new challenges and opportunities that business faces. That is how it has been received.

Dr. Andrew Sentence of BA called the Budget "cautious and responsible." The British Chambers of Commerce said that it was "a valuable Budget for enterprise and employment."

Even Tim Congdon of Lombard Street Research said:

"On balance this is an impressive Budget. If the Chancellor continues in this mode, Britain will have a strong economy in the early years of the next century."

Above all, it is a Budget for a new nation—a new Britain. It delivers a great deal for those out of work, and it moves us to a position where work pays. Taken together with the minimum wage, it will transform the prospects for many families in or at present out of work. It transforms the prospects of mothers who have not been able to work because of the lack of affordable child care; they will have increased opportunities to take work.

The Budget makes it easier—and cheaper—for firms to take on more employees, especially for smaller firms. The improvements to national insurance will be a great boost to them.

Mr. Gibb rose—

Mrs. Beckett: I am sorry—I am almost finished.

As the Forum of Private Business commented:

"Cutting the cost through cutting employers national insurance on the lowest paid workers is a good way of encouraging small firms to take people on."

This Budget is ambitious because we are ambitious for Britain. It had a widespread welcome. The Confederation of British Industry welcomed it, saying that it was

"encouraged by the overall fiscal balance and the prudent approach to public spending together with the continued control of public borrowing."

However, there was one endorsement that I found particularly interesting. I thought that in view of the keen interest of the right hon. Member for Wokingham in all things German, he might like to be reminded of some of the comments of the German press.

Bild Zeitung, the largest-circulation paper in Europe, in an editorial on the UK Budget headed "Great!", commented:

"Britain was in the lead when industrialisation began. Germany took a hundred years to catch up. Now the British are dashing away again."

Handelsblatt described it as a "complete success".

A good press is always nice, but what matters is not what newspapers or pundits say a few days after a Budget. It is whether our strategy improves Britain's competitiveness in the long term that really counts, and whether we use the fruits of that success to build a fairer and better country.

This is a Budget for a new nation—a nation that fosters ambition and enterprise at the same time as valuing fairness; a nation that is as innovating as it is caring; a nation where each of us works for the good of all. It is a Budget to stimulate and support all who are ambitious for our country and ambitious for themselves and their families. It is the Budget that Britain needs.

5.20 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): New speech writer, new Labour, but I think that we need a change of script. Three deutschmarks six pfennigs to the pound; that is the truth today as we meet to debate the plight of manufacturing industry. The Chancellor's policy is hurting, but it certainly is not working. Week by week, we see imports up, sterling up and consumer spending up. Week by week, we see exports down, manufacturing output down and savings down. That is the very opposite of what the Chancellor sought when he was in opposition, full of good ideas but with no responsibilities.

The Chancellor's forecast shows us that there will be much more of the same gloomy outturn. He states in his Red Book that, over the year ahead, imports will surge; I fear that the right hon. Gentleman is right. He tells us that exports will come under pressure; again, I fear that he is right. He says that manufacturing industry will come under severe pressure from a strong pound; he is undoubtedly right. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that savings will fall and that consumer spending will continue to increase.

What does the President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry tell us about all this? She says that business should be grateful because there is a long-term framework for business taxation. Well, business has stability in the plans for ever-higher business taxes. I see no reason for gratitude when business will have to pay so much more over the next three years of this Labour Government.

The right hon. Lady then tells us that we should feel grateful because there is a long-term framework for monetary policy and sterling. That, she says, is bringing stability. The stability which it is bringing so far is that day by day, week by week, the value of sterling goes up against the currencies of some of our major competitors on the continent, making it extremely difficult—ever more difficult—for exporters. The right hon. Lady then tells us—

The Minister for Science, Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): What would the Opposition do?

Mr. Redwood: The Minister wants to know what we, the Opposition, would do in power. I shall tell him in a moment. I wish first to finish my analysis of the President of the Board of Trade's extraordinary statement that the long-term framework is to be welcomed and that it is delivering stability. It is not delivering stability and it is certainly not welcome to manufacturers.

There is no stability in the exchange rate. The right hon. Lady should watch it: the rate is going up day by day. She should understand that, as a result, business cannot adjust at the necessary pace. The right hon. Lady tells manufacturing business, which has done a great deal to raise its productivity and efficiency over many years, that it must now keep up with a devaluation of the deutschmark and the franc of one third over a period of 18 months. Good, efficient businesses cannot achieve that pace of adjustment in that short a time frame because they were already trying extremely hard to make good products at a commercial price. The right hon. Lady should understand that things are not well.

The Government ask the Opposition for ideas on how they could get out of a mess of their own creating. The Opposition are not short of ideas on how pressures could be alleviated or removed. I shall give the impatient President of the Board of Trade and the Chancellor of the Exchequer the benefit of our advice. First, the Chancellor should promote savings; he should not undermine them. When there is a danger that a consumer boom will get out of control, the right hon. Gentleman should be encouraging people to save rather than to spend. Instead, he threatens to remove the tax relief from personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts. He makes a modest U-turn, but he leaves a system of savings taxation less favourable than the one he found, instead of making it more generous, which would have been the right response at this stage of the cycle.

More important, the Chancellor completely undermines pension saving by a huge, swingeing tax on people's pension prudence. That is a great disincentive for more people to come out of a state pension scheme to set up their own savings funds for their retirement. The Chancellor should be promoting saving for retirement now, not undermining it.

Next, the Chancellor should remove the burden of extra taxes on manufacturing businesses, which will bear the brunt of many of the taxes in his two Budgets to date. They will pay the bulk of the huge sum that I mentioned in my exchanges with the President of the Board of Trade. I noticed that she did not deny the figure that I put into the record—the £25,000 million of additional taxation that is the result, for this Parliament, of the Chancellor's Budget efforts so far. We have the impact on business of the windfall tax, the pensions tax, corporation tax changes and all the other back-door stealth taxes by which the right hon. Gentleman is hitting business activity and motoring.

Mr. Butterfill: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Red Book shows not merely that our taxes are increasing but that the proportion of gross domestic product taken in taxes—that is the important factor—will rise every year for the lifetime of this Parliament?

Mr. Redwood: That is right. My hon. Friend makes an extremely powerful point. We have a Chancellor who is out to tax people heavily, especially business. I notice that there is silence from on the Government Front Bench, because they know that what we say is true. The figures are in the Red Book. We have not invented them; those we have extracted them from a rather complicated document in which they were well concealed. They were there, however.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that the Labour party has always said that it is against people in business who are successful subsidising the low payers? Has my right hon. Friend noticed also that national insurance changes mean that those who pay their staff good, high wages are subsidising those who pay low wages? I thought that the Labour party was against that sort of thing.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. He might discover that there is a division of opinion between the President of the Board of Trade and her Department of Trade and Industry Ministers on the one hand and the Chancellor on the other. The Chancellor is trying to make it cheaper to employ people on lower income levels, whereas the President of the Board of Trade and her colleagues are trying to make it dearer. That is the purpose of the national minimum wage and the likely pay awards which will result. I shall come to that tension a little later.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush): In the event of a future Conservative Government, would the right hon. Gentleman repeal our national minimum wage legislation?

Mr. Redwood: I have often been asked that question. Labour Members will have to restrain their impatience. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I will come to a decision nearer the time when we write our manifesto, on which of the many bad and damaging Government measures we are able to offer immediate relief. It would be foolish to set out now which of the large list of measures that we would like to repeal we shall definitely be able to repeal. We shall take a sensible judgment at the time. In the meantime, we shall offer strong opposition to the items that we think are wrong, in the hope that the

[Mr. Redwood]

Government, which have about another three years ahead of them before we hope to displace them, will listen to our arguments in the interests of better national success.

It is a great pity that the Chancellor did not work out last year in his first Budget the consequences for manufacturing. I warned then, with my right hon. Friends, that manufacturers and savers would take the hit of his first Budget. Now the damage is becoming visible even to the Treasury when we read the small print in the Red Book.

Earlier this week, I was passed comments from the British Leather Confederation. It set out what this Budget and the previous one mean to a manufacturing sector. It is one of many that I could have chosen. I am told in the confederation's communication that, in the past six months, two of the largest tanneries in the United Kingdom have closed. Even the most successful companies in the industry have been losing export business and shedding labour.

Another example which is given in the letter is that one tannery had more than 70 per cent. of its output exported, but that had been slashed to 30 per cent. and might well fall further. Those are the difficulties faced by individual industries.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The right hon. Gentleman may well go on about tanning, after the way in which the Conservative party was tanned last year.

The right hon. Gentleman is not dealing with the point that he raised at the opening of his speech, which is that the pound is overvalued. None of the piddling measures that he has given us will have any effect on the valuation of sterling. Will he tell us what he would do to get the pound down? What was the advice that he gave to the then Government from 1979 to 1982 and from 1989 to 1992, when we were in a similar situation?

Mr. Redwood: I was not a great fan of the exchange rate mechanism in the latter period to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I was much in favour of the then Chancellor intervening and securing lower interest rates at that stage because of the damage that the then rates were undoubtedly doing. We learned from that experience. The policy was recommended by the Labour party in opposition as well as by my right hon. Friends. We hoped that this Government might have learnt from it as well.

A collective decision was taken by the House, with the Labour and Liberal parties in full support. It is—[Interruption.] The Chancellor laughs. We are talking about the only economic policy that the Conservative Government followed that the right hon. Gentleman supported. He supported ERM and therefore must have had some responsibilities for the consequences. It was a good example of how at that point it would have been better to have left earlier, and to have had lower interest rates earlier, to avoid some of the damage.

The Chancellor is underestimating the impact of a strong policy of promoting saving. If we were successful in promoting a lot of saving, it would take some of the heat out of the economy, and the adjustment through sterling and interest rates would not have to be so strong on the manufacturing sector. He should also remember that my right hon. Friends and I opposed his idea of giving away the power to settle interest rates which he thinks are correct for British manufacturing industry. That is another part of the problem.

I do not blame the Governor of the Bank of England. Given the awful Budgets that the Chancellor has announced, the Bank of England has had no choice but to increase interest rates. It would have been much better if more of the strain of adjustment had been taken in the Chancellor's Budgets instead of in interest rates. Labour Members say that that must mean higher taxes; it means higher saving. If the savings ratio were not plummeting under the Chancellor's proposals, there would not be so much strain on the exchange rate and the interest rate.

Just look at the damage forecast by the Chancellor. When the Conservatives left office in 1997, the Labour Government inherited a £4,500 million trade surplus. Their forecasts say that next year there will be a £6,500 million trade deficit. The price of Labour so far, on their numbers, is an £11,000 million plunge into the red on our trade account. When we left office, people were saving 11 per cent. of the nation's income. The Government's forecast for next year is that it will be only 9.5 per cent. The price of this Chancellor is a one-sixth reduction in savings as a proportion of national income.

Meanwhile, the President of the Board of Trade sits smugly in her grace-and-favour apartment and does nothing to stand up for British manufacturers, British exporters or British savers. When I asked her to defend the £25,000 million tax hit on British business over the lifetime of this Parliament, she had the audacity to tell me, "Well, the rate of corporation tax is down." People are not interested just in the rate of corporation tax. They want to know how much in total they will pay, and, in total, business will pay a great deal more tax because of this Chancellor.

Government figures show that business will pay £4,600 million more corporation tax as a result of the changes. I have Inland Revenue press release No. 9. It shows modest reductions to business because of the drop in the rate to 30 per cent. However, it then shows much bigger increases because of the change to instalments and the abolition of advance corporation tax. The overall net Exchequer effect is £1,000 million in 1999, £1,300 million in 2000–01, and £2,200 million—£2.2 billion—in 2001–02. That is a massive £4,600 million increase, from 1998 to 2002.

If that were not enough, there is Inland Revenue press release No. 6—one on which the Chancellor did not dwell much in his statement—about much greater taxation of company cars and car fuel.

We have Inland Revenue press release No. 12, "Taxation of Income from Property", with a £50 million one-off increase in tax. We have Inland Revenue press release No. 15, "Formal Consultation on the North Sea Fiscal Regime". Will the Chancellor promise the House today that, as a result of that review, there will be no increase in oil taxation? I shall give way to him if he wishes to confirm or deny that. The fact that the Chancellor will not intervene shows that the Government intend to up oil tax as a result of Inland Revenue press release No. 15. We then have Inland Revenue press release No. 30, which is about introducing tax on construction workers. Again, that means that more tax will be imposed.

Only the President of the Board of Trade could not have noticed that all that represented a series of tax rises. Can she really believe that the Chancellor has cut business tax? How does she explain the fact that business will be so much worse off following the Chancellor's Budget? Or does she wish to leave the House with a misleading impression on this matter?

Of course, Labour want the headline "Corporation Tax Rate Down", yet companies pay more. Labour wants the headline "Advance Corporation Tax Abolished". It all means that companies will pay more corporation tax as a result of the Budget.

When is a tax cut not a tax cut? When it comes from the present Chancellor. It was a miserable Budget. It was a miserable speech delivered in a miserable voice for a miserable purpose: taxing, taxing and taxing again. When the Chancellor was in opposition, he was Mr. Post-neo-classical-endogenous-growth-theory. We all loved that one and would like him to play it again. Now that he is in government, he might still be endogenous, but he is forgetting the growth. We now see endogenous mess theory.

I have not always thought that Matthew Parris observed things entirely accurately, but I was in total agreement with him when he said, after the Budget:

"Tony Blair"

looked

"so dreadful . . . Sallow and drawn, his face puckered by anxiety and a cartoon frown".

It is no wonder the Prime Minister and the Chancellor have fallen out, because the Chancellor has not lived up to his own star billing. His Budget had to be watered down by an apprehensive Prime Minister.

It was a bits-and-pieces Budget with little left alone, but little changed decisively for the better. It is true that there were a couple of welcome U-turns. I see that the Chancellor needs to be cheered up. We are delighted that he gave in over existing personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts, but he should not have mugged them in the first place. The dirty deed said then now does damage that lingers on. It puts people off saving. It makes them more worried than they should be about saving, because they can never be sure what the Government will do to their existing saving plans.

We are glad that small businesses will be let off some of the extra corporation tax that the Chancellor had planned to heap on them. They do not have to be grateful for relief from an imposition that they should never have had to face. It does not make them better off than they would have been under a Conservative Government. It just means that they have been relieved of some of the burden that other businesses have to suffer under a Labour Government. It is a great pity that the Chancellor will not do the same for bigger businesses, especially for manufacturers caught by high sterling.

The Chancellor has warned that growth will falter if wages go up too fast. I agree that there is a danger that wages going up too fast could do damage. He may be right. Why, then, is the President of the Board of Trade passing legislation to make wages go up faster? Why can the two of them not agree a rate now, in a democratic and civil way, and tell the House before the legislation is completed? It is most extraordinary to put a measure through both Houses recommending a minimum wage and not tell anyone in the House of Commons or the other place what that minimum rate will be. That rate will have huge consequences for the Chancellor's Budget and for the cost of public services and public borrowing. As the Chancellor himself admits, it will have big consequences in due course for the rate of growth and inflation—but he and the President of the Board of Trade cannot agree the rate, so we all have to wait while they sort out their disagreements.

The Chancellor's views are clear. We read in the press, courtesy of his spin doctor, that he wants a low rate, probably below £3.50 an hour. In the Red Book he says clearly:

"Responsible pay bargaining, combined with the Government's welfare to work measures, would allow faster growth and higher levels of employment over the next few years."

I welcome that statement. It shows that the Chancellor has understood that, if the Government boost wages too much, even for the best of reasons, it will be destructive of the very jobs that they need to give hope to people with few skills, and the younger people who need jobs. It would be a cruel policy. Yet the Chancellor cannot persuade his colleagues in the Cabinet to come straight out with a sensible rate from his point of view and end the tension around the Cabinet table.

Mr. Butterfill: Would it not also be profoundly inflationary, thereby ensuring that interest rates would have to remain high, and the pound would remain uncompetitive?

Mr. Redwood: It would certainly mean that interest rates would have to remain high or go higher if the Government lose control of wage settlements. I am sure that, privately, the Chancellor is apprehensive about that. It is important, therefore, that he gets some sense into his colleagues over their wages policy.

Mr. Bercow: My right hon. Friend just informed us of the Chancellor's view about the potentially damaging impact of a high minimum wage. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Chancellor's view is in conflict with that of the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), whose McCartney curve tells us that a higher minimum wage is good for the economy because it will boost consumer expenditure? Is that another example of the splits in the Government?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend has put his finger on an important point. His example also shows a breakdown of collective responsibility. On this occasion, the Chancellor is right. He is clearly the senior Minister in the argument; he should instruct the Minister of State that the official Government line is that higher wage settlements are unhelpful, and that a realistic minimum wage is crucial to the attempt to retain some control over wage settlements.

If the President of the Board of Trade introduces a minimum wage that really does lift wages at the bottom, everyone will want a pay rise to protect differentials. I hear that members of the Cabinet, including the right hon. Lady, wish to retain their differentials over junior Ministers. If people on £100,000-a-year packages want to keep their differentials over others who are fairly well paid, surely people on £15,000 or £20,000 a year will want the same, and they will have a better case. The Chancellor must be very worried that he will have to face not just the cost of rises at the bottom of the income scale, but the understandable request of many higher up the income scale for a similar percentage increase in their pay, with all the consequences that he identified.

[Mr. Redwood]

Both the Chancellor and the Prime Minister say that we need flexible labour markets to compete successfully. The Confederation of British Industry agrees, and, again, I find myself in agreement with the Chancellor. Why, then, is the President of the Board of Trade doing all that she can to make our labour markets less flexible? When will she make up her mind about compulsory union recognition? Will she give in to the union bosses, and say that 50 per cent. of those voting should decide the issue, or will she be more cautious and leave it at 50 per cent. of the work force?

It will be a defining moment for the right hon. Lady when her left-wing friends discover whether there is any of the old crusader remaining in her, or whether she is selling out. Her silence again today on that crucial issue speaks volumes about her unhappiness in this Government of the spin doctors, by the spin doctors, for the spin doctors.

The Chancellor, the great meddler, is en route to becoming the great betrayer. When his party was in opposition, he huddled in the House of Commons Library, ransacking the statistics for any bad figure that he could alight on. That would make his day: it was being so miserable that kept him going. It is normal for Ministers to whistle a happy tune, even if they are whistling in the dark. Now, it seems, this dour Chancellor sits in the Treasury, out of sight, still dissecting every statistic and, like Jeremiah, rubbing his hands at every piece of bad news.

The Chancellor warns us that, if we drink, it is bad for us, so he will tax it. He warns us that, if we drive, it is bad for the environment, so he will tax it. He tells us that, if we save for the future, it is bad for social justice, so he will tax it. He tells businesses that, if they make profits, it is bad for inflation, so he taxes that too.

Of course all Governments must impose some taxes, but sensible Governments do not enjoy imposing them. The only point at which the Chancellor cheered up during my speech was when I was talking about higher taxes: he obviously gets a kick out of them. Nor do a sensible Government moralise over every tax that they do impose. This Government like taxing. They enjoy the sense of power that it gives them. They would tax more and more if they thought that they could get away with it, and they use taxes to meddle endlessly in our lives and those of our businesses.

Even when it comes to reforming welfare, it is industry that is asked to do the work. I do not believe that business can cope easily with working out and implementing family tax credits. People in hard-pressed companies do not want to become a different kind of Child Support Agency, and to make all the inquiries that they would need to make to meet the Chancellor's requirements.

The bottom line of this Budget, added to the Government's first Budget, is that we are all worse off. Companies are much worse off; families with mortgages and cars are worse off; people relying on pension savings are worse off. The typical family is more than £1,100 a year worse off following the five mortgage rate rises, the cut in mortgage interest relief at source—the Chancellor hangs his head in shame, as well he may, but this is all true—the petrol taxes that he has increased, and the pensions tax.

Less than a year ago, in that golden age, a litre of petrol cost 54.9p in a good garage. Today, it costs 65.9p, despite a big drop in the oil price. That is all the Chancellor's own work. He does not know, because he now has his tank filled on the firm, but if he had to go out and fill his own tank he would find out. He is lucky that we no longer hear about the price of a gallon, because he has put that up by a massive 40p.

I am told by those who smoke that last May a packet of 20 cigarettes cost around £2.95. Today, it costs £3.35. Again, that is all the Chancellor's own work. Today, a young person saving for a pension must put aside £120 a month, while £100 did the job last May. That is a huge increase in the cost of taking a prudent view of the future and wishing to make provision.

The Budget sandbags the farmer as well as the industrialist. Labour moves seamlessly from having high sterling to banning T-bone steaks. It is determined to destroy rural businesses. [Laughter.] I am glad that Labour Members find that amusing. The butchers to whom I have spoken do not find the ban on T-bone steaks at all amusing. It has cut away a piece of their business when they are already under pressure. Labour Members representing rural areas should listen to what businesses are saying in those areas.

What do villages say about Labour? The pharmacist fears for his business as the Competition Bill threatens to knock his prices. The butcher struggles to stay out of gaol when his customers demand beef on the bone. The newsagent wants to know if Labour Members are going to abolish the newspaper boy. The publican can get no sense out of the Department of Trade and Industry on what business he can do with the brewer under the new competition measures that the right hon. Lady proposes. The farmer whose income has already been halved faces an even grimmer year with high sterling and high petrol prices.

Country dwellers need their cars, and they are particularly hard hit by the petrol price rise. The Chancellor's £50 million sop for regional transport will do little to help. In his haste to attack car owners and manufacturers, he appears not to have understood the difference between engine size and fuel omissions, and is still in a muddle about exactly how to raise all the money that he wants. And what about the tax on new cars which was announced in a press release in January? The Leader of the House told the Opposition that it would appear in the Budget, but it has not—yet manufacturers have been told by letter that it will apply.

That is the reality of Labour government—tax by stealth; no stability, just permanent uncertainty. Then we are all meant to feel grateful because income tax rates have not gone up. Under the Conservatives, they used to come down Budget by Budget. The standard rate fell from 33p in the pound to 23p. Why should anyone feel better as a result of this Budget, which contained no such welcome change?

The exporter struggling with the pound at DM3.06 still has to struggle after the Budget, and cannot now look forward to a change of policy: he has no hope. The manufacturer struggling against ever-cheaper foreign goods now knows that he must cut his operations, as the Government have nothing to offer him. The unskilled person seeking a job knows that he must hurry before the minimum wage starts to price people out of work, according to the Chancellor's own statements. The home owner knows that the five mortgage rate rises are here to stay, and that he may be in for more. The saver knows that saving for pensions will remain a dearer business. Labour is not making it better; it has made it worse. Labour is bad for business.

The media strategy of the Budget was handled better than the economic strategy. That is not good but dangerous, and people should not be taken in by the weeks of bombardment threatening every industry and individual in sight with higher taxes. They will discover that some will be spared, while some will face the ordeal of consultation before the extra taxes are imposed. There have been threats to the house building industry, threats to the sand and gravel industry, threats to the oil industry, threats to savers, threats to home owners and threats to car owners. There are to be all sorts of extra taxes, and people do not feel especially grateful that some of them have been dropped—at least temporarily—from the Chancellor's Budget strategy.

We should not feel grateful for what the Chancellor has not done; we should look at what he has done. We should remember what he said in opposition about manufacturing and the importance of industry. In a chapter of his book "Where There is Greed", entitled "Manufacture or Die", he wrote:

"It is our ability to produce manufactured goods and compete in our own and in world markets that is central to our industrial and economic performance".

Those are fine words, but he has not lived up to any of them. The very people whom he praised in that book now bear the brunt of his Budgets and his failed strategy.

The Chancellor says that he gave the Bank of England its independence so that it would be free to control inflation, that high sterling is the Bank's problem, and that he has done his bit. He certainly has: his Budgets and his refusal to take a Chancellor's responsibility for the pound are destroying exports, manufacturing and agriculture, and damaging savings and jobs. Far from being the Chancellor for manufacturing, savings and investment, he will go down as the Chancellor who stood by as people were laid off and factories were closed. The main memory from this Budget will be of a Government who do not care about industry at all.

5.49 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton–under–Lyne): The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) says that we are worse off as a result of the Budget. I do not know how often he visits his constituency at weekends, but that is not the position as I see it. People think that this is not a bad Budget—they have not got everything that they wanted, but that is the nature of life. This is certainly a reforming Budget. As with all major reforms, it will take time before we are able to assess its full impact and the extent of changes to the conduct of our economic affairs.

The highlight of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's work is undoubtedly the welfare-to-work programme. In my constituency, I have frequently met unemployed young men who live next door to houses where the windows are rotten and the doors are falling off. Our inability to bring together people who want to work and jobs that need doing, and our failure to address what is being done and what needs to be done, is disgraceful.

People spend a great deal of money to go out to work. It was not always an expensive business: when the cotton industry was the mainstay in my constituency, we had one of the highest levels of working women in any industrialised country, and they did not need encouragement to work. The work was down the road, earning a living cost hardly anything, grandmothers and aunts looked after children, there were no transport costs and income tax was only for the better off. Those are now large expenditures that, together with the tax-benefit mismatch, have great disincentive effect.

Fundamental changes have been necessary for a long time. Ideally, transport costs, which are a major expense, would be tax deductible, but problems are associated with that. Child care allowance is an acknowledgement of work-related expenditure and, although I am not sure that I understand the way in which child care centres will be set up and accounted for, I applaud my right hon. Friend's determination to implement the necessary changes.

When I was at the Treasury, the replacement of child tax allowance with child benefit recognised the extra cost of raising a family and their reduced taxable capacity. We acknowledge taxable capacity to only a limited extent, such as in working tools allowance and some working clothing allowances. Income tax allowance did not benefit parents who did not pay income tax, but for once the two major parties agreed on a fundamental issue and changed tax allowance to a benefit. The Government and the Opposition reached a sensible decision together, and there was 20 years of agreement on it. I wish that such long-term agreement was more frequent: it should be the basis for everything other than a one-Administration reform that the Opposition intend to repeal. Such reforms are a disgraceful waste of time and effort and should be avoided wherever possible. Although I understand the needs of the Revenue, I support the recognition of the cost of child rearing.

The Government took office accepting that manufacturing industry faces problems, and I had hoped that they would help by improving capital allowances and making the pound competitive. Figures in the Red Book suggest that the future does not look good. The forecast growth in manufacturing output is 0 per cent. to 0.5 per cent for 1998, against an increase in gross domestic product of 2 per cent. to 2.5 per cent; 1 per cent. to 1.5 per cent. for 1999, and 2.25 per cent. to 2.5 per cent. for 2000. The conjunction of those figures with forecast balances of payments of minus £6.5 million for 1998, minus £6.75 billion for 1999 and minus £6.5 billion for 2000 shows the importance of manufacturing industry.

Manufacturing industry is important not for the number of people it employs, but for the wealth it creates and for its foreign earnings. I welcome improved capital allowances and the 40 per cent. rate, although I am sorry that we have not continued with the short-term capital allowances. I had hoped that the rate would be 60 per cent., which would have been worth while in the light of the difficulties that manufacturing industry faces with the high pound and high interest.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham must have forgotten the wanton damage that the previous Government did with their $2.40 pound and their

[Mr. Robert Sheldon]

17 per cent. interest rates. I shall never forget it, because more than 30 per cent. of the firms in my constituency closed their doors in two years. Germany and Japan—indeed, every country in the world—have similar medium-tech and high-tech firms. The sacrificing of manufacturing industry on the altar of dogma was disgraceful, and the previous Government should never be forgiven for it. Current exchange rates and interest rates are nowhere near such levels, but service industries are able to ride them out, which is why GDP is still increasing respectably. Manufacturing industry has suffered most. Having given control of interest rates to the Bank of England, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has to take account of their requirements in the running of the economy. His Budget strategy is bound to be limited by that, and he will therefore be judged not so much on demand management, as he would have been in the past, but on the important tax and other measures that he has introduced.

The quickest way to reduce unemployment is through aggregate demand, but that is not easily open to the Chancellor. However, my right hon. Friend's redistributive approach is clear, and I look forward to it featuring prominently in future decisions.

How does the Budget fit in with the forthcoming single European currency? The consequences of our self-exclusion from monetary union cause me great unease. Britain is the only major country that will not participate. Sweden, Denmark and Greece have the luxury of not joining, because they would not influence the shape of the union to any important extent, whenever they joined.

Britain is in a different position. If we had joined at the outset, we could have made an important contribution to the development of economic and monetary union. Latecomers to institutions are at a serious disadvantage in determining rules and outcomes. Sweden, Denmark and Greece would not have affected the rules, but Britain could and would have done. We have failed to join institutions at the outset again and again.

I should have wished ardently for a postponement of EMU, which is too precipitous. It will take place, and we should have placed ourselves where the action is. There may be problems with the euro. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was well received in York on Saturday. He explained what needed to change in the European Union. His advice would more likely be taken to heart if we were participating members of the single currency. The difficulties facing the participant countries are obvious. We should not underestimate the will to make changes within the European Union to deal with problems as they arise. There may be some mush and fumble, but problems will be dealt with, because member countries will not want to admit defeat and face the enormous turmoil that the collapse of the single currency would create.

We may not like some of the solutions, and I am worried that we shall not be properly involved in the initial decisions or in the subsequent changes that will affect us. Historically, we have always paid a price for our hesitancy: our voice should have been heard. We could have at least announced that we intended to join, which would have given us a foot in the door. If it were known that we intended to join, we should perhaps be listened to more seriously.

The major advantages of the City of London have been affected. We have lost some of the financial services market to Frankfurt as a result of our indecision. What saddens me most is that we should have been the bridge between the United States and Europe, sharing the language of the one with the geography of the other.

We must decide on the arrangements for the pre-entry stage to membership of monetary union. Some companies have never had to operate dual currencies to anything like the extent that will soon be required. Daily euro transactions will be a major part of their business. Even the retail trade will have to cope with those changes. Some shadowing of the euro will be necessary, and I should like to be assured that the Chancellor is developing plans to deal with that.

It is clear to me that the cost of the national health service will rise faster than the rate of inflation or growth in the economy. The population is aging and, as wants are met, the health service will require increasing expenditure. The time will come when we shall have to consider private medicine, which I do not favour, or a special national health service tax.

Anyone who has served in the Treasury has a visceral feeling about hypothecation: it burns inside us. The road fund licence still casts its shadow 70 years later. An important weakness of hypothecation is that it does not take into account the changing patterns of priority and expenditure. One certain aspect of health is that demand will increase into the indefinite future. If people can see the consequences, they may be more willing to accept a national health service tax than other taxes that disappear in the vast generality of public expenditure. Despite the hostility aroused by such a proposal, it should be freshly examined, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider doing so.

Meanwhile, we have had the first instalment of the reforms that my right hon. Friend will continue. We look forward to his later contributions.

6.3 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe): The Chancellor's Budget speech was commendably short in length and disgracefully short on detail—to an unprecedented degree—but it was long on rhetoric. I did not totally disapprove of some of his rhetoric: my theme was always that we should have no return to boom and bust. The trouble is that the Chancellor is not quite aware of the risk he is running of a return to boom and bust; nor does he know what to do about it.

I enjoyed the Chancellor's repetition of our slogan of welfare to work. I agree with him that one of the best solutions to the problems of poverty and social exclusion is work and the opportunity of work. Unfortunately, I am not at all sure that his repackaging of our measures is wise, and his Budget will not make it easier for businesses to create jobs.

The Chancellor added some new, portentous rhetoric about being a tax reformer, and about how this was the most tax-reforming Budget for a generation. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley), who spoke on Thursday, that this grandiloquent language was not matched by the measures it announced, which were a ragbag of tax reforms.

Several of my right hon. and hon. Friends have made the point that the overall effect of the Chancellor's tax changes is to continue the practice of putting a considerable burden of extra taxation on the very businesses that must create jobs if more people are to move from welfare into work. When the President of the Board of Trade explained some of these tax changes, she seemed totally oblivious to the overall upward effect they will have on the businesses for which she has departmental responsibility. She was partial in her selection of examples to illustrate the changes.

In less than one year in office, the Government have increased the burden of corporate taxation by more than £20 billion. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) could get no denial of his figure of £25 billion; I thought that the figure was £22 billion. Whatever the figure, the President of the Board of Trade obviously does not want to intervene to rule between us. It is certainly an enormous additional burden.

Considerable change has been made to capital gains tax. It is already our most complicated tax, and the most difficult to comply with and to collect, and it will be even more complicated in future. I happen not to agree with the theory that, if people produce a given capital gain on a sum of money in two years, that is bad, and if they make the same capital gain but take 10 years doing so, that is better. I was never attracted by the taper idea, which distorts the figures and is not wholly consistent with making the best use of resources for investment. The complications that will now face any taxpayer who is so reckless as to want to go in for self-assessment, or who needs the advice of his accountant, will be bewildering.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend was proud of the fact that capital gains relief was given to people who retire. Did he think that the Chancellor had improved the position? Has not the Chancellor decided to phase it out and to apply capital gains tax?

Mr. Clarke: The Chancellor has made the position less attractive for the owner-manager and people who are building up their own business: my hon. Friend makes a valid point.

Even more important are the changes made to employers' national insurance contributions. I concede that simplification is desirable in principle, because the aim of tax reform should be to make the system more simple and not more complex. However, the effect of making these changes now was brushed aside by the President of the Board Trade.

The cost of creating employment for employers whose employees are largely low paid is reduced, but the cost of providing jobs for employers whose employees are well paid—not very well paid, but on average earnings or above—is much increased. At this difficult time for many an industry, the effect will be arbitrary.

It may be good news for the retail and hotel and catering industries, and I have no objection to that. It will be extremely bad news for people who employ large numbers of professional or highly skilled staff. The total effect of the Budget on a medium-sized, high-tech business is particularly unattractive: the burden of creating jobs will be made worse, especially when the increases in corporation tax are also taken into account.

The way in which the Chancellor and the President of the Board of Trade explained the effect of the changes in corporation tax was disgraceful. It was an attempt to mislead the casual listener. We are constantly told that the rate of corporation tax is being reduced, but the method by which it will be collected from the bulk of British business will produce a very heavy flow from business to the Treasury.

I had understood that there was to be consultation on that issue after the green Budget in November. After the trailing of the proposal, it took about 24 hours for everybody to realise that it would bring the Treasury at least £8 billion over the lifetime of this Parliament. The response to the consultation in the Budget was one sentence, which made it clear to those who were interested—but not to anybody else, because it was tucked away—that no change of mind was taking place.

I welcome the fact that the new system of advance payments will not apply to small and medium companies, but it will be burdensome on the rest, and I think that the benefits will accrue only to those who make profits of £1.5 million or less a year. What about a company with profits of £2 million a year, which will not be a giant company? It may be a hi-tech company located in a science park of the type that I have described. Such companies are adversely affected by the Budget, and the overall effects are severe.

Disingenuous arguments are still being used. The President of the Board of Trade repeated that, when the full effects come through, which will be in about 2002 according to the Government, business will start to save about £1.5 billion a year. That assumes that the lower rates of corporation tax will continue for that time until the benefits begin to flow.

However, the commitment to the lower rates is only for the lifetime of this Parliament. The Chancellor is committed to them for as long as he needs them to sell the bogus proposition that he is helping business while raising a large sum from it. If there is a threat that the cash flow will reverse from the Treasury back to business, the Chancellor may use the latitude he has left himself to start raising business taxation.

On the basis of what he has done so far, the Chancellor is eager to raise business taxation, for entirely populist reasons. The President of the Board of Trade gave that away when she gave her list of alternatives that might upset the public if the Government resorted to them.

I will not burden the House with the argument that I used before. The Chancellor did not need to raise taxation on such a scale, because the public finances are altogether healthier than he constantly describes them. He continues to give pessimistic forecasts of the public sector borrowing requirement. As we said at the time, he gave pessimistic forecasts in November, but he will get into balance very quickly.

I agree with the policy aim of moving people from welfare dependency into work. I commend any move in that direction. I was in favour of doing what we could to improve the previous family credit system, and we introduced a generous disregard for child care to help women with obligations to provide care for their children so that they could, if they chose, take low-paid work and cease to depend on benefit. There has been an elaborate repackaging of family credit and child care allowance into the new system of the working families tax credit.

[Mr. Clarke]

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds worked with me on several Budgets. Anybody who is interested in the subject is aware of the system in some countries of earned income tax credits. Like so many of the Government's policies, that one has been taken from the Clinton Administration. I remain to be persuaded that the Government, who are anxious to present a policy that they could claim to have invented and to dissociate themselves from the policies of the previous Conservative Government, are wise in importing a system that is not regarded by everybody in the United States as an all-fired success.

In any event, there are big differences between the systems in America and Britain. The Americans lack two British policies. First, they do not have our system of pay-as-you-earn: everybody in America is required to submit an annual tax return. Secondly, America does not have our system of separate taxation for a woman and a man as a couple. They are at a disadvantage compared with us in not having either of those systems, and that makes it difficult to bring earned income tax credit into this country. A great cost is involved in bringing it in, some of which is due to increased take-up and some of which will be incurred by taking people further up the scale into benefit. It is more than that, because, under the new system, there are PAYE complications for the employer. There is also the administrative complication of turning the Inland Revenue into a department that will pay out money to people with children.

Many supporters of the new system are shocked to discover that it cannot be introduced before October 1999. A great deal of money and administrative time will be spent trying to hit that deadline. The Inland Revenue does not know anything about children. Under our tax system, it does not know whether taxpayers have children, because there is no child care allowance. The Inland Revenue has never paid out money by itself or indirectly through employers in its experience. The Department of Social Security has always done that, but now the two systems are to be amalgamated. The cost of the complication will be considerable.

In future, an employer will know all about the circumstances of each employee. When we made family credit more generous, Labour Back Benchers said that we were subsidising low-paying employers, and that that was terribly wicked. It was said that we were subsidising low pay, but that was not true. Under the family credit system, many employers do not know that an employee is drawing family credit. The snag under the new system is that every employer will know exactly how much each employee is getting on top of his pay.

Another issue is the transfer from the mother to the father. What happens if a benefit for the mother is taken as a tax credit by the father if he is the principal earner? When the Government started to trail the idea, that matter was raised by a number of commentators, including me. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury joined in the debate about the purse-to-wallet problem—I do not like the jargon—that that transfer posed.

The Government's answer—that people are given a choice—is absurd. The mind boggles. Of course some will make a sensible choice, but one can visualise a discussion between a mother and father about the comparative advantages of one taking a benefit or the other taking a tax credit. No doubt the Chancellor fondly imagines that such people will take their accountant's advice. People who contemplate moving from benefit dependency to low-paid work may not be able to do it, and that is another complication.

I approve of the objective of concentrating on subsidising low-paid jobs to widen the gap between earnings from them and the long-term receipt of benefit. The previous Government and this one appear to share that objective, but for the sake of originality, and to enable them to use grandiloquent phrases about transforming the tax system, the Government have wished upon us an extremely complicated new arrangement of dubious value.

I have said how much I agree with the Chancellor, but I wish that he would not overdo the way in which he sells his policies. Sometimes, he makes it sound as if the creation of jobs is essentially a function of the relationship between the tax and benefits systems.

New Labour seems to agree with some of my right-wing colleagues who are no longer in the House and who thought that the whole problem was the feckless poor. It was said that out there were many jobs, and that people were unemployed only because they had consulted their tax advisers and had decided that the marginal rate of reduction was too great to make it attractive for them to take advantage of the employment.

That is not the case. The reality is that the northern part of my county, where the coalfields collapsed, and Doncaster and Barnsley a bit further south, are not full of single women who would take jobs if only the cut-off rate was not so sharp. We simply have not reached the stage where, with the development of the real economy, these jobs are being created in sufficient quantity. Vis-a-vis my previous point—no return to boom and bust—we were going in that direction.

The Chancellor appears to have no interest in the real economy. He prefers social reform to macro-economic policy. He has left macro-economic policy to the Governor of the Bank of England. I remember being in the House when everyone complained that demand management and control of inflation were entirely a function of monetary policy. People used to complain about one-club golfers running the economy. The Chancellor is a one-club golfer, but he has given the club away to the Governor of the Bank of England, and he now says, "What goes on out there in terms of managing the economy has nothing to do with me."

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman's party in favour of taking this power back, and then handing it over to the European central bank?

Mr. Clarke: I am in favour of this country's authorities, for which the Chancellor took sole responsibility when he took over, taking a proper view of their responsibility for the macro-economy. Our jobs and living standards depend on that.

Governments do not create jobs. The tax-and-welfare system does not create jobs, except in the relevant offices. It is the duty of Government to try to create the conditions in which people in industry, business and commerce find it easier to create jobs and to raise people's living standards. In his speech, the Chancellor made it clear that he has no interest in that, and the President of the Board of Trade appeared to take only a passing interest in that aspect today, giving a wholly rosy view of where we are.

The fact is that business generally is faced with a combination of higher taxation, higher interest rates, an overvalued pound and a Chancellor, President of the Board of Trade and Government who do not believe that their fiscal policy has anything much to do with that. They are more concerned with social reform and the affairs of the Department of Social Security, in which the Chancellor likes to interfere. As long as we have the present Secretary of State for Social Security, it may be a good idea for him to interfere in that Department, but he should take a broader view of his fiscal measures in deciding what impact they are having out there.

There is not a direct read from monetary policy to fiscal policy. It should not, in my view, be the case that, when we tighten fiscal policy, monetary policy is relaxed, and when we tighten monetary policy, fiscal policy is relaxed; but the Chancellor and the Governor have to work in harness and at least have some common analysis of whether consumer demand is too strong or too weak, and whether it is likely to go up or to go down. They may not be able completely to control the exchange rate, but one or the other has to ask himself why it has gone up to a level that is crushing manufacturing industry, and whether either of them is going to do anything about it. At the moment, it does not seem that either of them will.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) talked about the problems of manufacturing industry, particularly exporters. Our export orders are going down rapidly. Manufacturing industry is about to go technically into recession. A recession is euphemistically described as negative growth for two successive quarters. This country has had five months of declining industrial production. The sixth is about to come up. Manufacturing is going into recession, and, even though service industries are thriving, the whole economy is slowing down at a remarkable rate.

Unemployment is still dropping, but at a much lower rate than 12 months ago. The turn is about to come, and we are simply waiting to see when, not whether, unemployment starts to rise again. That will put back into proportion all this rhetoric about getting people from dependency into work by playing around with their marginal rates of deduction.

The reason that the pound remains so strong—it is not the sole reason—is that we have raised interest rates in successive little steps, every time leaving the message that they are about to go up again. The reaction to the Chancellor's Budget was that the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank would put them up again, and immediately the pound soared miles above DM3. The minutes of the last committee meeting showed that it was poised to put them up again.

The Chancellor plainly never even addressed the question whether he could do anything about that. He remains completely oblivious to what the solution might be. In his speech, the only contribution he could make to tackling the threat of future growth was, "We must control our earnings." That is all part of his rhetoric about the frightfully inflationary inheritance when he took over.

One of the good features about the British economy at the moment is that the increase of earnings has been flat for 12 months. The latest statistics about earnings growth are exactly the same as those 12 months ago. The Chancellor was arguing about a shadow. He was missing the substance of the threat that our economy faces.

The Chancellor's own Red Book has to concede that the economy will slow down. I think that the Red Book is optimistic. I think that the economy will slow down faster than he says. The Red Book says that the savings ratio will fall. That is partly a result of what he has done to pensions and savings. Even as revised, thanks to the Robinson factor, individual savings accounts are far less attractive than personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts. Savings ratios are coming down.

None of the messages in the Budget does anything to dampen the belief that our high interest rates are going to remain in place and might go up again, or that the exchange rate will therefore remain strong against the deutschmark and the franc; of course, it is about to be very strong against the euro for some unknown period.

The Budget was well received. I agree with all the people who say that most Chancellors should have a sinking heart when Order Papers are waved behind them. When the Order Papers are waved on the instruction of the bleeper, it is perhaps a little less worrying than when they are raised spontaneously at the wrong moment in response to previous Budgets.

I do not think that all Labour Members are rejoicing about the Budget. I did a television programme at the weekend when I found that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and I were nearer to agreement on some of the analysis than at any time in our entire political lifetime. I do not take as much comfort from that as I do from the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne and quite a lot of sensible Labour Members, who know perfectly well that this country's economic well-being is being put at risk.

As the actual content—the tax reform—of the Budget was so comparatively inconsequential, its lasting legacy will be that the Labour party has come into power and completely neglected the prospects for sustained growth with low inflation, which it should have been pursuing.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member, I remind the House that, although there is no time limit on speeches today, many hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye, and it would be helpful to everyone if speeches could be moderately short.

6.27 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush): It is a great pleasure to follow the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer. I remember hearing one of his first speeches from the Dispatch Box and thinking, "That man is a future leader of the Tory party." He came very close to it. Like Chris Patten, with whom he has much in common, he is the exiled wing of the Tory party. Precisely because he can be such a formidable opponent, let me make it clear that he should not hide his light under a bushel, but should consider making a leadership bid. If he does so, I shall do everything that I can to encourage him.

The reason why I was so anxious to get an answer from the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), the shadow President of the Board of Trade, about the national minimum wage is precisely that he, more than anyone else in the Conservative party, has led a formidable, determined and persistent opposition to the introduction of the minimum wage. The idea that he could be a member of a Government who continued with the national minimum wage beggars belief. It would be the political equivalent of discovering, after 20 years, that Mary Whitehouse had been the marketing manager of Red Hot Dutch. It is impossible to think that he could be a member of a Government who wanted to keep the national minimum wage.

[Mr. Clive Soley]

The Conservative party seriously underestimates the view that the British public have taken about its capacity to manage the economy either firmly or efficiently. When a number of Conservative Members intervened on my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to criticise our taxation policy, I remembered two things. First, I remembered the clear commitment that we gave before the general election on direct taxation, that we would not increase income tax levels—we made exactly the same comments that the Conservative party made about other forms of taxation. Secondly—and more importantly—I remembered that over the 18 years from 1979 to the collapse of the Tories at the election, the burden of taxation imposed, as a percentage of gross domestic product, was higher for almost all those years than it had been under a Labour Government. When the Tories left office in 1997, it was about one to one and a half percentage points higher than under the previous Labour Government.

The Conservative Government increased the tax take—largely through a switch from direct to indirect taxation—and thereby dramatically increased the tax burden at the same time as they caused phenomenal problems in Britain's investment policy, not least by the doubling of value added tax in 1979. That caused the first of the two Tory slumps that did immense damage to the manufacturing base of this country, from which it has yet fully to recover.

Mr. Ruffley: On the point about rising tax burdens, what does the hon. Gentleman have to say about the fact that the Red Book shows that for the last financial year that the Conservative Government were in power, the tax burden was 38.1 per cent., compared with an anticipated figure of 40.1 per cent. for the financial year 2002-03? What is his explanation for that?

Mr. Soley: What the hon. Gentleman is desperately trying to cover up is that included in his figures is the windfall tax. He cannot include that any more than we could include the windfall tax on the banks imposed by Lord Howe in 1979-80. His figures do not add up.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Soley: I will take one more intervention, but I am conscious of what you said about time, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be quick.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in giving way. Will he clarify whether he is saying that the Prime Minister, when Leader of the Opposition, never said,

"We have no plans to increase tax at all"

in September 1996, or whether he is admitting that the Prime Minister said it, but did not mean it? Which?

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that my right hon. Friend's remark was made in the context of a discussion about income tax—

Mr. Bercow: No, it was not.

Mr. Soley: Yes it was. The hon. Gentleman's memory is faulty. Throughout the election and during the period leading up to it, we were very clear on direct taxation. The answers that we gave on other forms of taxation were precisely the same as those that the Conservative party gave for 18 years—that no Chancellor of the Exchequer would ever say what he would do with other tax rates. That position has always been maintained by both parties.

The Budget is excellent for British industry and for stability. Its general structure and balance are right, so I want briefly to deal with just two issues. The first is the family and children. I welcome, most of all, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's recognition of that issue as an essential part of the structure of the state in the running of the economy. At times, we try to run the tax structure as if the old economic system still existed.

One thing that the Labour party has to learn—and which the country also has to learn—is that the economic structure changed fundamentally in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s. That first came dramatically to my attention when I noticed that in the late 1980s in south Wales, the primary carers for more than 50 per cent. of children at home were the fathers. In other words, the heavy industries had collapsed and women were going into part-time work, leaving the men at home to look after the children.

That process has moved on and we now expect, almost automatically, that parents will have different roles throughout their lives. They may work part time or full time; they may work for short periods or for long periods. We have to develop a tax and benefits system that recognises that. Of course, it is much easier to recognise the problem than it is to determine the shape of the solution. However, I am sure that the shape of the solution includes the sort of benefits for families and children that my right hon. Friend included in the Budget. It is right to focus on the children, on child support and on parenting rather than on marriage as such. The structure of families changes, and it is difficult to come up with a definition that works.

We need to do more, which is why I should like the long-term thinking shown in the Budget to be taken further. We need to recognise that companies need to be part of the changing structure, in which parents need support at certain times if they are to work. We need to find ways to help companies to become, in the current phrase, family friendly. Again, it is easier to recognise the problem than to find the solution. However, there are companies—not least Midland bank, which took the initiative in this area—that recognise that they need to make special arrangements for parents who want to work part time and for those who leave employment for a time and then want to return to work. We should give additional support to companies that make those special arrangements.

We need also to recognise that as the nature of work changes so, too, does the nature of the tax and benefits system. I received a letter today from a constituent who was made redundant and so became self-employed. Her work takes her away from home for a period of time, and then she is back at home with her child and might work from home for a few weeks. When she is at home, she might not need child care; when she is away, she does. Because there are no effective means of recognising that and creating a structure to help her, she has to employ a full-time nanny, even though she needs one only when she is away from home or when the work she does at home is such that she needs to devote all her time to it. She actually needs a more flexible system than we have been able to provide.

My final point relates to the big issue that must be dealt with in the near future—housing finance. The Conservative Government got it disastrously wrong. I remember warning them on many occasions, when I was shadow Housing Minister, that if they went ahead with market rents, the cost of housing benefit would spiral out of control—and it did. By going to a market rent system, plus the individual support of housing benefit, there was no way to impose a cap without causing distress and difficulty for those who needed affordable accommodation. From a cost six or seven years ago of £1 billion or £2 billion, housing benefit has now risen to £12 billion—twice as much as mortgage income tax relief cost four or five years ago, when we considered that to be a problem.

If we simply cut housing benefit, the effect would be dramatic. It would be appallingly difficult for housing associations, private landlords and councils. We have to reform housing finance so that it recognises the importance of the housing market to the economy as a whole. I would prefer a bricks-and-mortar subsidy to keep rents down, rather than an open-ended subsidy on income. We also need some innovative ideas in the short term to deal with some of the housing benefit problems. I would be prepared to accept tax breaks—perhaps total tax breaks—for private landlords in exchange for guarantees about the quality of management of their properties. I see nothing wrong with indirect subsidy on that basis, as long as there is a guarantee of quality.

The three factors that matter to people in regard to housing are affordability, quality of management and—for tenants—tenants' rights. We have not got those right, nor have we got right assistance on mortgage interest for people who are in and out of work—the benefits system will pay the interest on some occasions but, unless we do something further, people will continue to be left vulnerable to indebtedness to their mortgage companies. That is a time bomb ticking away under not only the whole structure of housing, but the wealth and strength of the economy, so I believe that the Government must give it urgent consideration.

6.39 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I say at the outset that my party and I welcome a number of measures in the Budget, not least the ambitious welfare reform package and the important reforms in macro-economic policy, such as the fiscal responsibility legislation, for which we called—it is designed to complement the operationally independent central bank, about which the Conservatives seem to be more than a little confused. Nevertheless, I hope that the Government will understand that my speech, inevitably, will concentrate on our concerns about the Budget, particularly about the funding of public services and the weakening in Labour's position on the environment.

The extra money for education and health was little and late. I do not believe that it will prevent an increase in hospital waiting lists and class sizes. Even if it does, the way in which it is targeted means that that can be only at the expense of other important aspects of health and education, as the extra money was offset by an upward revision to inflation—the gross domestic product deflator. That will mean a real-terms cut in public spending next year of about £750 million, which cancels out nearly all the extra money for health and education.

That extra inflation—combined with the black hole that we identified in last year's Budget as being caused by higher inflation—has resulted in a real-terms cut of £6.8 billion in the public spending plans for 1998–99 in comparison with the original forecasts of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), to which the Government claim to adhere. The Red Book confirms that we were right to claim that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is building a huge war chest of funds, and that cyclical adjustment does not change the vast size of that war chest.

The Budget is bad for the environment, especially as the Government have backslid on their CO_2 reduction target. There is neither an energy efficiency scheme nor a carbon tax, and the fuel duties are still being used simply as a tax increase, with no switch from excise duty.

Of course it is good that the Government have at last come clean and produced estimates showing the cyclically adjusted current balance—we have been asking for that for months. In effect, that represents the Government's estimate of the war chest of cash surplus that will result from their borrowing rules.

As a result of incorporating the Tory spending plans in their previous Budget, the Government have produced new cyclically adjusted projections of their fiscal position that give a war chest of cash of some £123.4 billion over the five years 1998-99 to 2002-03. That excludes our claim—which the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe has confirmed—that many of the Chancellor's economic assumptions are deliberately cautious, so that he can disguise the size of his war chest. That figure of £123.4 billion is almost exactly the same as the figure—£124 billion—that was calculated by the House of Commons Library in January, which the Government sought to refute.

The Chancellor still seems determined to hide the size of his war chest, even though the figures are available for everyone to see. Excluding the windfall tax, it is assumed that the public sector borrowing requirement will fall by only £1.1 billion this year to £3.9 billion, and by a mere £2.2 billion in 1999-2000, to £1.7 billion. In the 1997 Budget, the PSBR was expected to fall by £17.7 billion between 1997-98 and 2000-01; now, the assumed fall in the PSBR is only £7.9 billion over the same period. Those figures may be found in table 1.2 on page 11 of the Red Book.

What are the reasons for that? Table 1.2—the first main table in the Red Book showing the PSBR—assumes that the war chest is already being spent. Tucked away in note 3 is the admission that the growth of public spending that is assumed in the table is 2¼ per cent. per year in real terms, which is fully three times the rate that was allowed for in the Tory spending plans—it raises the PSBR by £4.5 billion in 1999–2000, and by £9.1 billion in 2000–01.

[Mr. Malcolm Bruce]

The Chancellor may want to treble the growth rate that was assumed in Tory spending plans—indeed, some hon. Members may think that a reasonable option. However, he should not in such an underhand way massage down the PSBR and distort discussion of the options that are open to him. Indeed, we have been trying to have an honest and open debate about what is available and what options and priorities should be reasonably pursued—we should not let the Chancellor control the process entirely, without, it seems, consulting the Cabinet or his party, let alone the wider public or the House of Commons.

We believe that the Chancellor continues to take an extraordinarily pessimistic view of revenues. We noted in November that he had attempted to massage down VAT receipts—the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) will recall that we had an exchange about that in the Treasury Committee, of which he is Chairman—by having the National Audit Office rubber-stamp his decision to assume that VAT receipts as a proportion of consumer spending would fall, although that contradicted an effective Customs and Excise equation showing that VAT receipts would rise.

On page 118 of the Red Book, the Treasury is forced to admit that

"it seems likely that the ratio of VAT receipts to consumer spending has increased in 1997–98".

Nevertheless, its projections continue to assume a modest downward trend in the VAT ratio. Income is rising, but the assumption is—despite experience to the contrary—that income will fall. If that assumption were corrected and the figures predicted by the Customs and Excise equation were accepted, we should find that VAT receipts alone would provide some £3 billion extra to the war chest by 2002–03—some £8.2 billion extra over the period from 1998–99 to 2002–03.

The Budget includes a further adjustment of the GDP deflator for 1998–99, from 2¾ per cent. to 3 per cent. As I said, that cuts the real value of public expenditure by £750 million for 1998–99. Because of an additional upward revision to the GDP deflator for 1996–97, the real value of planned public expenditure in 1998–99 is now £1.4 billion less—in constant 1995–96 prices—than was estimated in November.

The £5.4 billion black hole in public spending for 1998–99, which we were the first to identify, has now grown to £6.8 billion. If one compares the new public spending plans with those set out by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe—even taking into account the Chancellor's extra cash allocations—one finds that Labour plans to spend £6.8 billion less in real terms in 1998–99 than the previous Government planned in their final Budget. The Chancellor's public spending plans allow for no real-terms growth in public spending for the three years from 1995–96 to 1998–99.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Is not the hon. Gentleman being too generous to the Government? Surely all the figures assume that public sector employees—such as those who work in education and the health service, both of which we want to expand—will accept a pay rise at the rate of inflation rather than the real rise that people who work in the rest of the economy are enjoying.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: The hon. Gentleman anticipates the development of my speech. I am explaining what the figures suggest, although I am not sure whether things will turn out that way in reality. I say as an aside that it is unreasonable for a Government who say that they are committed to the development of education and health to deny the people on whom those services depend a real increase—or, indeed, even a maintenance of living standards—when the economy is growing. That is unlikely to be sustainable.

The Chancellor has not kept to his pledges. The Labour manifesto said:

"For the next two years Labour will work within the departmental ceilings for spending already announced."

That pledge was broken in 1997, when Labour reallocated moneys within budgets. We have no quarrel with that, as we pushed the Government to do it, but they broke a specific pledge.

In November 1997, the Chief Secretary made another pledge that has been broken. He said:

"The Government are committed to holding to the Control Totals for 1997–98 and 1998–99."—[Official Report, 13 November 1997; Vol. 300, c. 622.]

Yesterday, the Government had to acknowledge that public finances for 1998–99 are so tight that they have increased the 1998–99 control total by £1.5 billion, using a carry-over from 1997-98 caused by slower growth. That is not necessarily wrong, but it makes a mockery of the Government's claim that they are sticking to the established spending plans. In reality, there has been a continual redefinition of Labour's election pledge on spending, demonstrating how ridiculous and arbitrary the whole process has been.

Only an extra £500 million has been allocated to the national health service in 1998–99: much less than the £2.25 billion identified in our alternative Budget. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may snigger but, when he was Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe chided Labour for not having the courage to produce an alternative Budget, which the Liberal Democrats have consistently done. He said that any Opposition worth their salt would produce alternative proposals, but of course the Conservative party has not done so, now that it is in opposition.

Taking the GDP deflator effect into account, the Budget is worth only about £400 million more for the national health service. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) put his finger on it. Given the huge pressures from the recent below-trend funding for the health service, and the millennium computer problem, which will definitely prove serious for the national health service, the extra funding is entirely inadequate to substantiate the Government's claim that they will save the service and deliver a cut of 100,000 in hospital waiting lists. We do not think that that Red Book promise is likely to be fulfilled. If it is, it can be only at the cost of severe cuts elsewhere in the NHS, with damaging consequences.

With the higher inflation expected in 1998–99, the NHS will receive only about 2.5 per cent. more in real terms. Under the Conservatives, the average real-terms increase was 3.1 per cent., although the last two years were not quite so good. The present Chancellor, in his 1988 autumn statement response to the then Chancellor, Nigel Lawson, said:

"Opposition Members welcome any additional resources for the National Health Service and any plan to break down the appallingly high waiting lists. However . . . When health costs are rising faster than even ordinary inflation, the sum that the Chancellor has provided today will barely cover the basic inflationary pressures that the health authorities face, far less deal with their huge backlog of structural repairs."—[Official Report, 1 November 1988; Vol. 139, c. 826.]

We expect waiting lists and waiting times to go on rising, breaking Labour's early pledge, which in any case has become merely a long-term aspiration.

The £2 billion extra that the Government boast will be spent on health is to be spent over two years and, taking inflation into account, represents only about £650 million more than the Tory plans. Judging by his outbursts, I know that those figures and that analysis have irritated the Prime Minister. He seems to take the view that the Government live in a changing world where figures can be adjusted, adapted and updated, but that Opposition parties cannot respond in kind.

If the Prime Minister wants to compare like with like, he might consider that the Labour party's pledge for spending on health and education, at the time of the general election, was for £100 million on each. We welcome the fact that the Government have approved that spending, but it is not enough to deliver on their pledges.

The Budget announced £250 million extra for education, £100 million of which is to be directed towards tackling skills shortages in key areas and promoting lifelong learning. Those are worthy aspirations, but schools are to receive only £100 million extra. Taking the deflator into account, the Budget gives education a net real addition of only £150 million.

That cannot reverse the decline in the percentage of GDP spent on education under Labour, in breach of its manifesto commitment. The manifesto said:

"We will increase the share of national output spent on education", but planned Government spending on education as a percentage of GDP is set to fall, from 4.5 per cent. in 1996-97 and 4.4 per cent. in 1997-98 to 4.3 per cent. in 1998-99. That is simply a betrayal of the manifesto pledge.

The additional funding is woefully inadequate. It will not tackle immediate needs and certainly has no real ambition for a Government who claim that education is their top priority. The Government talk about £2.5 billion extra for schools, but that is what they propose to spend over the entire five-year Parliament, when they should spend it this year if they have any ambition to deliver quality education.

Not only the Liberal Democrats have spotted the Government's U-turns on the environment. On Budget day, Charles Secrett, executive director of Friends of the Earth, said:

"This was a major missed opportunity. Labour is rapidly forfeiting its claim to be a green government . . . this Budget is about as green as a smog alert. The Government cannot meet its manifesto and Kyoto promises with this Budget."

Friends of the Earth was offended by the Government's U-turn in committing themselves only to the European Commission's 8 per cent. carbon dioxide emission reduction target by 2010, rather than to the 20 per cent. target in the manifesto.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman appears to endorse the comments of Friends of the Earth, so we could be forgiven for thinking that he believes that the Government did not increase road fuel duty enough. Will he clarify whether the Liberal Democrats support the increase in road fuel duty or believe that it was too little?

Mr. Bruce: Like the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce), the hon. Gentleman anticipates my speech. If he has a little patience, he will get the answer.

The Government made a clear promise to produce a Green Book alongside the Red Book. The Financial Secretary repeated it when she said:

"We have every intention of keeping that promise from the first full Budget."—[Official Report, 10 July 1997; Vol. 297, c. 1062.]

That commitment seems to have re-emerged as a single green page—page 78—in the Red Book.

The Budget contained no serious environmental measures: no carbon tax or home energy insulation scheme, and a cut in VAT on home energy insulation materials limited to certain Government grant schemes. That may be welcome, but it is very small.

The Government have made proposals to reduce vehicle excise duty for fuel-efficient cars, but those proposals are still on the drawing board. The Government propose a reduction of £50 per annum, which is probably not enough to make much difference. According to the Red Book, the Government are "interested in introducing" a lower rate for the least polluting cars. That is a very vague statement.

The Liberal Democrats proposed recycling money from higher petrol duty into cuts for smaller-engined cars. Had the Government made that connection, we might have taken a different approach to that aspect of the Budget. However, the Government have done nothing in that direction—they have merely talked about it—and they have increased fuel taxes by an extra £1.1 billion in 1998-99 or £3.3 billion over three years. That is simply a blow to rural motorists and a tax for everyone, and there are no offsetting fuel efficiency incentives or, as we would wish, tax cuts elsewhere.

I should like to clarify the situation for the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), following his intervention. We Liberal Democrats have a rule in our environmental tax policy that environmental taxes should be offset by corresponding tax cuts elsewhere. Under the Conservatives and now under Labour, such measures are simply another way to raise taxes and pretend that they are being green. We do not support such deception.

The extra £500 million over three years for public transport is welcome, of course, but it will not revolutionise our transport system, and I doubt whether it will offset the cuts in local authority transport budgets. Today, £4.5 million of rural initiatives was announced for rural transport in Scotland. People are pointing out that local authorities do far more than that to support rural transport, and it is not at all clear whether those initiatives can make a difference. I urge people to bid for the schemes but, if they are successful, to put pressure on the Government to put in a lot more before too long.

[Mr. Bruce]

As time is pressing, I must say that we welcome the welfare reform package, but are disappointed that nothing is being done for pensioners—not only we, but pensioners, are disappointed. We commend to the Government our proposals, which would not deal with the whole problem, but giving an extra £5 per week to those over the age of 80—up from the present derisory 25p—would at least show a commitment to helping the most elderly and vulnerable pensioners. We shall want to probe the details of some of the other measures in the Budget, but we genuinely applaud the Government's direction and hope that the delivery will match the rhetoric.

The £1.4 million for working families tax credit is a substantial injection, but not everyone will be better off. Indeed, the Red Book points out that the number of families with high marginal deduction rates of 60 per cent. or more will increase by 33 per cent., to more than 1 million, which demonstrates the difficulties when one moves the thresholds. One may help people at the bottom end, but unfortunately one creates another category that needs help further up the scale. I hope that the Government will ultimately find ways to deal with that. When we debate the 10p rate of tax, we might be able to engage on more efficient ways to help people on low incomes.

At this stage of the Budget, it has to be said that there are some losers, for example, a married man with no children will lose part of his married couple's allowance with no corresponding benefit, but Budgets do not please everyone, I guess.

There are concerns about how fraud can be avoided and how the working families tax credit will be evaluated. It has been suggested that people might get round the system by taking in each other's children and finding a way to claim benefit in that way.

Finally, on a macro-economic point, I found the exchange on exchange rates interesting. The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) clearly enjoys opposition. He has a talent for it—after all, he only has to attack. He is not so good at telling us what he would do. How cheerfully the right hon. Gentleman disowns the Conservative party's policies both in government and in opposition. Obviously, he has been practising for opposition for the past 10 years. He opened his comments by saying that the exchange rate was too high, but gave no idea of how the Conservatives would bring it down. He tried to explain that they would not have got there in the first place.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne hit on the one issue that the right hon. Gentleman ignored, which is the euro effect. That we are not committing ourselves to the euro is an additional factor that encourages people to hold sterling and to force it up. I would not have expected the right hon. Member for Wokingham to endorse that policy, although I was interested that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe was not keen to answer my question about the operation of the independent central bank either. On that issue, the Conservatives would do best to keep quiet. Being the party of devaluation is a new role for them.

We want sensible economic policies, to provide stability in the long term. I plead with the Government seriously to consider a clear timetable for British entry into the single European currency, as that would do more than anything else to give manufacturers confidence. It would do so for two reasons. First, it would almost certainly reduce the immediate pressure on the pound and, secondly, in the long run, it would reduce the exchange rate risk for 60 per cent. of our foreign trade—something that seems to be lost on the Conservative party, or at least on its official leadership.

We shall support some aspects of the Budget, but it has a big hole at its heart, and the Government will not deliver on health and education unless they are prepared to tackle that.

7.4 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (North Durham): The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) made a characteristically sturdy speech. Indeed, he showed why it was a mistake for the Conservative party not to have elected him as leader. He was a little reticent about his contribution to the overheating of the economy before the last election—I chided him about that before that election—but he certainly showed up the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). I give the right hon. Gentleman some advice—the shriller the tone, the less likely he is to be listened to. In the long term, the right hon. Gentleman's knockabout stuff will not do. It may be all right for a couple of years of opposition, but it is not persuasive, and he will have to do better.

I agree with the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) about a single currency. However, some of my hon. Friends will be glad to hear that I shall not follow that line tonight as I want to concentrate on the Budget.

This is a good Budget, and it deserves the widespread praise that it has been given. To begin with, it has proved that consultation is a good idea. The pre-Budget report and the consultation that followed it improved a couple of measures. First, it made individual savings accounts a more effective system. The Government can no longer be accused of retrospective taxation, as they might have been had they not listened to the consultation. Secondly, the new working families tax credit has answered some of the criticisms of the right hon. and learned Member Rushcliffe precisely because there has been a debate about the issues and the Chancellor has answered most of the questions. That is why it will be an effective system. More generally, it is better for the Budget process to be open and for there to be a system whereby one can discuss policy details before those policies are announced. That is a plus and a good thing for our policy making.

I welcome some of the supply-side measures that the Chancellor introduced. I welcome the fact that he has managed a significant redistribution between the better and the worse-off without clobbering the middle classes, which is what people in some Conservative newspapers feared. I also welcome the fact that he has introduced measures to make work to work and employment pay—the working families tax credit, the reform of the national insurance contribution and the expansion of the new deal—and that he has helped children through the promise to increase child benefit next year and the extra help for younger children in poorer families. Incidentally, and sotto voce, the latter compensates for what happened with lone parent families before Christmas and I also welcome the Budget for that reason.

The Budget also contains extremely useful increases for education and health on top of the increases already announced for 1998-99. At times, the hon. Member for Gordon has been churlish about those increases, because they are a good sight larger than we promised and we shall be doing that in every Budget. The fact that a war chest is being built up at least means that there will be extra resources for health and education in every Budget. The hon. Gentleman should welcome that rather than rubbishing it.

The economy faces an uncertain outlook, hovering uneasily between overheating and recession. There are inflationary signs, a tightening of the labour market, and shortages of skilled workers. The Budget forecasts 3 per cent. inflation during the year. On the other hand, a slowdown in the economy is forecast; it is down by 0.25 per cent. on the pre-Budget forecast. That has been caused by the interest rate hike and budgetary policy but above all by the 25 per cent. rise in sterling. There is also the possible impact of the Asian crisis. It is an uncertain situation. Added to that, we have two economies: a depressed manufacturing economy and the service economy, which is still expanding. An interesting graph in this month's Goldman Sachs report shows that clearly.

How is the Chancellor reacting? He believes in long-term stability, which is a worthy objective, given what has happened in the recent past. We all remember the Lawson boom, which led to the Major-Lamont recession. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe remembers it well because he had to clear up some of the mess. It is right to want to get rid of stop-go and to turn our back on fine tuning, and I have heard the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that.

I support giving the operation of monetary policy to the Bank of England because, in the end, I do not think that politicians can be trusted. Even the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe could not be trusted in the run-up to the general election. He knows that he should have put up interest rates, but he did not. It would have been done if the Bank of England had been in charge.

The Chancellor has imposed on himself the code for fiscal stability. First, there is the golden rule of borrowing only to fund investment. The second rule is that debt should remain at a sustainable level. Those are sensible rules. The Chancellor has been criticised—we have heard echoes tonight—for not taking enough out of the economy, for not having done enough to help the Monetary Policy Committee. We must examine that. The right hon. Member for Wokingham made that criticism, but he was clearly trying to evade the issue. He attacked the Government for increasing taxation but he also said that the Government had not taken enough out of the economy. That was a weak argument. As the Chancellor has said, there has been a 2 per cent. fiscal tightening over the past year, the biggest tightening of fiscal stance since Geoffrey Howe's 1981 Budget.

Part of that is the tightening that comes at the top of the cycle, when more VAT comes in. Interestingly, self-assessment has produced more money for the Treasury. As someone put it euphemistically, people have taken the opportunity to bring their affairs up to date. I do not know what they were doing before, but it is good news for the Treasury. The Chancellor has imposed consumer taxes, such as the two petrol tax increases, the tobacco and alcohol increase, and the two stamp duty increases for houses costing more than £250,000. There is also the mortgage tax relief reduction announced in July, which takes effect on 1 April, and the reduction of married couples' tax allowance from 15 to 10 per cent., which comes into effect next year.

Added to those taxes, there is a very tight position on spending. The hon. Member for Gordon accepted that. We have stuck to Tory spending plans in a way that no one expected us to—no one thought that it was possible. I hope that that means that we shall have a lot to spend in future, but we cannot be accused of having too lax a fiscal stance now. If we had taken the advice of some City columnists and some speakers tonight and put more taxes on the consumer, we could have plunged the economy into recession. The Chancellor was right not to do that.

To some extent, that policy leaves the strain on interest rates and the decisions of the Monetary Policy Committee. I support that idea. We have already rehearsed the difficulties that the committee faces with the economy overheating but also showing signs of going into recession. It is not surprising that that should produce divisions in the new committee. It is good that they are out in the open, so that we can read about them. They are in the inflation report and the minutes that are published six weeks after every meeting. I think that they should be published one week after. The delay is an unnecessary block to our knowledge.

There are three points of view in the debate. One lot argues that priority should be given to the danger of inflation and that interest rates should rise immediately. They are the hawks. Another lot—I think that it comprises only one person—says that the greater danger is tipping the economy into recession and that there should be no rise in interest rates. The third argument is the most difficult to sustain: the committee should give priority to the dangers from inflation but should wait and see. That is wrong because if, according to the inflation report, there are really dangers from inflation, the committee must act now. It will get into the worst of all worlds by waiting and seeing. That would mean only that those who wanted to hold sterling would buy even more and the pound would go higher, which, as everyone agrees, damages manufacturing industry. It may also mean that we would need higher interest rates later. We may have to do more later and so increase the danger of a so-called hard landing. We want to slow down the economy enough to slow inflation, without tipping it into recession. That is the trick.

It may be that, in April, the committee will say that recession is more likely and that inflationary pressures are being damped. However, if it really decides that the dangers lie more on the inflation side, it should put up interest rates and make people understand that interest rates will not rise further. That would be doing a service to the country and the economy.

This is a an excellent Budget. It is the Chancellor's second skilful Budget. I welcome the supply-side measures. If we are to get their full benefit, the policies need to be sustained by an appropriate macro-policy. The Chancellor has done his bit; his policies now need to be supported by wise decisions by the Monetary Policy Committee.

7.18 pm

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice). If I may return his slightly back-handed compliment to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), it is only a pity that he spoke from the Back Bench rather than the Front Bench. No doubt, that will come.

[Mr. David Davis]

The hon. Gentleman made again the much-reiterated point that the Budget was originally billed as a once-in-a-generation, radical, reforming Budget. I believe that it is somewhat less than that. Indeed, given the comments of the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley) in a rather good speech, it will have less long-term impact than, for example, the early Geoffrey Howe Budgets or—I shall ignore his embarrassment—those of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe. Not only that, but what long-term impact it has will not necessarily be all good—anything but.

I do not wish to be over-harsh about the Budget, and I recognise that there are some commendable aspects to it, on which I shall speak shortly. I shall focus on employment and, in particular, the central policy proposal in the Budget—picked out by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon)—the combined reform of national insurance, tax rates and benefits in an attempt to improve the incentives to work and to escape poverty.

That reform is not cheap: the first year of its operation will probably cost about £2.8 billion and the cost seems likely to grow thereafter. However, the unemployment trap and the poverty trap are undoubtedly the plague of modern European economies and it must be right to try to eliminate the monstrosity of people losing more as a result of taxes and lost benefit than they get in pay. The Budget attempts to tackle that and, according to the Red Book figures, reduces by 100,000 the number of low-paid families who face the loss of more than 80 per cent. of increases in pay and by a further 400,000 those who lose more than 70 per cent. All that is to the good—at least at face value—but I shall make some criticisms shortly both of how it is structured and of how it is paid for.

I agree that there is great moral and economic force in reducing the marginal economic taxes facing the poor, but my congratulations are limited and should not give much comfort. We should not miss the fact, already mentioned in the debate, that now more than a million families face marginal deduction rates of more than 60 per cent.—in fact, in most cases, 68 per cent. or 69 per cent.—under the new proposals. On the Chancellor's own figures, the policy puts a total of 250,000 more families in the poverty trap than were there before the reforms. In effect, the wage earner in each of those families, when he looks at his overtime pay, his bonus or his pay rise, must say to himself, "£1 for me and my family, £2 for the Government. £1 for me, £2 for the Chancellor."

That high 69 per cent.-plus marginal deduction, that loss of more than two thirds of poor families' increase in income, applied before the Budget reforms to people on gross pay of up to about £250 a week; now, that 69 per cent. marginal deduction rate applies to families with two children and an income of up to £320 a week. Again, those figures come straight from the Red Book. For those families, the depressing prospect of giving the Chancellor two thirds of any pay increase that they achieve will in future apply to families whose breadwinner, on the basis of a 40-hour week, earns up to £8 an hour, which is more than double any conceivable or plausible minimum wage level.

Put in simple terms, the poverty trap is being made a little less deep, but a great deal wider. More people will fall in and getting out will be a slightly less steep but much longer climb. All those people—more than a million families—still face that prospect under the new proposals. Few things provide a more dismal demonstration of the depressing arithmetic of the dependency culture than that reform. Those high rates of withdrawal are, of course, a disincentive to work and we face them for the foreseeable future under the Government's strategy. The reasons are hard and uncomfortable and are demonstrable by testing the working families tax credit strategy against its numerical limits.

High benefit withdrawal rates arise from two factors: high means-tested levels of benefit for the poor and low differentials between benefit levels and average earnings levels in society at large. Unless there is a massive change in the basis of our taxation, it is reasonable to assume that means-tested benefits to a worker on average earnings are zero; anything more than that creates a ridiculous dependency arrangement. That is true in most western societies—for example, the American earned income tax credit, on which the Government have based their policy, falls to zero at almost exactly the American median earnings. That means that the maximum range of income over which benefit is withdrawn is the difference between the earnings level from which the credit starts to be withdrawn, which the Budget proposes should be £90 a week, and the average wage, which in Britain today is about £370 a week. A family with two children receives £78.50 of working families tax credit. If the taper were extended right up to £370 a week, the net effective withdrawal rate would be 28 per cent. which, when added to tax and national insurance contributions, would give a withdrawal rate of 61 per cent.

What I have described would be hugely expensive, would drag more than half the population into the benefits system and would still have a withdrawal rate of more than 60 per cent. In other words, the laws of arithmetic—I have used nothing else—virtually dictate that, under the system that the Government have designed, the total tax and withdrawal rate for poor people cannot get below 60 per cent.; therefore, the strategy is flawed.

There are possible solutions. One is to allow the differential between average incomes and benefit levels to widen, but that is unlikely to commend itself to the Government. The second theoretical option would be a massive redistribution using higher taxes on the top half of the population to reduce them on the bottom half, but Labour tried that in the 1970s and it did not work. Finally, the Government could attempt to reduce underlying income tax rates in general by transferring the tax burden to indirect taxes, but they clearly do not intend to do that, as the Red Book shows the percentage of gross domestic product being taken in income tax climbing from 9.5 to 11 per cent. by 2002—by far the biggest proportion of the increasing tax burden is to be raised in that way.

Without any of those changes, it is impossible to get marginal deduction rates for a million poor families below 60 per cent., so while there are good aspects to the changes, which I hope that I have picked out, the overall strategy is certainly very limited and potentially fatally flawed, because it will not deliver enough in the long run.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): The right hon. Gentleman sets out an undoubted problem, but does he not regard the situation that he describes as being far better than a situation in which 750,000 people keep 7p in every extra pound because the marginal withdrawal is 93 per cent. and a further 650,000 people are better off if they stop working? That is the inheritance from his Government.

Mr. Davis: The hon. Gentleman's figures do not tally with what appears in the Red Book—the 7 per cent. gain is certainly not right. What I am trying to point out is that, although some of the work in reducing the very high levels of withdrawal affecting around 100,000 people is worth while, the rest of the exercise has been to trade away the rights of a further 250,000 people by pulling them into the poverty trap. That cannot be a good long-term strategy.

Working families tax credit is based on the American EITC. It would be wrong of me to leave the subject without flagging up some critical practical problems that afflict the policy where it has been used, even though my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe has already mentioned some of them. In America, the EITC is known for its administrative complexity, its weakness as an incentive provider and its proneness to fraud—it is the most fraud-prone benefit in the United States. Those three weaknesses are intertwined: complexity of the policy leads to administrative weakness, which leads to policy failure and to fraud. In this country, fraud takes between 6 per cent. and 16 per cent. of any welfare budget other than pensions, which amounts to between £4 billion and £5 billion of taxpayers' money lost each year. It would be a tragedy if, on top of its other problems, that problem were to afflict the WFTC as well.

The arguments on that subject in the Budget papers are very thin indeed. They recognise the problem, but do not make it at all clear how the complexity, delay and fraud issues are to be addressed. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe has pointed out that the apparently long delay between now and the initiation of the policy will probably not be enough for the tax authorities to deal with all the issues.

I have long argued that it is necessary to design fraud out of welfare systems at the point of policy creation. That does not appear to have been done yet, but it is vital even to the partial success of this policy that it be done. Therefore, I hope that the Chief Secretary will tell us how he intends to achieve it when he winds up the debate.

I shall return briefly to the funding of the reforms and to the macro-economic impact of that funding. To a large extent, the reforms have been funded in the medium term by the cash-flow effects of tax changes to the corporate sector. It is now widely understood that one impact of this and the previous Budget has been to damage pensions and savings—and incentives to pensions and savings—as well as to damage investment directly. It is no surprise that the impact of the two Labour Budgets, according to Treasury forecasts, is shown as reducing investment growth rates from 7.75 per cent. in 1997 to 3 per cent. by 2000. That is not a very good indicator of investment long-termism; nor will it help fundamental economic or employment growth.

That leads us to a rather awkward weakness of Labour's economic strategy, about which the argument has gone to and fro all evening. Last year, the Chancellor made the Bank of England independent. The primary characteristic of independent central banks is a focus on inflation almost to the exclusion of everything else. That has generally created a better-than-average inflation record in countries with independent banks—but it does not come cost free. All the studies show that such countries have sharper and deeper recessions than do countries with other arrangements. In other words, there are higher unemployment consequences.

The Chancellor has failed to design his Budget strategy in such a way as to take that into account: just the opposite in fact. By funding welfare increases—in effect, by abstracting cash from the corporate sector—he is moving a significant quantity of money from saving and investment into consumer spending. The response of the Bank is predictable. While it is theoretically independent of government, and no doubt calculates its money supply figures carefully, it does not operate in a vacuum and is not independent of what is happening all around it. It is far less likely to reduce interest rates when the newspapers are full of accounts of consumer spending booms. So this Budget is designed to encourage higher interest rates in the long term—with the consequential effects, as several of my hon. Friends have pointed out, on the pound.

As we know, the level of the pound will have a serious impact on manufacturing. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe has detailed some of the recent monthly figures. It takes a year or more for hedging and margin-cushioning effects on manufacturing to work their way out of the system. That means that the full impact is by no means yet visible. There may turn out to be a very sharp downturn—much sharper than the figures that we have heard may suggest.

Opening the debate, the President of the Board of Trade, in a remarkable polemic, argued that the problem would be dealt with by competing on quality. British industry has done a remarkable job of improving quality over the past 18 or 20 years, and that does not owe a great deal to any Labour Government. However, all our competitors also compete on quality. Where there are two quality competitors, the lowest price will win. That is a fact that our engineering firms understand all too well; I hope that we shall not suffer because of it in the immediate future.

Both this and the previous Budget have had the advantage of five years of economic growth greater than that of any comparable European country—twice that of France and Germany. We have also had the advantage of inflation and interest rates at 30-year lows, and of lower tax and regulatory burdens than those enjoyed by any other country in Europe—in short, the golden inheritance that has allowed the apparently healthy finances of this Budget.

Those finances should not be taken for granted. We have been talking in precise terms of fractions of a billion pounds. If the economy turns down badly, £2 billion or £3 billion surpluses will turn into £20 billion or £30 billion deficits. Unemployment, which was falling by 50,000 a month last year and by 18,000 a month this year, could be climbing by 50,000 a month in a couple of years' time. If that happens, the Budget's arithmetic will fall to pieces.

[Mr. Davis]

More than any other country, we in Britain depend on our ability to compete in world markets. Without markets, there are no profits to tax or jobs to take. Welfare to work will certainly fail if there is no work. The Chancellor's golden rule on borrowing would turn to lead in his hands if tax buoyancy vanished and demand-led expenditure soared.

I opened by saying that the Budget was less radical and dramatic than its billing. It would be a tragedy if its principal impact turned out to be the crippling of the economic engine on which all this welfare reform properly depends. The President of the Board of Trade said that this is a Government for the long term. I hope that British manufacturing industry will not have reason ruefully to remember Keynes's comment that, in the long term, we are all dead.

7.35 pm

Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale): I want to speak in the debate, not because I set myself up as someone who knows much about the economy but because what was announced in the Budget on Tuesday is having a real impact in my constituency. I want to make four points. One concerns the Budget process, which will be crucial to ensure that many people who used not to be enfranchised in Government Budget-making mechanisms now become enfranchised. That will surely be healthier for everyone. Secondly, I want to touch on the gains to poor people on benefits. Thirdly, I want to mention those in the benefit trap—the working poor. Many of my constituents find themselves in that situation. Lastly, I want to discuss small and medium enterprises. I came to the Chamber last Tuesday thinking that at least one of those groups would get something in the Budget. I certainly did not expect all of them—they make up a large part of my constituency—to benefit from the Budget.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) discussed some of the problems that were discovered when we first floated the idea of the working families tax credit. Everyone can say what Canada and the United States do, but the green Budget allows people inside and outside Parliament to debate the merits of what has been learned from other models across the world, and to say how we want to develop our own. That is why we did not end up with a transfer from the purse to the wallet; nor will we end up with some of the worst aspects of the Canadian and American systems. Hon. Members need not take my word for this; after all, I am no expert on economics. They have only to read Jeffrey Liebman, the renowned US public policy expert, who expressed the same ideas in the Financial Times last Wednesday. Hence the importance of the green Budget, delivered sufficiently in advance to enable us all to engage in debate, formulate policy and think about the issues.

I have the privilege of chairing the Back-Bench women's group, which felt able to participate in the debate. We welcome the approach that the Treasury and related Ministries adopted to consulting us on the consequences of the policies that they were initiating. The Budget will have a phenomenal impact on women and children—not to mention small businesses. For the first time, we can truly say that, behind the Budget, there is a genuine understanding of the working lives of women and of child poverty. Child poverty is our direst legacy from the past 20 years. That is why this Budget is phenomenal. It manages not to squeeze people who are trying to do better, and it also manages to redistribute to people who need a helping hand.

The Budget redistributes to parents—single parents or couples—who, for whatever reason, want to stay at home, looking after their children, and enables them to do so. The way in which we have increased child benefit—one of the biggest increases in child benefit in two decades—recognises the importance and the cost of nurturing children, and acknowledges the in-built cost of children under the age of 11. That aspect deserves to receive credit, because, as was said when we had the debacle of the single-parent benefit debate, there is an important cost, and a knock-on cost to children, of rearing younger children.

Conservative commentators talk about increasing the poverty trap. Do they really understand what the poverty trap means? In my constituency, it means that people genuinely cannot afford to go out to work because there is no way—because of the way in which the intricate calculations are done in the benefit system—that they can afford to take the job that they are skilled enough and lucky enough to be offered.

With the working families tax credit and all the related help, including the increase in the level above which employers' national insurance contributions become payable, for the first time ever lots of my constituents can afford to stay in work and not penalise their families for choosing to do so. They welcome the moves in the Budget to start to make work pay for the previously work-poor.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way in such a passionate speech, but I am sure that she would not want to mislead anyone. Apart from the changes to single-parent benefits, which date from April 1998, the changes that the Government have announced will not be made until October 1999. I hope that she will ensure that her constituents realise that they must wait almost until the next century before any of those changes are introduced.

Lorna Fitzsimons: Yes, but no claimant loses anything now, and my constituents would never take lectures from Conservative Members about anything that they did for women and children in poverty. The Budget clearly says to my constituents—they have told me so, because I have had several meetings with large groups of them since the Budget statement was made—that, for the first time ever, the Government are no longer stigmatising them for being in poverty or trying to do better.

Some of my constituents have been allowed a real choice—whether to stay at home with their children or to go out to work. They feel that this is the first time that, in a Budget, a Chancellor has helped them by allowing them to make such a choice.

The other indicative policy change in the Budget was small, but important—the allocation of £10 million to a scheme to ensure that partners of jobseeker's allowance claimants, who previously were unregistered, under the Treasury rules, and in the unemployment statistics, get assistance in seeking work. For the first time ever, the Treasury has recognised that women's patterns of work very much depend on their partner's pattern of work, and that, if they happen to be a partner of an unemployed JSA claimant, they get no help. There are roughly 11,000 women in that position.

That is one of the single biggest changes in the Budget. It shows that, for the first time ever, we have a Treasury that is no longer, in the glib phrases of some commentators last week, a "boy's zone", but is starting to conduct a gender impact analysis of the—[Laughter.] Conservative Members think that this is very funny, but their Front-Bench spokesperson on women, the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), was desperately trying to say that your Treasury actually invented it, so it is not that funny—you speak with forked tongue. The reality is that, if you are going to laugh at gender impact analysis—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I am enjoying listening to the hon. Lady, but may I say to her, I do not have a Treasury—I honestly do not have one—so perhaps she will remember that.

Lorna Fitzsimons: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will be well aware that, as women make up 52 per cent. of the population, it would be smart to have some form of analysis of how Government policy and Treasury policy affect them. Therefore, although some people would choose to laugh at it, I think this would be a very dim economic thing to do. That is why I welcome the Chancellor's move to change the focus of the Treasury and study the effect on 52 per cent. of the population of the Budget measures.

The measures affecting small and medium employers were very much welcomed. Rochdale—at least the portion of the borough that lies in my constituency—has more than 2,500 small and medium enterprises, the majority of which are small, and they very much welcome the Budget measures.

As most people know, Rochdale has a very strong manufacturing tradition and manufacturing base. Many of the small employers managed to duck the worst aspects of the second recession by changing their business focus to exports. One or two big businesses in Rochdale have been the pioneers of a superb export drive. They used a lot of their clout and a lot of their experience to re-educate many of the small employers into the benefits of exporting. Obviously, they are now suffering because of the strength of the pound, but the thing—

Mr. Ruffley: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Lorna Fitzsimons: No. May I just finish my point?

The one thing that employers are saying to me is, "Can you please get the Chancellor to make more positive statements about the single currency?" That is the point that my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) was making. They wanted us to go ahead and make positive noises about the single currency.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Ruffley rose—

Lorna Fitzsimons: I give way to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley).

Mr. Ruffley: If Government economic policy is so successful, can the hon. Lady explain to the House why manufacturing output has fallen for five successive months?

Lorna Fitzsimons: No. The point that I was making was the point that manufacturers in my constituency have asked me to make to Ministers. Those manufacturers understand the problem that the Government have in terms of the economy and the high pound. They are saying to Ministers, "We want you to make more positive comments about the single currency." The majority of small and medium employers in my constituency are subcontractors to big companies. They will need to be ready to deal with the single currency in 1999, because it will be a clause of their contract to do so—

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Lorna Fitzsimons: No; I will not. This is important.

Those manufacturers will need to be ready, even if we do not join the single currency. They are saying, "If the majority of us will have to be ready, why are we, as a country, not making more positive noises about joining the single currency?" In their estimation, it would make the problem of the strength of the pound less damaging to them and it would give them ease in terms of long-term planning and in their relationships with their banks, their investors, and so on.

All I am doing is passing on a heartfelt message from the majority of employers in my constituency. That message is, please have the confidence to make more positive noises about the single currency.

There have been a lot of good points—

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Lorna Fitzsimons: I will not, because I am just about to wind up.

Eminent Labour Members have made many good points about the strengths of the Budget. I welcome the fact that we have been able to do something about making work pay for the majority of my constituents, and about helping small and medium enterprises. Most of us did not hope to be able to do both in the same breath, in the same Budget, and we are very grateful. We want to work to ensure that the next Budget builds on that success.

7.47 pm

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): The Budget is like the curate's egg—good in parts. Some parts are very good indeed; I shall say something about those. Some parts are muddled; others are addled; others are downright bad.

[Mr. John Butterfill]

I am worried about the general thrust of the Government's taxation policy. The Chancellor seems to be constantly trying to find ways of raising taxation without anyone noticing. The worst possible example was the advance corporation tax change last year, which attacked the country's pension funds severely. Nothing in the Budget has remedied that.

This time, the Chancellor is announcing nominal reductions in corporation tax rates, but the cash flow changes in the tax system mean that there have been substantial increases in the tax that companies pay.

One aspect of the Red Book and the Budget speech that I find rather sinister is the reference to a review of the North sea oil tax regime. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) mentioned that matter earlier. There is a real concern that, in looking for ways of raising taxes without anybody noticing, the Government may do serious damage to one of our most important industries. The problem is that the finds left in the North sea are not huge and easily exploitable; they are much smaller, complex oil deposits which are more expensive to mine. If it is much more expensive to operate in the United Kingdom, the oil companies could easily go elsewhere to Uzbekistan or wherever. I caution the Chancellor not to pursue that route because, although it may appear an attractive way of raising moneys in a manner that people will not notice, it will do much damage to the United Kingdom economy in the long term.

The Chancellor introduced one or two welcome measures for small business, and it would be churlish not to welcome them. For example, it is helpful that small businesses will be exempt from stage payments. We also welcome the fact that small businesses will receive 40 per cent. capital allowances in the first year. However, that is not always a tremendous asset—particularly for new and emerging businesses that do not have profits to shelter. Therefore, the impact of that measure will be very much less than the Chancellor would have us believe.

I also greatly welcome the changes to venture capital. I must declare an interest in that subject as I have been an adviser to the venture capital industry for many years—as the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) knows. The Government have made some worthwhile changes to an industry that does a great deal for the British economy. I am particularly pleased about the technical changes to transfer pricing and the enterprise investment scheme improvements. The Government have also introduced a £50 million venture capital fund for universities—although that is a rather small sum.

More important still is the Chancellor's commitment to look at ways of developing share incentives in order to attract executives into smaller, growing companies. A principal problem in the economy is that small companies that need to grow cannot attract quality people. Many such people are comfortably ensconced in their established jobs and do not wish to take the risk of moving to a smaller company, even though they could have an enormous impact on its development. I hope that that consultation will bear fruit in the future.

Unlike my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), I am keen on the idea of capital gains tax reform, and I have for many years advocated a taper for capital gains tax. It has always seemed totally mad to have a tax system where the marginal rate of tax is the same for someone who has built up a business over 10 years as for someone who has made an overnight gain on the currency market. That position could not be sustained. Therefore, I believe that the introduction of the taper is worth while.

I have some reservations about the way in which the taper is supposed to operate. I believe that 10 years is too long, because it will hold investment in existing patterns and, in a dynamic economy, we may wish to change those patterns. Another effect of the taper, combined with the withdrawal of indexation, is that some entrepreneurs will pay more than they do under the present arrangements. For example, the withdrawal for non-business assets will reduce by 16 per cent. over 10 years—or 1.6 per cent. per annum—on a flat rate. The real rate is less than 1 per cent. per annum. If we take away indexation, we can see that the situation will be worse than if there were no taper and only indexation.

That is a problem as many of those who invest in developing businesses will not qualify for the business asset criterion. To qualify, people must have voting rights of 25 per cent. or more or they must be employed virtually full time in the business. I hope that the Chancellor will consider this matter in Committee, because some definitional changes must be made. For example, a financial partner will not invest in a business unless he ends up with more than 25 per cent. of the shares, which carry voting rights. That will act as a disincentive for entrepreneurs to bring in financial partners because the Government are, in effect, forcing them to give away more than 25 per cent. of the equity in return for the injection of finance. I am not sure that that is what the Chancellor intended when he drew up the rules. Therefore, I hope that he will consider an arrangement whereby someone coming in as a financial partner to a suitably qualified company will get the benefit of the business asset definition. I believe that the present definition leaves much to be desired.

I welcome the ISA changes and the regime for TESSAs and PEPs. I think that it is as well to thank a Government for changing their mind. It is easy to criticise Governments and say, "You only did it under pressure," but it sometimes takes political courage to admit that perhaps one's first ideas were not correct. It is worth paying credit to the Government for showing that courage.

I had intended to say quite a lot about the working families tax credit, but I do not think that I could improve in any way on the extraordinarily detailed and brilliant analysis of the problem by my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis). The Government deserve some credit for examining the problem and for trying to do something about it. However, they are perhaps open to criticism for rushing in too quickly with a rather poorly thought-out scheme which could lead to all sorts of problems in the future. Apart from the scheme's technical difficulties and the other problems which my right hon. Friend outlined, I think that the Inland Revenue will have physical problems handling the work load. One prays that they do not recruit the people who are coming out of the Child Support Agency scheme.

I do not like the stamp duty changes in the Budget. Many Labour Members will claim that they will affect only the rich, but that is not quite true. The tax will be paid almost exclusively in the south of England, in London and the home counties where house prices are very high. If you walk out the doors of this Chamber, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will find that £200,000 will buy only a two-bedroomed flat in central London. It is by no means only the very wealthy who will pay that tax. It will lead to less mobility of labour, which is a real problem.

I am also a little concerned about the niche areas, such as tax relief for overseas giving. That sounds like a lovely idea with which we can all identify, but it means that people will be more inclined to give to charities that are involved in overseas giving and less inclined to give to domestic charities. I must again declare an interest—although it is not a financial one—as I am a member of the board of management of the People's Dispensary for Sick Animals. I predict that worthwhile domestic charities may experience problems when they find that their income has been diminished by the Chancellor's singling out a particular group of charities in that way.

Having said that, my fundamental criticism of the Budget is that it does not address the major problem in the British economy: the level of our interest rates and the impact that that has on the parity of the pound and the competitiveness of British industry and commerce as a whole.

When the Chancellor announced his proposals for perhaps joining the euro at some time, I asked him how he would approximate interest rates. Even though our long-term interest rates have come down a little, they are still virtually double those in the rest of Europe. The approximation of those interest rates is a real problem.

There are two underlying reasons for our interest rates being so much higher than those of most of our competitors. One is that there has been an historic suspicion that British Governments will not, at the end of the day, stand up to the rigours of counteracting inflation, and that, sooner or later, a Government will let things rip a little. There has therefore been a propensity for interest rates to nudge up. The other reason has been the conduct of macro-economic policy. Although the Chancellor has engaged in fiscal tightening over the past 12 months, it has been in entirely the wrong areas—not in the areas that will damp down consumer demand, but in the areas that discourage investment and saving. That gives all the wrong messages.

Unfortunately, those wrong messages which the Chancellor has been giving have not been addressed in the Budget. It is vital that they should be addressed sooner rather than later. If we continue down our present course, we will be in great danger. The Red Book makes it clear that it is not looking for the 3 per cent. level of growth in the economy that this Government inherited—indeed, it admits that next year the rate may be as low as 1.75 per cent. It says—more in hope, I think, than in reality—that the rate will go back over 2 per cent. in the subsequent years, but not much over 2 per cent. for the whole of the predicted life of the Government.

The danger is that matters could be much worse than that. There are already clear signs that manufacturing industry is going into recession, which will inevitably have a knock-on effect on the service sector. Some elements of the service sector are already finding it difficult to compete in overseas markets. We are in danger of a severe downturn in the British economy, with a real prospect of going back into recession in a year or 18 months. I hope that the Chancellor will do something to redress that.

8.2 pm

Mr. John Grogan (Selby): We have rightly heard much in recent days about the people's Budget, the people's priorities, the people's money and the people's Chancellor. I shall change the focus slightly for a few minutes by examining the effects of the Budget on what the Conservative Prime Minister, Lord Liverpool, referred to in the last century as the people's pleasures. Early in the 19th century he warned his party not to get too involved in the strictures of Calvinism and to leave the people's pleasures well alone. Fortunately, many of the people's pleasures that he sought to conserve are still with us today, and very robust they are—namely, beer and gambling.

I have boasted in the House before that I have more coal mines in my constituency, Selby, than there are in any other constituency in the country. I shall go a step further today and say that there is a greater concentration of breweries in my constituency than anywhere else. In the small market town of Tadcaster, there are three: Sam Smith's, John Smith's and Bass. There are no fewer than 1,700 businesses in my constituency. I have had a chance to visit only 40 so far, but by some miracle of fate I have managed to fit in visits to all three breweries.

Beer brewing and the associated pub trade employ almost 1 million people. The industry can play a crucial role for the Government in helping to implement the new deal. The increase in beer prices by 1p a pint effectively index-links beer duty in line with inflation. That has no doubt been done to protect Government revenues, and if the UK were a closed market, there would be much merit in that. However, what is obviously regarded as a catching-up measure for the Treasury further increases the differential in tax rates between ourselves and France, and produces an even greater incentive for fraud and smuggling.

The 6:1 beer duty differential, which has been increasing throughout the 1990s, is a denial of the European single market. UK duty on a typical pint is now 38p including VAT. The French equivalent is 6p—a difference of 32p a pint. Every day more than 1.4 million pints of beer are coming into Britain duty free from France. That daily invasion is equal to the weekly beer sales of 1,000 small pubs and adds up to a tax loss to the Treasury of more than £235 million.

The Chancellor referred in his speech to the review by Customs and Excise of fraud and beer smuggling. I await with interest the publication of that report, but the plain fact is that fraud and smuggling are rife. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise reports that there is evidence of organised networks that employ mules, or runners, to make several journeys each day to France to buy amounts of beer up to the level of 110 litres. Once back in Dover, the beer is transferred to other vehicles and transmitted onward all over the country.

A recent "Dispatches" programme on Channel 4 suggested that Yorkshire, my home county, is a centre for the bootlegging business. One of the key characters involved is apparently known colloquially as the Slug. As a Government we promised to be tough on the causes of crime. In the Slug's case the cause of crime may well have involved a deeply unhappy childhood, but it almost certainly also involves the massive differential in duty.

Before the election the Prime Minister, in an interview with The Licensee, discussed the merits of an independent investigation into the issue. That was a good idea then and it is a good idea now. Certain economic models indicate that a cut in beer duty would increase revenues to the Government, because of the effect that it would have on the brewing industry.

[Mr. John Grogan]

As my right hon. and hon. Friends have pointed out, the Budget was historic, recasting the relationship between the tax and benefits systems, making work pay for all income levels and transforming the relationship between Labour and the business community. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is assured of his place in history, but we on the Labour Back Benches have greater ambitions for him than that. We want him to be up there with the truly great Chancellors, so on top of what he has already achieved, if he could find it in himself to cut the price of beer in the next Budget, there would be no stopping him.

I shall say a word about buses, trains and rural transport. The Budget allocated £50 million for rural public transport and £500 million for public transport generally. That is welcome, but we must recognise that for 30 or 40 years or more, public transport subsidies have been largely weighted towards the urban areas, as opposed to the rural areas. The Tories ruthlessly cut the budgets, particularly in England, of the six passenger transport authorities in the urban areas. Even so, the authorities' budgets dwarfed support for public transport in rural areas.

In an urban area, for example, West Yorkshire passenger transport authority will spend almost £100 million next year on supporting public transport. In neighbouring North Yorkshire, the figure is just £1.6 million. Fares and concessions are much more generous in urban Britain than in rural Britain. That has some perverse effects.

For example, there are seven stations in my constituency of Selby. Instead of getting on a train at one of those stations, some commuters who live in the constituency drive across the border into West Yorkshire every morning, with all the impact that that has on the environment, and get on a train there to make a significant cost saving. Some pensioners retire to the market town of Wetherby, which is just outside my constituency in West Yorkshire, rather than to the market town of Tadcaster in my constituency, simply because of the public transport concessions. The Chancellor's statement was a welcome first step, but there are tremendous challenges ahead for the Deputy Prime Minister when he makes his statement on integrated public transport.

Finally, I shall say a word about the people's money and the exchange rate. The best thing that the Government could do to ease the pressure on the pound is to do everything in their power to make sure that the single currency and EMU are a success for the countries that join in the first wave. As holders of the presidency of the European Union, we have a crucial role to play in the coming weeks. I was delighted to see the positive efforts that were made during this weekend's ECOFIN summit in York.

If the single currency works, interest rates will fall across Europe, output will be boosted and the pressure on the pound and British interest rates will ease. Conversely, if the single currency runs into difficulties, there could be increased speculative pressure on the pound. I hope that before too long Britain can join the exchange rate mechanism in preparation for a decision on the single currency early in the next century.

I think that the Budget will be remembered ultimately for two things: first, for a rejection of trickle-down economics, or the trickle-down theory, that dominated the previous Government for 20 years. They took the view that to help the poorest 20 per cent. in society we had only to wait for wealth and income to trickle down. The Budget is a rejection of that approach. Secondly, it is a recasting of the relationship between business and the political parties. Now Labour is the party of enterprise and business.

I am delighted that the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) is embarking on business breakfasts and lunches. Every English breakfast that the right hon. Gentleman has and every continental breakfast that he rejects will tell the business community that it is now only the Labour party and the Labour Government whom it can trust with this country's economic future. I think that that will be the legacy of the Budget.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have no right to impose a time limit, but I would advise hon. Members to adopt a self-imposed rule of eight minutes apiece. If that is adopted, it will be possible to call almost every Member who wishes to contribute to the debate. I am in the hands of hon. Members.

8.11 pm

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the light of your advice, I shall have to speak that much quicker.

I am grateful to be able to take up the remarks by the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan), who made an extremely good speech. If I may say so—the Government Whip probably noticed this—the hon. Gentleman was somewhat critical of the Budget. However, he spoilt it all by doing the usual bit at the end, showing how sycophantic he is.

I have an opportunity to demonstrate my gratitude to the Labour party. Apparently it sent about 400 people to my constituency to have a south-west regional conference over the weekend. I understand that some Ministers and Labour Back-Bench Members attended it. As none of them wrote to tell me that he or she would be there, I was unable to write to welcome them and to tell them what they should be looking out for.

Whenever I speak in the Chamber, I sense that hon. Members rush to the statistics which set out the wonderful 77 votes that brought me into this place. I am grateful to Labour Members for smiling. It gives me great joy to know that I beat the Labour party by 77 votes.

It seems to me that many Labour Back Benchers fail to understand why they are here. They will probably get on better in their careers if they take on board what I am about to say. We are here, of course, to represent all our constituents. We are here also to hold the Executive to account. There are 17,678 people in my constituency who voted Labour, and in many ways they are more important than the 77 votes by which the local Labour party lost.

Mr. Battle: Next time.

Mr. Bruce: It is always interesting to hear the Minister and other Labour Members say, "Next time." It was always the Liberal Democrats who used to say that. They thought that they would take five of the seats in Dorset at the general election. The Conservatives went into the election with six seats in Dorset and came out with eight. I have emphasised that there are many Labour voters in my constituency, and I wish to stress that I am in this place to represent all my constituents.

There are 17,678 incredibly disappointed people who thought that the health service would be helped by a Labour Government. Throughout the 18 years of Conservative Governments—there were not 20, but we will own up to 20 if that is wished of us. Perhaps the first two years of the Blair Administration are supposed to be part of a Tory Administration, but I rather doubt that.

Every year of Conservative government showed an increase of 3.1 per cent. above the rate of inflation in spending on the health service. On education, we always did better. Our record on social services and roads, for example, has been of benefit to the people.

We must remember that at every Budget the Chancellor of the day always has something in his gift box. He will say, "Last year, I said that I would spend only this much, but this year I shall increase that spending by £X billion." We have heard from many who have analysed the miserly sum that has gone into the health services in all of our constituencies under the current Administration.

What has local government been given? As for expenditure on education, for every extra £1 that we were supposed to have £1.40 has been taken away from social services, from the elderly and from expenditure on roads. In addition, we have enormous tax rises. Increases of three or four times the rate of inflation are the norm in Dorset.

In some ways, we were looking forward to asking, "If this is a wonderful new reforming Government that will help to create jobs, what will it do for regional policy?" The South Dorset economic partnership has announced that it is closing because it receives no funds to keep it going. That partnership was causing unemployment in the area to decrease month after month. We are starting now to see the turn-round of our economy, but we need the partnership if we are to continue to go ahead.

We have not heard yet how much the defence budget will be cut in real terms. I understand that that is shortly to be announced.

I thought that I would be able to congratulate the Government on one point. I went on radio and said, "It looks very much as if I as a fat-cat business man will benefit from the nice situation of reducing capital gains tax right down to 10 per cent." What did we find? We found that the Government were doing away with the capital gains retirement relief and introducing a 10 per cent. capital gains rate. The Chancellor was saying from the Dispatch Box that he was doing something for small business men when in fact he was increasing the amount of tax that he would take off such people after they had built up their businesses, retired, and sold out. That is an interesting little twist.

What about millennium gift aid? The Government have gone to the lottery month after month, saying, "We have decided that the lottery will pay for this or that Government policy." They are even saying now, "We would like you to give to charity and, by the way, we would like you to focus on education and poverty relief." Bearing in mind their policies, the Government want people to give to charity to bail them out.

I have difficulty in following the logic of many people when they talk about the stability of the pound. The pound that I have taken from my pocket is stable. We can all see that it is stable. If I put it flat down on the Bench, it stays where it is. Things are more difficult if it is placed on its edge. In relation to what is the pound supposed to be stable?

It is useful to look back to the speeches of Lord Shore of Stepney. He always talked very well about these matters. In fact, he had a speech which he delivered regularly in the House. As older Members will say, "If you get a good speech, stick to it." It is interesting that in 1990, when we had just entered the ERM, Lord Shore, as he now is, was predicting everything that is currently going wrong throughout Europe and how we would have to get out of the ERM.

Against that background, the Government are saying that they want to go into the European single currency. Yet they refuse to go into the ERM. People are asking, "How can we keep the pound stable?" Of course we can keep the pound stable if we go into the ERM and insist that our partners help to keep the pound at a stable level.

Why are we not doing that? I would have thought by now that we all understood that the rush to get a stable pound is an illusion. Against what is the pound stable? We can run our economy wonderfully well but what if we decide that we want zero growth? Is that stability? Is zero growth in employment or productivity stability? We are seeking not to have boom-and-bust economics. I understand that and accept that that is something we should be going for. Every time a British Chancellor says, "I'm going for a stable pound," he is saying stable in relation to the deutschmark or the dollar, and that depends on other people and the way in which they keep their currencies going.

One will never achieve total stability in currency, but one has to manage the economy. It was Lord Shore of Stepney—when in this place, and pretty much on this Bench—who said that giving the power to the Bank of England to set interest rates was total nonsense, because bankers can always keep to the narrow requirements of keeping a stable currency, or keeping inflation down, but they do not have the responsibility of managing the economy, which is so important and which the Government gave away almost on day one when they came to power. They believe that they can simply tell people, "It's not our fault that the pound is at an unsustainable level as far as our exports are concerned." They refuse to do anything about it.

What about the change to national insurance? If people pay average wages, they will more or less not be affected, but if they pay above average wages, they will subsidise those who pay below average wages. A Labour Government are suggesting that that is a good idea. I do not understand it, and we need an explanation of what is happening.

The hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley) refused to accept that the ratio of taxes to GDP had gone up. He said that that was because of the windfall tax. He must look at the Red Book—the "Un-Red Book" as far as the Labour party is concerned. Even without the windfall tax, taxes have risen as a proportion of GDP and will continue to rise despite the fact that we shall lose the windfall tax from the figures.

What about child care? We all understand that the social security budget needs to be kept under control. I understand why the policy is not coming into effect until October 1999: the Government do not have a clue how they will introduce it. They say that they will give £5,060 a year—the 70 per cent. of the £7,800 a year that people would have to pay—to pay for child care, when an individual on a 30-hour week at £3.50 an hour will earn only £5,060. The Government will double that amount, with all the additional things in child care.

[Mr. Bruce]

The previous Government got into a complete mess with the Child Support Agency. I have always said that and believe it to be true, but that mess was not predicted. That was not the criticism of the CSA. [Interruption.] Please look at what happened under the poll tax and the Child Support Agency. Learn from the mistakes that we made when in government. The whole idea that the state will take over child care for low-paid people is a mistake, because we tried to look at it when we were in government, and it just would not have worked.

The test of any Budget is whether it will create jobs. The Government do not even expect it to, yet that is what their policy is supposed to do. The only thing that I can see coming out of it is that nursery assistants in 2000 will have a boom. What about my farmers' incomes? What about the leisure industry, which will have to find the minimum wage? What about the defence industry? The number of its tanks will be halved, which will affect my constituents. What about pensioners, who are totally under the Government's hammer? What about education? Teachers will be sacked soon. What about health? The Government should expand the number of people in the health sector. None of that is coming out of the Budget, and I believe that we should reject it tonight.

8.23 pm

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I am glad to have the opportunity to speak in the debate, because, for the first time in 15 years, I welcome the Government's Budget, as it is a change of direction and a positive move for the best. My constituency is in the top five in terms of numbers employed in the manufacturing sector, and a considerable number of my constituents are low paid. In 1983, Burnley elected me—by a slight majority—over the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce). It made a sensible decision.

The hon. Gentleman showed a £1 coin a few moments ago. It was the Tory party that said that it would allow the pound to float. We know what the floating pound did during the 18 years in which the Tories were in office—it sank. I have an old £1 note. Think about what that was worth in May 1979. Compared with the hon. Gentleman's £1 coin, there was massive inflation and erosion of the pound during the Tories' period in office.

The Budget is good for jobs, good for industry and good for Burnley. It is particularly good for the low-paid. It has to be considered with what we are doing on the national minimum wage, which is crucial in an area such as mine. The Budget must also be considered with what we have done about VAT on fuel.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the national health service and education, and asked what we have done in the 10 months since we have been in office. People outside know what would have happened if a Tory Government had been elected on 1 May last year, and they are glad that we have a Labour Government. They know what VAT on fuel would have been. Let us remember that, before the general election, it would have gone up to 17.5 per cent. We kept it at 8 per cent., and have now reduced it to 5 per cent. That is crucial to the low-paid and those on low incomes.

I welcome the move to the working families tax credit, which is long overdue. We should have done that many years ago. Many people who are eligible for family credit do not claim it. It has one of the lowest take-up rates of any benefit. It is nonsense to expect people to take up the jobs advertised in the jobcentre and the newspapers if they end up worse off than when they were on benefit. The Budget is a move in the right direction.

The change to child care is long overdue. I welcome what the Government intend to do on that.

The cuts in corporation tax to 30 per cent., and the small business tax to 20 per cent., are welcome. I recognise that we need to have industry and commerce to create wealth for this country so that the Government can have money for the social dividend, to spend on education, the welfare state, the health service and all the other things that we want to see.

Last Wednesday, the Lancashire Evening Telegraph wrote:

"But there was a warm welcome from shops spokesman Rita Walsh, who said the Chancellor's measure would put cash into the pockets of the poor, providing a much-needed boost for retailers.

Mrs. Walsh, secretary of Burnley and District Chamber of Trade, said she had expected a balanced Budget, favouring the less well-off, and that is what the Chancellor had delivered."

That is important, as we must recognise that, when the poor get additional money, they spend it, because they need to—they cannot save it. The option for the poor to save is not really there. They need the money. They need to spend it, whether on food, clothing or whatever, to improve their standard of living.

Last Friday, I visited the Potterton Myson factory in Padiham, in my constituency. It has just announced a further 125 jobs as a result of consolidation and bringing some work from Warwick. It is wary about the value of the pound—DM3.06 to the pound makes trading difficult. It is the leading manufacturer in its field in this country, and it wants to be the leading manufacturer in Europe.

Industries in my constituency believe that we need to be in the euro as soon as possible, and they condemn the previous Government for having failed to get us into a position where we could join it at the start. They will in any event have to trade in it, so it is crucial that we join as soon as possible. I visited Smurfit in the afternoon, and people there expressed exactly the same view about the European currency. They are in the paper industry and have to compete with other Europeans, and they think it wrong that we will be left on the side.

One or two Conservative Members have mentioned interest rates. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) spoke. I think that he is condemned particularly on two counts. First, he did not move ahead on the euro. I do not believe that he had the power or the ability to do so, because he was a minority voice in his own party. Secondly, there was the question of interest rates. I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should have increased interest rates long before the general election. Why did he not do so? Because he put the political interests of the Conservative party above the interests of the country: I have no doubt of that.

I must utter one slight criticism of the Budget. I refer to duty on liquid petroleum gas. Lucas Aerospace, in my constituency, makes gas bottles for the vehicles involved, having developed its process from making cases for the multi-launcher rocket system. It has converted that technology, in one of the best defence diversifications. It believes that the market is growing; it also believes that the Government have failed to provide a sufficient incentive to persuade people to convert to the use of an environmentally friendly fuel. Italy has 2 million vehicles on liquid petroleum gas, while this country has only 2,000.

I remind Ministers that, after the introduction of unleaded fuel in this country, the Environment Select Committee produced a report—it was produced some years ago, under the chairmanship of Sir Hugh Rossi and during my membership—recommending a differential encouraging people to opt for unleaded fuel. In their first Budget, the Government introduced a very small differential. They were condemned by an emergency report from the Committee saying that they needed to do more. They increased the differential, which speeded up the conversion. I urge my colleagues to consider the matter, because I think we should be doing more.

I think it right to move the Contributions Agency to the Inland Revenue. They have been collected together and paid together for a long time, and I think it right for us to merge them in April 1999.

Unlike the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), I think that what has been proposed for overseas aid is absolutely right. It is also in line with what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development is doing, and demonstrates the Government's belief that, although we must act in this country, we also have responsibilities in the wider world, and are prepared to put our money where our mouth is.

8.32 pm

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the rhetoric of his Budget, on his press coverage, and on certain measures—particularly the increase in child benefit, which strikes me as a simple move, unlikely to cause fraud, and intended to benefit families.

What worries me is the fact that the Budget was pretty thin on long-term strategy. It was a ragbag of measures. I also fear that, in many ways, the Chancellor has washed his hands of active economic policy. Much has already been said on the subject, but I want to make my point. Effectively, the Chancellor's actions say, "Yes, use the interest rate and the exchange rate as a manager of this economy. Allow higher interest rates and a higher exchange rate to take the strain and cool down the overheating."

That risks causing much the same results as we saw in the early 1980s and the early 1990s. It is also entirely inconsistent with standing up and saying, "This is a Budget for stability—a Budget for exchange rate stability." Sterling will appreciate further, but as and when the United Kingdom moves into recession, as it surely will by 2000, the sterling trade-weighted exchange rate will depreciate, and the exchange rate will be used as the only positive economic regulator.

The Budget also involved acts of what I would describe as disingenuousness—attempts to mislead the public into perceiving something good where there was actually something bad. Much has been said about that already. It was fine to reduce corporation tax rates, but accelerating payments will cost an extra £4.6 billion through to 2001, which was not so fine. As for mortgage tax relief, we had all forgotten that it had been cut to 10 per cent. only nine months ago.

The changes in capital gains tax have already been mentioned. In my view, they are much more arbitrary than the indexation arrangement that they will replace. There is an alleged new attractive rate for entrepreneurs. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) said, most entrepreneurs cannot meet the criteria to qualify. I welcome the further thought that the Government will devote to the matter, but, as the measure stands, it really is empty. As for the changes to bed and breakfasting, I think that they are wrong, and will contribute to inefficiency in capital markets.

I suppose that I should declare an interest as a PEP investor as well as a PEP manager. Let me make just one simple point about that much-discussed subject. After all the hoo-hah, let us remember that it was possible to save £10,800 per annum in combined single-company and other PEPs and TESSAs; that has now been halved. In fact, the Chancellor has been very clever. He has gained credit for not implementing the £50,000 cap, but people have forgotten that the amount they can save has been halved.

Let me return briefly to the point about economic management. In the present circumstances, the only relatively painless option is to encourage savings. It would have been possible, for instance, to encourage building society windfalls to be saved last summer. That is part of the cause of the over-consumption that has got under way. As the Red Book shows, the Government are poised to produce a policy designed to reduce savings.

Let me make some points that have not already been made about welfare changes. I am worried about the way in which the national insurance changes will work. There are bunched areas within the £107 to £450-a-week wages level in which there are disincentives to employing people. I fear that we will follow the pattern of the United States, which will mean a tremendous increase in the number of companies employing part-time workers to cut national insurance costs, particularly as and when the economy turns down. That has happened in the United States for similar reasons. Although, at the lower end, the changes will be enormously welcome in creating jobs, I fear that there will be disincentives further up the line.

Much has been said about the working families tax credit. In certain American states where it appears to have been successful, there has been the stick of no benefits after one or two years as well as the carrot. I agree with other Conservative Members that these measures have been rushed in, in an attempt to copy Clinton, without having been thought through. My right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) presented the situation brilliantly. He explained that the poverty trap was being increased to the limit with regard to the number of people with a 60 per cent. tax rate poverty trap.

I welcome the aims of the Budget, and hope that they will succeed, but I am worried about the increase of around 800,000 to 1.4 million in the number of people who will benefit under the working families tax credit. That strikes me as contrary to the Government's pledge to contain welfare expenditure. I am sure that, unless changed, the child care arrangements will naturally result in neighbours using neighbours—after all, people are human—and that the cost is likely to be closer to £5 billion than £1.25 billion a year. That may deserve further consideration before it becomes law.

[Mr. Howard Flight]

For many ordinary people, petrol and, for a smoker such as myself, cigarettes are inelastic necessities, and much will be taken in duty on such items from less-well-off people; the net position of many people at the bottom of society will not be much better.

Evidence from the past three years shows that an increasing number of married mothers or mothers who live with a partner want to stay at home with their children as soon as they can afford to do so. As the vicar of my parish church preached yesterday, the Budget is wrong to offer fiscal encouragement to bring up someone else's children. Equality must surely be ensured between the two; children are better off with their mother until they are at least six or seven.

Little has been said about the proposed anti-avoidance provisions. Every business transaction will have to be given anti-avoidance clearance by the Revenue. Canada introduced a similar provision, but its Revenue fibbed when it said that it has only 240 officers: it has 600 highly paid, top men and women, who have to make complicated assessments. Our Revenue does not have such resources, but the last thing that we want is for businesses to move their headquarters elsewhere because of massive complications in securing anti-avoidance clearances on commercial transactions.

There is a crucial difference in Anglo-Saxon culture between avoidance and evasion. No man is bound to pay more tax than he need, but not paying what he should is against the law. In continental Europe, the difference is blurred, and anyone who conducts business there will find that a problem. I believe that there is an element in the Budget, whereby it is suggested that avoidance and evasion are the same. That is unhealthy for this country's commercial integrity.

Other hon. Members have dismissed the point, but I have ground through the figures, and have found that, before the Budget, taking into account the increases in the community charge, an average family has been paying an additional £780 in taxes since 1 May, and the figure has now increased to just over £1,000. I fear that this Government will repeat our mistakes, and that the average family will have a higher tax burden, yet the average family is expected to bring up children properly, set an example, support charities and be leaders in society.

There is no merit in constantly loading taxes on the average family. Benefits must be spread broadly to help the less well-off, and they must be financed from a growing economy, and not by raising taxes on average, ordinary families.

8.42 pm

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, North and Leith): The two central themes of the Budget can be found by focusing on two pages of the Red Book: page 68, which highlights the remarkable redistributive heart of the Budget, and page 83, which describes the primary objective of increasing the sustainable growth rate of the economy. The former may be more exciting, but the latter is just as important, because the Government's success in increasing the sustainable rate of growth will determine how much we can redistribute and how quickly we can expand public services.

I understand those who want a big-bang approach to public expenditure, but we must never forget the serious structural deficit that we inherited and which had to be dealt with. We shall not do anyone any favours if we increase public expenditure in an unsustainable and economically counter-productive way. I therefore welcome the first-ever framework for monetary and fiscal stability and the Budget's many specific measures to address the under-investment, instability and structural weaknesses that we inherited.

A contrary view to those positions—or, rather, a contrary confusion—was expressed by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who simultaneously criticised tax increases and advocated even greater tax rises. As Samuel Brittan wrote in the Financial Times,

> "It is just not realistic to suppose that any Chancellor would increase taxes and pile up cash surpluses because of some highly debateable belief that he would enable interest rates to come down."

It is difficult to be euphoric about macro-economics, so I shall leave the subject, but that word describes how I felt when I heard about the redistributive measures in the Budget. This is the first Budget for 20 years to redistribute towards the poor, especially towards poor families.

That is the exact opposite of what the Tories did for 18 years, under whom families, especially poor families, suffered most. That is clearly shown by a book, "Taxes Down, Taxes Up", which was published by the Institute for Fiscal Studies in 1994. The Chancellor understandably prefers to say that his proposal is a redistribution in favour of work, because those paying tax will begin to do so at 50 per cent. of average earnings instead of at 25 per cent. The changes to national insurance contributions and, above all, the working families tax credit, which contains a child care element, will lead to job creation and increased pay.

I was a little concerned before the Budget about the working families tax credit, and I still hope that the presumption is that it will be paid to the woman in a couple, but we all welcome the massive advance that the changes proposed in working families tax credit represent. It proposes a higher applicable amount than family credit, more support for younger children and a reduction in the problem of steep tapers.

The outstanding problem, as the Government know, is housing benefit. I urge them to make a low-rent policy a foundation of their housing and welfare-to-work policies. That must be their starting point for reform of housing benefit.

The Budget addressed many of the barriers to employment, of which child care was the greatest. This is the first Government in British history who regard child care as an essential part of economic policy as well as of children's policy and of equal opportunities policy. A lone-parent constituent told me a month ago that she had had to give up work because she was on maximum family credit and could therefore receive no child care support. Under our proposals, she and hundreds of thousands of others will have 70 per cent. of their child care costs paid.

Other barriers must be addressed. I welcome the introduction of a training element to the new deal for lone parents. I hope that it can be expanded in accordance with some of the suggestions of the Select Committee on Education and Employment. The gateway and other training, education, confidence-building and support measures should be opened to them.

I also welcome the linking rule, which deals with the work disincentive element of the original lone parent benefit cuts.

Not only those in work will benefit from the Budget. I particularly welcome the income-related benefits that will help children under 11. Recent research suggests that the gap between the amounts available to under-11s and over-11s is too big. The lone parent cuts in income support will be made up by next April, and for new claimants with more than one child under 11, the gap will be more than made up. I welcome the progress that has been made in that regard since December.

The problem that remains, however, is the time lag, and it applies also to lone parent in-work benefits. Changes will be made for lone parents in April, June and November 1998 and April 1999. I make the simple proposal that all the changes should be made simultaneously in April 1999. That would be more or less revenue neutral.

One other group not in work is pensioners. I welcome the large amount of money given to them in the summer Budget, but there is a problem with tenements. In certain Scottish cities, some pensioners have received £10 rather than £20 because of the way in which some tenement addresses are classified. I hope that that will not happen again, and that the Benefits Agency will ensure that the appropriate amount goes to every pensioner.

The Budget is a defining moment for the Government. I welcome its core themes of redistribution and sustainable growth. I am delighted that we are back on course to deliver old Labour objectives in a new Labour way.

8.50 pm

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): I want to focus on what the Budget tells us about the future direction of fiscal strategy. Like the hon. Member for Rochdale (Lorna Fitzsimons), I welcomed the pre-Budget report, which allowed consultation before the Budget. The amount of detail contained in the Red Book about the direction of fiscal policy is also welcome and remarkable.

The Red Book gives projections of expenditure and revenue. In his Budget speech, the Chancellor made much of the need to look forward. The proposed fiscal code will make detailed assumptions and projections about public finances. In future, we shall not need to be Mystic Megs to predict what the Chancellor is likely to say on Budget day.

An analysis of the Government's forecasts on fiscal policy shows that there is a positive story to tell. That begs the question why the Government are not taking more action on public services now. If the fiscal projections in the Red Book are correct, in the next three years the Chancellor will be able to say that there is a Budget surplus, that the Government are cutting taxes and that he wants massively to increase spending on public services. That is the message of the Red Book.

The number of sweepstakes on how often the Chancellor will use the word "prudent" in his Budget address will mushroom. He may be prudent in the future, but is his current approach to expenditure on public services prudent? Liberal Democrats argue that the bust-boom approach to funding of public services is imprudent, and will have a detrimental impact on the infrastructure of public services, on the lives of those who use services such as health and education, and on the careers of the professionals working in the services.

Why are the Government taking such an imprudent approach to the management of the public sector? Is it because of their manifesto pledge, about which we have heard so much? As my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said, they have already broken that pledge because they have not kept to the agreed departmental ceilings. I believe that the reason has to do with the comprehensive spending review. I am glad that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is present, because he may want to confirm or deny my contention.

The Government's approach to fiscal policy is based on realpolitik, and has damaging implications for public services. They have said to Whitehall and to the various spending Ministers, "There will be no money for you in the first two years, so you will have to concentrate on your comprehensive spending reviews." That may be a sensible pre-election strategy in the run-up to the next poll, but it is not a sensible way to manage public services.

The figures in the Red Book show that delaying the inevitable increase in funding for public services is unnecessary and ill advised. The Government are being highly pessimistic about the public sector borrowing requirement. Despite massive reductions in the PSBR in the past two or three years, it is projected to be in a small surplus in two years' time. We believe that it is likely to be in surplus next year, and in the following years there will be a much larger surplus than is projected.

The figures represent a large growth in public spending. Obscure note 3 of table 1.2 on page 11 of the Red Book says that public spending growth is assumed to be 2¼ per cent. in real terms. That is three times the growth for this year and that projected for next year. If such an increase in public spending is accounted for by the figures now, why not bring it forward a year, so that public sector managers can plan and invest properly and can make long-term decisions? Public services lack stability because the Government are not investing in them now.

Another reason why the PSBR is so pessimistically projected in the Red Book is that revenue forecasts are ridiculously low. The figures show that Customs and Excise is making incredibly low predictions for future VAT revenues. That may make a difference of more than £8 billion between now and the next election.

There is an assumption that no changes, apart from those already announced, will be made in future tax rates and allowances. As this Budget and the July Budget has shown, that is a highly unrealistic assumption.

Even if we take the Government's pessimistic approach to public finances, the figures predict a huge surplus. Between the financial years 1998–99 and 2002–03, there will be an accumulative Budget surplus of £123 billion. Despite that surplus, the Government are not prepared, for the coming financial year, to provide an extra £1 billion for health and an extra £1 billion for education. Why are they being so parsimonious when their figures suggest that they need not be? We know why the Government are building up this war chest.

[Mr. Edward Davey]

I welcome the fiscal code that the Government intend to introduce, the whole point of which should be to introduce stability in the management of public finances. We support such a laudable aim, but why start off with such bogus and pessimistic assumptions? Governments of whatever colour seem to be depressed and suffering from psychological disorders. At the beginning of a Parliament they are pessimistic about how things will turn out, and in the Budget before the election they become optimistic, and suddenly the growth rate has increased and the PSBR has vanished. We are on some sort of mental roller-coaster, but government needs mental stability. Perhaps that would be slightly more boring, but it would be more honest. The Government should have started with honest assumptions in the Red Book.

I should like to comment on the detail of the proposed fiscal code. The Government derive much of their thinking on the code from the experience of the New Zealand Government's fiscal responsibility legislation. However, they have missed some key elements in that legislation, one of which is vital in the context of the Government's war chest. The New Zealand measure requires the Treasury to publish four to six weeks before an election the assumptions behind the Budget and the fiscal projections. If the Government were sincere about taking politics out of fiscal policy to produce a more stable approach, they would include such a provision. I hope that they will do that in Committee.

When Liberal Democrats comment on Government policy, the Government say, "You are imprudent. It is right for the Government to be cautious. Look what happened to the Tories in the mid-1980s, when they cut taxes in the belief that they had reached fiscal nirvana. It is right for us to get away from such Victorian mismanagement." Liberal Democrats agree that the Government should not repeat Tory mistakes. We call not for £6 billion of tax cuts but for £1 billion to £2 billion extra for the public services now. That is a sensible approach and is not lacking in caution.

The Government are making a serious mistake. Trying to turn round the public services after years of mismanagement by the Tories is like trying to turn the Titanic.

Mr. Ian Bruce: It is like refloating it.

Mr. Davey: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is right. The Secretary of State for Health has problems with waiting lists. The pledge to reduce them by 100,000 has not materialised: they have increased by 100,000. Time and resources are required, and if the Government delay investment in the health service, tackling the problems will be that much more difficult. The same applies to class sizes. We should reflect on the day-to-day realities of managing public services. Professional staff are the core of our schools and hospitals, and if they are not properly funded, they will go away and graduates will not go into medicine or teaching. There will be massive recruitment problems.

This morning, at a primary school in my constituency, the head teacher told me about the massive problem not just in Kingston and Surbiton but throughout the country of recruiting deputy heads and head teachers. Because of the hassle of ever-growing administration, it is not financially viable. If the Government do not invest in our public services, they will lose the support of the staff, the people who make things happen. That is the danger of delaying investment.

On a slightly more positive note, the Government's approach to future fiscal policy by the use of consultation papers and comprehensive spending reviews should be supported. For example, the consultation paper on the reform of the tax and benefits system and the report from the chief executive of Barclays bank contained some welcome ideas. It is clear that the Government took the easy elements of that consultation paper and put them in the Budget, but Mr. Taylor outlined more difficult choices that the Government may have to face. I shall not go into details, but I hope that the Government will allow an early debate on those matters, so that we can get to grips with some of the tricky issues that are well set out in those consultation papers.

It is ironic that although the Government are trying to take a longer-term view of economic policy, have given control of interest rates to the Bank of England, have published a fiscal code and are trying to widen and rationalise debate on economic policy, the Budget is one of the most political Budgets of all time. There were many leaks before the Budget about the possibility of hitting the middle class, but it was not hit. I do not condemn the Government for not hitting it, but those leaks show the political tone and the background of the Budget.

The timing of the tax and spending decisions in the Budget is political. Some of the taxes will hit us now, so that the Chancellor can draw cash to the Treasury's coffers, but spending will occur in three or four years—close to the next general election. Why could not child benefit have been increased from April? The only reason for the delay is the Government's political planning. There are political calculations in the PSBR forecast and in the Government's bust-boom approach to the public services over the life of this Parliament. It will become clear that the Government's political judgment is wrong. It will take a long time to turn round the public services, but the ambition should be to have the world's best public services. The Government say that they have new ambitions for Britain, but they are not prepared to invest in our public services. Their words are hollow.

9.4 pm

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): I listened carefully to the closely argued speech of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) and I still cannot tell whether he and his party are optimistic or pessimistic about the Budget. I am optimistic. We have been in government for almost a year, and perhaps this is an appropriate time to take stock of our stewardship of the economy and of the Chancellor's Budget judgment of where we are going.

Everyone has said that the Budget is neutral, and from the achievements so far and from the Treasury projections it is easy to see why people say that. Inflation is at 3 per cent. and is set to reduce to 2.5 per cent. in 1999 and beyond. That is the target range that has been set for the Monetary Policy Committee. The public sector borrowing requirement is £5 billion, which is some £14 billion lower than the figure that was projected by the previous Government, and it is due to be in balance by the millennium. According to the Red Book, we are well on the way to fulfilling the golden rule of the economic cycle that was introduced by the Chancellor in July.

Growth is running at 2 to 2.5 per cent. and is to be held within the range of 1.75 to 2.75 per cent. over the next two years. That is at or near the trend growth rate for the economy. According to the Red Book, the debt to GDP ratio will be 52 per cent. this year and will decline to 47 per cent. by the millennium. That more than fulfils the fiscal rules that were set by the Chancellor in July. Of course, the Chancellor's fiscal stance is only one aspect of the Budget and in some respects it is not the most important. The Budget is emphatically for jobs and families and it will stand or fall on the Chancellor's judgment about refashioning the welfare state.

The signs are modestly optimistic. The headlines and the editorial comment in the press the day after the Budget were consistently favourable. Even the Daily Mail, which sees itself as the voice of middle Britain, pronounced the Budget "sound and sober". The only body that simply refuses to find anything good to say about the Budget proposals is the Conservative party, which persists with the fiction of a golden legacy, conveniently forgetting that it did not appear very golden to the electorate in May.

Critical to the success of the Budget will be the measures to deal with the poverty trap. I welcome the Chancellor's endorsement of child benefit as one of the pillars of a modern tax and benefit system. He has also reaffirmed that the benefit will remain universal and continue to be paid directly to the parent with primary responsibility for the children. That is all to be welcomed.

Many low-paid families will also benefit from the introduction of the working families tax credit, which will replace family credit and is designed to provide a minimum guaranteed income to families on low pay. In the process, it will turn a benefit into a tax credit and help to overcome the stigma that continues to ensure that around 30 per cent. of people who are eligible for family credit simply do not claim it. However, payment through the tax system brings its own problems, which have been recognised by including an option for the working families tax credit to be paid to either parent.

The third policy change that will boost the earnings of the low-paid is the reduction in national insurance contributions. That is calculated to be worth £65 a year and will benefit a significant number of the low-paid. The combination of all three changes will provide a powerful boost to the incomes of many families, but we have to recognise that the changes will interact with other benefits, notably housing benefit, and that this is but a first step—a radical and imaginative first step—in developing the new welfare state.

I should like to give a special mention to one of the smaller initiatives that is tucked away in the Budget. The announcement of a £50 million venture capital fund will be warmly welcomed in my constituency. The Lee Valley business innovation centre is sited there and, in association with Middlesex university, supports many small businesses in the area. In association with the local authority, the centre is developing a science park. The university challenge fund—to promote enterprise and high-tech growth—is just what it needs to turn scientific discoveries into commercially viable projects. It will help to unlock the talents and ingenuity in our universities and to channel them into the creation of wealth and jobs.

I should like to comment on the Government's long-term ambition to secure economic stability and the role in that objective of the code for fiscal stability. The code will enshrine the need for transparency and accountability in Britain's economic policy framework. It will strengthen the credibility of fiscal and debt management, much as the new monetary policy framework has done for the setting of interest rates. It will be underpinned by detailed reporting arrangements and proper accounting methods. The code demonstrates again the Government's commitment to maintaining and strengthening the credibility of their economic policies.

The Budget is both prudent and ambitious. It creates stability, but begins the task of modernising the tax and benefit system. That purpose is worth supporting, and I commend the Budget to the House.

9.11 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The Budget is a triumph of style over substance, yet no hon. Member should doubt for one moment that the substance is deeply damaging—to taxpayers, to country dwellers and to the economy as a whole. In the short time available, I shall deal with each of those three points.

First, let us address the subject of taxation. Earlier in the debate, we witnessed the interesting spectacle of revisionism rampant on the Labour Benches, as Government Back Benchers misrepresented the record of past promises, to distort the reality of what has transpired since the general election. We need to be explicit about what was said by Labour Front Benchers before the election.

The Prime Minister said—it was reported in the Financial Times on 21 September 1996—that there was no plan to increase taxes at all. In April 1997, an explicit statement was made by the then shadow Chancellor that Labour had no public spending commitments that would require extra taxes. Therefore, there was a reference to no plans for increases in taxes at all and a second reference to no requirement for extra taxes. It was not simply a question—as the President of the Board of Trade implied—of a commitment not to raise rates of income tax. The commitment was clear and explicit: Labour said that it had no plans to increase tax at all. Those pledges have been betrayed. That trust has been broken. The Government have reneged on the many words on this subject that were uttered before the general election.

What we know now from the Red Book is that taxes will rise from 38.1 to 40.1 per cent. of gross domestic product by 2002-03. The Budget increases taxes. The Government then positively intend to increase taxes in each and every one of the succeeding four years. That is the plan, and that is the policy that the Government will deliver. It means that the proportion of GDP raised from income tax will rise from 9.5 to 11.1 per cent. Whatever the mirrors deployed by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in responding to the debate, he cannot gainsay the reality of the written word of the Red Book and the financial statement.

Let it be clearly understood that the Government believe that Britons are taxed too little and should be taxed more. That is what the Government intend. They believe that not only individuals but businesses are too lightly taxed. The first signal of the intention further to raise business taxes came in the Budget, which contains a net increase in business taxation of £2.2 billion. That will not increase employment, it will reduce it; it will not enhance competitiveness, it will undermine it; it will not make our country more prosperous, it will make us relatively and, potentially, absolutely poorer. Those are the consequence of the Government's policies, even if they are not the intention.

[Mr. John Bercow]

The Chief Secretary should not deny for one moment the intention, set out in the Budget, to increase employer national insurance contributions for higher-paid workers. Earlier, the President of the Board of Trade was challenged to explain how that increase in taxes upon business could help the process of employing higher-paid workers, could assist their retention, and could advance the cause of high-technology and knowledge-based companies in the international marketplace as they seek to develop. Answer came there none, as the right hon. Lady was visibly under pressure, flummoxed and deprived of any coherent answer to the attack that was made. I recognise that the Chief Secretary is an altogether more sophisticated operator, so I hope that he will manage a better reply than the right hon. Lady was able to give.

That is the reality of the increase in taxation, although I readily concede that the Prime Minister was supremely ignorant of the contents of the Budget delivered last week by his Chancellor—an ignorance that he displayed not only in front of the House, but in front of millions of television viewers during Prime Minister's Question Time last week. That is the first criticism we make. Labour has two favourite sports, new Labour as much as old Labour. One is to raise taxes and the other is, by a variety of ingenious means and devices, to create new taxes.

The second criticism, specifically representing the concerns expressed to me by my constituents, is the Government's attack on country dwellers. That comes in the form of a dramatic, swingeing increase in road fuel duty. The Government have imposed an additional burden of £2.75 billion on people in rural communities who drive cars. Let no one underestimate the scale of that imposition. A rural dweller with a car, who has the temerity to drive it 20,000 miles per year—that is not uncommon or untypical—will face an increased burden of £160 per year as a consequence of the Government's measures. That is damaging; it does not provide a work incentive for those who need a car to travel to work; it does not do anything to encourage the inhabitants of rural communities. It is the latest instalment in a systematic and inconsiderate attack by an urban-dominated Government on the inhabitants of our rural communities.

If the Chief Secretary believes that that is amusing, he should think again. The number of times that Conservative Members heard that grievance expressed on the countryside march was too numerous to count. If the urban Minister thinks that that is insignificant, he is insensitive and can in no sense claim to speak for a one-nation Administration.

The Institute of Directors, in its characteristically restrained and understated fashion, said that the two increases in road fuel duty in less than a year were regrettable. How right it was. For the Chancellor of the Exchequer to offer, as a sop to those whom he has just clobbered, a £50 million rural transport fund—supposedly to bolster public transport services in the countryside—borders on an insult. If it is to mean anything, why did he not set a target for the increase in public transport services that would result from that policy? How many more journeys does he expect that there will be? What decline in the reliance on the car will result from that infusion of funds?

If the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chief Secretary cannot estimate what the change in behaviour will be, we can deduce only that they have not got a clue and perhaps do not seriously intend a change of policy. They have patronisingly given rural dwellers a proverbial pat on the head—the fund amounts to nothing more than that. That is why the anger of rural communities will continue to be visited on the heads of the Administration.

As I said, the Budget will damage the economy. I do not expect the Chief Secretary—or the Financial Secretary, one of the great authorities on tax and excise duties, who is now present on the Treasury Bench—to take that assessment from me. I invite them instead to take it from a distinguished economist, Professor Doug McWilliams, formerly of the Confederation of British Industry and now of the Centre for Economic and Business Research, who predicted that the Government's policies would have damaging consequences. He said that there would be a 5.6 per cent. reduction in non-Government investment in our economy relative to what would have happened if the Conservative Administration had continued; that there would be a £3.8 billion reduction in gross domestic product relative to what would have been achieved under the Conservatives; and that there would be a relative decline in output. He confidently predicted that the Government's misguided and uninformed policies would, by 2002-03, result in 95,000 more people being unemployed than would otherwise have been.

In their Budget, the Government have nothing of which to be proud and much of which to be ashamed. That is why Conservative Members will take pleasure in voting against the Budget tonight. It is bad for the economy, bad for communities and bad for Britain—it deserves to be rejected.

9.22 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): This debate, which has lasted for four days, has been very revealing. The string and the wrapping paper have come off the Budget, which now looks much less attractive than it did last Tuesday. The Economist said:

"The fact is that the Budget was a muddle . . . it lacked an organising idea."

Today's debate has again failed to supply an organising idea to the Chancellor's intentions. Last Wednesday and Thursday, the Government could not even provide enough speakers from their own ranks to support the Budget, and the debate had to be carried on by a series of speakers from the Opposition.

There was much waffle in the Budget statement. The Chancellor said that it was the people's Budget—it was the people's this and the people's that. He said:

"The Chancellor is above all the guardian of the people's money."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1099.]

That is a bit rich coming from someone who has agreed in principle—if, as he hopes, we join the European currency—to hand over control of foreign currency and gold reserves to the European central bank in Frankfurt.

If the Budget had an attempt at an organising aim, it was to get people off welfare and into work. We share that aim. Indeed, the social security reforms pushed through by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor were all designed to make work more attractive, and when we had the money we always reduced the burden of direct taxation on the low-paid.

The difference between us and the present Government is that, in office, we did more to achieve that aim. We not only reformed the welfare state but delivered an economy—the golden economic legacy referred to by my right hon. and hon. Friends throughout the debate—in which unemployment was low and falling. One of the crucial ways in which we did that was by creating a flexible labour market.

The Chancellor claims those achievements as his own, to the extent of lecturing other member states of the European Union on the subject of the need for flexibility in labour markets. He is a cadet member of the Robin Cook school of diplomacy, and his remarks create almost as much resentment as the Foreign Secretary's. Other member states know that, when the Chancellor was in opposition, not only did he do nothing to create the flexible labour market but he opposed all the measures which we enacted over 18 years to achieve it.

European Union member states can see through the Chancellor's rhetoric and know that in practice he is increasing the burden of taxation on businesses, while relying on those businesses to supply new jobs. The Government's welfare-to-work programme will increase the demand for new jobs, but their company taxation will hit the supply.

Behind that contradiction is the lingering belief that the Government create the jobs. That point was well made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke): it is not Government but business that creates jobs, and if we tax businesses we will damage employment.

The Red Book, and the information that we have managed to extract since it was published, shows that the burden of taxation on the business sector will approach £25 billion. Admittedly, that includes the windfall tax, about which the Government warned us before taking office, but even if that is taken out we still have more than £20 billion of extra taxation on the productive sector of the economy, on which the Government rely to provide the jobs that people will be asked to seek.

There is a further paradox over savings. Everyone should know that the only realistic alternative to welfare is private savings and long-term pension provision. Last year, the Chancellor attacked pension funds, taking out about £5 billion annually. He has done nothing to correct that in this Budget. Indeed, he has added to the problem by a botched attack on PEPs and TESSAs and, indeed, by the new annual limit on savings, which is nothing like as generous as the one that applied previously.

Under PEPs and TESSAs, a saver could put by £10,800 a year; under the ISAs, which will eventually replace them, the limit will be £5,000. It is not surprising that, again according to the Red Book, the savings ratio is due to fall further. In our last year in office, the savings ratio was 11 per cent. It is due to fall steadily to the end of the century, down to 9 per cent. That is a direct result of the very policies that the Chancellor has already introduced and did nothing to correct in this Budget.

There is another point about savings. Not only is it crazy to hit savings when one is trying to reform the welfare state, but, relatively, it encourages consumption, which has made the burden of the Bank of England that much heavier. It has forced the Bank to increase interest rates to compensate, which has led directly to the high pound, of which we have heard much during this debate. The Chancellor had washed his hands of high interest rates. Well, he has indeed divested himself of decisions about interest rates, but he cannot divest himself of responsibility for monetary policy—that remains with the Chancellor.

When the Bank of England Bill was considered by the House, we warned that there could be a mismatch between taxation and interest rate policy. That has happened and the victim is manufacturing and exporting industry. The confusion in the Monetary Policy Committee has added to the problem. The known splits in the committee are creating an expectation of further interest rate rises.

The Chancellor has compounded that error, or could be about to, by his attitude towards the euro. The drachma has already entered the exchange rate mechanism under the British chairmanship. Now, the Chancellor simply has to reverse his apparent attitude of weakness towards the euro by insisting on a rigid and strict application of the entry criteria. If not, the very weakness of the anticipated euro in the markets will again make the pound relatively stronger and do further damage. The damage done by the strong pound was constantly referred to in the debate, particularly on the Labour Benches. The Chancellor cannot be indifferent to that. The performance of the real economy is every bit as important as the welfare reforms that form the centrepiece of the Budget. The Chancellor cannot simply create rules for himself or divest himself of decisions and then say that the outcome of those decisions has nothing to do with him.

Against that economic background, we can assess the welfare-to-work programme and the working families tax credit in more detail. It is not at all clear that the tax credit as proposed will provide the claimed incentives, and that is the judgment not merely of Conservative Members but of the independent Institute for Fiscal Studies, which is intensely sceptical about what will happen in practice when the credit is introduced.

The Chancellor is indifferent to a lot of things—he said that he was indifferent to the family structure that the working families tax credit would promote. Conservative Members are not indifferent to it. I agreed with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight). We oppose the switch from the married couple's allowance to the indiscriminate tax credit as proposed in this Budget. We are also worried about the complexity of the scheme, in particular the burden that it will place on business. Such a scheme will work only if it is comprehensible to the participants—not only the people who will get the credit, but those who will administer it in the business and small business sectors.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) analysed the details of marginal withdrawal rates with great skill. In particular, he drew attention to the experience in the United States, where the system is subject to much fraud. He is absolutely right. Fraud must be designed out of a welfare system, and we are in danger of creating a system in which fraud is designed in.

[Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory]

We know that the system will be expensive, although the true cost is not fully disclosed. Perhaps an example is the child care credit, which is an important element of the overall scheme. At times, it appears that the Budget is not so much a Budget for children as one for child minders. Some perverse incentives could be set up. For instance, a young mother could take a part-time job as a child minder. She would then become eligible for more than £100 a week in child care credit, so that her own children could be looked after by other child minders, perhaps in the same child care centre at which she worked. We could create a situation where everyone was paid to look after everyone else's children, which is practically the definition of a nanny state. I am sure that that is not the intention of the system, but if the history of the welfare state teaches us anything, it is that good intentions are not enough. They often lead to unintended consequences and unplanned incentives. Almost always, the cost turns out to be much higher than originally predicted.

At the end of this debate, let us finally have an answer to the question constantly posed by Conservative Members about who will get the working families tax credit if a couple disagrees about who should get it. What will happen if the mother believes that she needs it to support the family budget, but the man insists that he needs what I think Martin Taylor called the psychological incentive of having it paid through his wage packet? It is a simple system if they both agree—it can go to the mother or the father—but, if they disagree, as we know they sometimes will, who will get the tax credit? Can we have a simple, straightforward answer to a simple, straightforward question?

On public expenditure, little can be gleaned from the Red Book until more analysis is done. However, I pick up the point made by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce)—although I did not completely follow his figures—that the Government will spend in 1998–99, the next financial year, less in real terms than we had predicted that we would spend. He mentioned a figure of more than £6 billion, but I cannot get the amount up to that. I went to the Library, which confirmed a very significant drop in the real level of public expenditure from what we had planned because of higher inflation under this Government. The Government are not increasing total public expenditure or even maintaining it; they are cutting it. It is not surprising that NHS waiting lists are increasing and that they have broken that promise.

There is nothing in the Budget for pensioners, except, of course, the tax increases. They are the forgotten people of this Budget. All the tax increases are certainly coming their way. The fuel duty increases hit not only cars but heating oil, the duty on which went up by 9 per cent. The duty on tobacco and alcoholic drinks went up. We froze the duty on alcohol in our last two Budgets, and reduced it for spirits.

The hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) spoke graphically about the problems of smuggling. I know exactly what he is talking about. It is a genuine problem. The hon. Gentleman knows that the Government announced a study into smuggling which has not been published. He may be as keen as we are to get a copy, under the public's right to know, openness, accountability and all that, to find out what his Government are doing about it. On the face of it, they are only ratcheting up even further the differential between continental duty rates, which are low, and ours, which are already high. That makes the problem worse.

There is also a problem regarding fuel, although that is not smuggled—at least not on such a scale. It is estimated that the motorist faces another £7 billion-worth of duty on road fuels during the lifetime of the Parliament. Diesel is especially badly hit; not only is that mad from an environmental point of view, because diesel produces less carbon dioxide for every mile travelled than petrol, but it is extremely bad news for industry as, yet again, industrial costs are raised. It is the same with stamp duty. The Government pretend that stamp duty is paid by people in large houses, but that is not true: three quarters of the stamp duty increase will be paid by businesses. The Government are gradually eroding the United Kingdom's strength as a low-tax, low-cost European economy.

The subject of capital gains tax was comprehensively and knowledgeably covered by my hon. Friends the Members for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) and for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill). They are right to say that the new system will be extremely complex—there are 34 different rates—and it will probably invite many avoidance schemes. The revenue raised from it is supposed to be approximately neutral, which is to say that the changes are not supposed to be of net benefit to the Exchequer. That will happen only if inflation remains low, and we know that inflation is not remaining low, because the Chancellor, in his Red Book, predicts that he will not hit his own inflation target until at least the end of next year. If that failure on inflation persists, the capital gains tax reform will turn into a fraud on savers and investors.

I summarise the Budget as follows: it is a Budget that does nothing to correct the mistakes of last year, but actually compounds them. The mistake of taxing businesses and savings will be bad for employment, bad for inflation, bad for interest rates and bad for welfare reforms. The tax reforms in the Budget do not measure up to the absurdly inflated claims that it was a "once in a generation" Budget. It has been proved in the debate that the reforms are complex, expensive and most unlikely to achieve the desired effects. The Budget concealed as much as it revealed and, above all, it confirmed that the Labour party broke all its pre-election promises on taxation. We shall oppose it.

9.41 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): I shall start by referring to the former Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), which is more than the shadow Chief Secretary has done. I apologise to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for not being able to be in the Chamber to hear his speech; as I told him earlier, I had to be elsewhere when he caught the Deputy Speaker's eye. I make the same apology to the Liberal Democrat economic spokesman, the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). It is unfortunate that both were called at around the same time. I also pay tribute to all my hon. Friends on the Labour Back Benches who have supported the Government, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Ms Moran), who wanted to speak but, unfortunately, time was against her. It is frustrating to sit listening to the whole Budget debate, only to find that one has been pipped at the post.

The Budget is widely recognised as being radical and reforming. It builds on our determination to deliver economic stability, which is built on a commitment to prudent monetary and fiscal rules. We have made a commitment to low inflation, because we believe that stability is the essential precondition for long-term sustainable growth. It is a Budget to encourage work and to make work pay. It is the biggest modernisation of the tax and benefits system for 20 years. We are extending the new deal and providing child care support—recognising, unlike the previous Government, that the labour market has changed dramatically in the past 20 years. The Budget encourages enterprise: we are continuing our reform of business taxation to boost investment and especially to encourage small developing businesses. We are encouraging savings, promoting research and development and helping universities to develop their research into profitable production.

The Budget builds a fairer society: it supports families, and protects the environment. Rigorous control of public spending has allowed us to invest more in schools, hospitals and transport. We are supporting families by increasing child benefit by the largest amount since its introduction almost 20 years ago. We have helped pensioners: this winter, we not only cut VAT on domestic fuel, whereas the Conservatives would have increased it to 17.5 per cent., but gave pensioners a major package of help. Pensioners received £20 and the poorest received £50, which is something that would not have happened but for the change of Government. This is also a Budget that demonstrates the new Labour Government's belief that fairness and enterprise go hand in hand. It is a Budget that delivers our political and economic objective, which is to raise the long-term sustainable growth rate, to increase employment, to promote a fairer society, and to reduce the inequality which grew during the term of office of the Tory Government.

I want to start with the question of stability. We listened to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) referring to the golden age of Conservative rule. It seems to me that the Tory party continues to delude itself about the past. The right hon. Gentleman talked about a golden age for the countryside. People remember what the Conservatives did to the countryside: the deregulation of buses, the closing of post offices, and BSE which ruined many farmers. People also remember the 22 tax rises designed to pay for economic failure. They remember the high interest rates. So much for a golden age.

Our inheritance was a national debt that had doubled in six years because of Tory economic failure. We will not repeat the mistakes of the late 1980s, when the economic signals were misread, when a surplus became a £50 billion deficit, when inflation hit double figures, when interest rates doubled in two years, and when an "economic miracle" turned into the deepest recession since the war.

Whenever they are asked about public spending, Liberal Democrats tell us to spend more on education, transport, the police, law and order, benefits, councils and just about everything else. Frankly, their position is incredible—although I do understand it. They have decided to become the old tax-and-spend party, only without the taxation bit. There is a stateable case for tax and spend, but tax and spend without the tax is an implausible stance.

There is no question of our building a war chest. We are ensuring that the public finances are maintained in a stable way so that we can provide the public services that we all want. We are still dealing with what we inherited: spending £25 billion a year to service the debt that the Tories left behind. That is more than we are spending on schools.

Last July my right hon. Friend the Chancellor began the process of cutting that debt. In May of last year we found that the Tories had pledged to spend £19 billion more than they were going to get in. That was typical of their approach to the economy. We have cut that gap. We have cut the deficit this year to £5 billion and we will move into balance in two years' time.

So we are providing the stability that brings with it long-term job opportunities. We are providing low inflation. We inherited inflation heading for 4 per cent.—way above the Government's target of 2.5 per cent. That is why we had to take action to bring inflation down. Thanks to our reforms to the Bank of England, we now have the most open and accountable monetary policy framework in the world. More than that, we have the lowest long-term interest rates for 33 years. The last time they were so low was under a Labour Government in the 1960s.

We are providing a stable platform for the future. If we are to achieve an efficient and fair society we need to encourage work, to increase employability and to make work pay. Not just here, but right across the world, the same lessons are being learnt. The modern work force needs to be highly skilled, trained, motivated and adaptable. In a world where people will have many jobs between starting out in the labour market and retirement, it is the Government's job to encourage those who can work to do so, and to foster an environment where people can see the benefits of their work.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman appears to have finished with macro-economics already, having dusted down his election speeches yet again. Before he relies too much on mythical figures, such as the £19 billion deficit to which we were supposedly pledged and the 4 per cent. inflation which was supposedly looming, will he deal with current reality? I refer to the underlying inflation rate of 2.6 per cent. which the right hon. Gentleman inherited. I also ask what he proposes to do about the considerable strength of sterling, which has dominated today's debate and which is doing great damage to our manufacturing base. What is he going to do about five successive months of falling industrial production? What does he propose to do to prevent a manufacturing recession and an excessive slowdown of the economy? Or has the right hon. Gentleman not yet noticed these developments?

Mr. Darling: I realise that the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not like to be reminded that he left us with a deficit that cost £25 billion per year to service, and that he left us in a position where inflation was heading to 4 per cent. and above, because he had ignored the advice of the Bank of England to do anything about it in the six months before the general election. He will also bear it in mind that sterling appreciated far more before 1 May 1997 than it has since.

Manufacturing industry will recognise that the Government are taking action to ensure that we look to the long term and achieve long-term economic stability—that we do not return to the boom and bust that we inherited. In addition, unlike the previous Government, we will not be buffeted around by short-term pressures, reacting to the day's headlines.

[Mr. Darling]

This Government are prepared to take the right steps in the country's long-term interests, so people broadly support the stance that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has taken. His judgment in the Budget was right. There is significant fiscal tightening, amounting to almost 2 per cent. of national income, and most commentators recognise that my right hon. Friend made the right judgment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: I shall give way once, but then I shall return to the subject of encouraging work—something that the previous Government did nothing about either.

Mr. Clarke: The Chief Secretary is extremely generous and I am indebted to him for his courtesy, but do I take that long rant to mean that he has no idea what to do about strong sterling and does not think that it has anything to do with him or the Chancellor?

Mr. Darling: To put it succinctly, in language that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will understand, he was wrong and we are right in the position that we are taking.

I return to the subject of encouraging people into work, because the centrepiece of the Budget is reform to the national insurance system to remove barriers to work for the low-paid, and to cut the compliance costs on business. As a result, all employees pay £66 less per year from 1999. Employer and employee national insurance contribution entry fees and the steps in employer national insurance contributions will be abolished.

We are extending the new deal for young people; for the long-term unemployed; and for the partners of the unemployed, who have been excluded from help until now. We are extending the new deal for those communities that have seen the worst, and fared the worst, in the past 18 years. We are extending the new deal to disabled people.

We are introducing the working families tax credit, which will help make work pay, and we are taking other measures to reduce child poverty.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: Perhaps in a moment.

I find Conservative Members' attitude difficult to understand. They say that they think that the working families tax credit might be right in principle, and yet they almost seem to wish that it would fail from the start. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) asked about the working families tax credit. If he looks at the Red Book, he will see that not only are we helping far more people than the family credit system was meant to help, but, whereas most of the people on family credit found marginal deduction rates of 70 per cent., under the scheme that we are proposing only a quarter of the people have higher marginal deduction rates. In other words, we are reducing the cost that people face when they enter work.

Mr. Bruce: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: In a moment.

The working families tax credit guarantees every working family an income of at least £180 a week. No family working full-time with earnings less than £220 a week will pay income tax. When people see the benefits that the WFTC will bring, they will see that working families now keep more of their money and that there is more of an incentive to enter work. When they take into account the reforms that we are making in the labour market, the increase in child tax credit and the provision of child care assistance—something that was never done under the previous Government—people will realise that the Government are taking action in ways that the previous Government never did.

Mr. Bruce rose—

Mr. Darling: I shall give way once to a man with a majority of 77, and hear what he has to say.

Mr. Bruce: If this measure is so good, why do people have to wait until October 1999 for the change? [Interruption.]

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friends are asking why the country had to wait 18 years for this sort of reform.

We are determined to tackle child poverty. We inherited a situation where one child in three is brought up in poverty—what an indictment of one of the most industrialised countries in the world. We have introduced significant reforms, including the increase in child benefit by £2.50 from next year, that will ensure that we have a fair and efficient society.

We have also introduced a Budget for enterprise. Reform to make work pay must be accompanied by an environment that encourages jobs. It must be very galling for the Conservatives to find that, despite their criticisms, nobody outside the Conservative party agrees with them. Our reforms to company taxation have been widely welcomed inside and outside the House.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) rose—

Mr. Darling: I shall give way in a moment. We have reformed corporation tax by cutting the rate to the lowest level ever, and we have said that it will not increase. We have cut the rates of tax being paid by small business, and we shall see major growth in employment in the small business sector in the future. We have examined ways of improving research and development and we have reformed the capital gains tax system.

I am about to give way for the last time to the shadow Chancellor. One of the things that business likes most about the Labour party is its positive and constructive attitude to Europe—something that the shadow Chancellor and his right hon. and hon. Friends will never have.

Mr. Lilley: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for giving way. He said that nobody agrees with our critique of the Budget. Is he not aware that the TUC has forecast that, as a direct result of the Chancellor's tightening of fiscal policy and his monetary and exchange rate policies, unemployment will rise by 100,000 during the rest of the year?

Mr. Darling: At last year's Tory party conference, the Tories tried to tell us that much of the past 18 years had been a ghastly mistake. They claimed that they were a caring party and that they were sorry for everything they had done. The right hon. Gentleman now says that the TUC is the friend of the Tory party, but that claim has no credibility whatsoever.

I emphasise the fact that, because we have exercised prudent control on public spending this year, we have been able to carry forward £1½ billion to next year. As we are prudent, we have allocated half a billion pounds to the reserve. However, we have also made more money available for schools, the health service and transport in the coming year. We are showing how, by conducting a root-and-branch examination of all public spending and by rooting out waste and inefficiency, the Government have been able to redirect money to our priorities in this Parliament and beyond. We shall see a great deal more of that during this Parliament.

Prudent management of public spending has allowed us to allocate more money to our priorities. An extra £250 million for schools brings the total new money invested in schools since the election to £2½ billion—that is more money than the Liberal Democrats ever promised. We have been able to increase the amount of money going to the health service by an additional £2 billion. That money would not have been available but for the new Labour Government. We have been able to put money into public transport, and we are beginning to make up the backlog of investment needed in the London underground system, which was so neglected by the previous Government.

Last July, the Chancellor took the first steps towards modernising the British economy, ensuring that we have economic stability and reducing the huge levels of debt that we inherited from the previous Government. We have reformed the Bank of England. We have yet to hear the Conservatives' position on the Bank of England, but most people recognise that that was a useful and a good reform. We are modernising the welfare state, and this Budget is a further step change along the way. We have extended the new deal, financed by the windfall levy on the privatised utilities. We are reforming the tax and benefit system and we are ensuring that work pays. We are making sure that help goes where it is needed. We are redirecting assistance to families with children, giving children the start in life that we promised them and that we know they need.

Of course, modernising the welfare state goes hand in hand with encouraging enterprise. Enterprise and fairness go together. We are helping business; we are encouraging investment; we are reducing business tax and red tape. We are redirecting public funds to where they are needed, in schools, hospitals and transport. We are making sure that spending follows this Government's priorities in this Parliament and beyond.

This is a radical and reforming Budget. We are committed to a fairer society. We are committed to reversing the inequalities over which the Tories presided. We want a more productive, high-employment economy. This is a new Labour Budget and, step by step, we are delivering our manifesto promises. This is a Budget for enterprise and fairness, a Budget that has set new ambitions for Britain. I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding an amount of tax;

(c) for varying any rate at which that tax is at any time chargeable; or

(d) for any relief, other than a relief which—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description.

MADAM SPEAKER then, pursuant to paragraph (3) of Standing Order No. 51 (Ways and Means motions), put forthwith the Questions necessary to dispose of the further motions.

2. BEER (RATE OF DUTY)

Motion made, and Question put,

That provision may be made increasing the rate of duty set out in section 36(1) of the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979.

The House divided: Ayes 350, Noes 147.

Division No. 216] [10 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Mrs Margaret
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Bell, Stuart (Middlesbrough)
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Blair, Rt Hon Tony
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Gordon (Dunfermline E)
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnett, John
Burstow, Paul
Byers, Stephen
Cable, Dr Vincent
Cabom, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell, Menzies (NE Fife)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chidgey, David

Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Rt Hon Dr David (S Shields)
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Coventry S)
Cunningham, Ms Roseanna (Perth)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dismore, Andrew
Dobson, Rt Hon Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, David
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Ewing, Mrs Margaret
Fearn, Ronnie
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Andrew (St Ives)
George, Bruce (Walsall S)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gorrie, Donald
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hancock, Mike
Hanson, David
Harman, Rt Hon Ms Harriet
Harris, Dr Evan
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kirkwood, Archy
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Livsey, Richard
Llwyd, Elfyn
Lock, David
Love, Andrew
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Rt Hon Robert
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
McWilliam, John
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall–Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Moran, Ms Margaret
Morgan, Alasdair (Galloway)
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Oaten, Mark
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Rendel, David
Robertson, Rt Hon George (Hamilton S)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Coventry NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Salmond, Alex
Sanders, Adrian
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Rt Hon Chris (Islington S)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stinchcombe, Paul
Stoate, Dr Howard
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Straw, Rt Hon Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Swinney, John
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Temple–Morris, Peter
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Jon Owen Jones and Mr. Clive Betts.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baldry, Tony
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Mrs Virginia
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Burns, Simon
Butterfill, John
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James
Clark, Rt Hon Alan (Kensington)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rayleigh)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Collins, Tim
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cran, James
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Day, Stephen
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fraser, Christopher
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Sir Alastair
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Gummer, Rt Hon John
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hayes, John
Heath, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hogg, Rt Hon Douglas
Horam, John
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Key, Robert
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Major, Rt Hon John
Malins, Humfrey
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Nicholls, Patrick
Norman, Archie
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Randall, John
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
St Aubyn, Nick
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shephard, Rt Hon Mrs Gillian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Soames, Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher & Walton)
Taylor, Rt Hon John D (Strangford)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Townend, John
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Walter, Robert
Wardle, Charles
Waterson, Nigel
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John Whittingdale and Mr. Oliver Heald.

Question accordingly agreed to.

3. SPARKLING WINE, MADE-WINE AND CIDER (RATES OF DUTY)

Resolved,

That the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979 shall be amended as follows—

(1) In Part I of the Table of rates of duty in Schedule 1, in column 2 of the fourth entry, for "201.50" there shall be substituted "161.20".

(2) In section 62(1A)(a), for "£37.54" there shall be substituted "£45.05".

(3) This Resolution shall have effect as from 6 o'clock in the evening of 17th March 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

4. WINE AND MADE-WINE (RATES OF DUTY)

Resolved,

That provision may be made increasing the rates of duty set out in the Table in Schedule 1 to the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979.

5. CIDER (RATES OF DUTY)

Resolved,

That provision may be made increasing the rates of duty set out in section 62(1A) of the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979.

6. BEER (DRAWBACK)

Resolved,

That provision may be made repealing section 42 of the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979.

7. HYDROCARBON OIL (PRODUCTION IN THE UNITED KINGDOM)

Resolved,

That provision may be made charging excise duty on hydrocarbon oil produced in the United Kingdom.

8. HYDROCARBON OIL (RATES OF DUTIES AND REBATES)

Motion made, and Question put,

That—

(1) In section 6(1A) of the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979—
- (a) in paragraph (a), for "0.4510" there shall be substituted "0.4926";
- (b) in paragraph (b), for "0.3928" there shall be substituted "0.4299"; and
- (c) in paragraph (c), for "0.4028" there shall be substituted "0.4499".

(2) In section 11(1) of that Act—
- (a) in paragraph (a), for "£0.0200" there shall be substituted "£0.0218"; and
- (b) in each of paragraphs (b) and (ba), for "£0.0258" there shall be substituted "£0.0282".

(3) In section 13A(1A) of that Act—
- (a) in paragraph (a), for "0.0150" there shall be substituted "£0.0050"; and
- (b) in paragraph (b), for "£0.0482" there shall be substituted "£0.0527".

(4) In section 14(1) of that Act, for "£0.0200" there shall be substituted "£0.0218".

(5) This Resolution shall have effect as from 6 o'clock in the evening of 17th March 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

The House divided: Ayes 302, Noes 197.

Division No. 217] [10.15 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Mrs Margaret
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Bell, Stuart (Middlesbrough)
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Blair, Rt Hon Tony
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Gordon (Dunfermline E)
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Byers, Stephen
Caborn, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell–Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Rt Hon Dr David (S Shields)
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dismore, Andrew
Dobson, Rt Hon Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, David
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Bruce (Walsall S)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Harman, Rt Hon Ms Harriet
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
Love, Andrew
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
McWilliam, John
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall–Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Moran, Ms Margaret
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Robertson, Rt Hon George (Hamilton S)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Cov'try NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Rt Hon Chris (Islington S)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stinchcombe, Paul
Stoate, Dr Howard
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Straw, Rt Hon Jack
Stringer, Graham
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Temple–Morris, Peter
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen

Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Wills, Michael
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Jon Owen Jones and
Mr. Clive Betts.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Allan, Richard
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Mrs Virginia
Brady, Graham
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Brazier, Julian
Breed, Colin
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burnett, John
Burns, Simon
Burstow, Paul
Butterfill, John
Cable, Dr Vincent
Campbell, Menzies (NE Fife)
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chidgey, David
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James
Clark, Rt Hon Alan (Kensington)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rayleigh)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Collins, Tim
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cran, James
Cunningham, Ms Roseanna (Perth)
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davis, Cynog
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Day, Stephen
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Ewing, Mrs Margaret
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Fearn, Ronnie
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Foster, Don (Bath)
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fraser, Christopher
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Sir Alastair
Gorrie, Donald
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Gummer, Rt Hon John
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hancock, Mike
Harris, Dr Evan
Hayes, John
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Heath, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hogg, Rt Hon Douglas
Horam, John
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Keetch, Paul
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Key, Robert
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Kirkwood, Archy
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Livsey, Richard
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Llwyd, Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Major, Rt Hon John
Malins, Humfrey
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Morgan, Alasdair (Galloway)
Moss, Malcolm
Nicholls, Patrick
Norman, Archie
Oaten, Mark
Öpik, Lembit
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Randall, John
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Rendel, David
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Ross, William (E Lond'y)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
St Aubyn, Nick
Salmond, Alex
Sanders, Adrian
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shephard, Rt Hon Mrs Gillian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Smyth, Rev Martin (Belfast S)
Soames, Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Streeter, Gary
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Desmond
Swinney, John
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher & Walton)
Taylor, Rt Hon John D (Strangford)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Townend, John
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Tyler, Paul
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Wallace, James
Waller, Robert
Wardle, Charles
Waterson, Nigel
Webb, Steve
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Willis, Phil
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John Whittingdale and
Mr. Oliver Heald.

Question accordingly agreed to.

9. HYDROCARBON OIL (ULTRA LOW SULPHUR DIESEL)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 1 of the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979, for subsection (6) there shall be substituted the following subsection—

"(6) 'Ultra low sulphur diesel' means gas oil—

(a) the sulphur content of which does not exceed 0.005 per cent. by weight or is nil;

(b) the density of which does not exceed 835 kilograms per cubic metre at a temperature of 15° C; and

(c) of which not less than 95 per cent. by volume distils at a temperature not exceeding 345° C."

(2) This Resolution shall have effect as from 6 o'clock in the evening of 17th March 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

10. Hydrocarbon oil (mixing of heavy oil)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 20AAA of the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979, after subsection (2) there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(2A) Where—

(a) a mixture of heavy oils is produced in contravention of Part IIA of Schedule 2A to this Act, and

(b) the mixture is not produced as a result of approved mixing,

a duty of excise shall be charged on the mixture."

(2) In subsection (3) of that section, after "subsection (1)" there shall be inserted "or (2A)".

(3) In section 20AAB of that Act, in subsection (1), after "section 20AAA(1)" there shall be inserted "or (2A)".

(4) In Schedule 2A to that Act, after paragraph 7 there shall be inserted the following paragraph—

"Part IIA

Unrebated heavy oil

7A. A mixture of heavy oils is produced in contravention of this paragraph if such a mixture is produced by mixing—

(a) ultra low sulphur diesel in respect of which, on its delivery for home use, a declaration was made that it was intended for use as fuel for a road vehicle; and

(b) heavy oil of any other description in respect of which, on its delivery for home use, such a declaration was made."

(5) In paragraph 9 of that Schedule, after sub-paragraph (1) there shall be inserted the following sub-paragraph—

"(1A) Subject to paragraph 10 below, duty charged under subsection (2A) of section 20AAA of this Act shall be charged at the rate for heavy oil in force at the time when the mixture is produced."

(6) This Resolution shall have effect as from 6 o'clock in the evening of 17th March 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

11. Tobacco products (rates of duty)

Resolved,

That provision may be made increasing the rates of duty set out in the Table in Schedule 1 to the Tobacco Products Duty Act 1979.

12. Rates of gaming duty

Resolved,

That provision may be made increasing the rates at which gaming duty is charged.

13. Amusement machine licence duty (rates of duty)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 23 of the Betting and Gaming Duties Act 1981, for the Table in subsection (2) there shall be substituted the following Table—

TABLE

(1) Period (in months) for which licence granted	(2) Machines that are not gaming machines	(3) Gaming machines that are small-prize machines or are five-penny machines without being small-prize machines	(4) Other machines
	£	£	£
1	30	80	220
2	50	150	425
3	75	220	615
4	95	285	800
5	120	345	970
6	140	400	1,125
7	160	450	1,270
8	185	500	1,405
9	205	540	1,525
10	225	580	1,635
11	240	615	1,730
12	250	645	1,815

(2) This Resolution shall apply in relation to any amusement machine licence for which an application is received by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise after 17th March 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

14. Amusement machine licence duty (excepted machines)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 21(3A) of the Betting and Gaming Duties Act 1981, for paragraphs (b) and (c) there shall be substituted the following paragraphs—

"(b) a five-penny machine which is a small prize machine; or

(c) a thirty-five-penny machine which is not a prize machine or which, if it is a prize machine, is not a gaming machine.".

(2) This Resolution has effect in relation to the provision of an amusement machine at any time on or after 1st April 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

15. Vehicle excise duty (old vehicles)

Resolved,

That provision may be made confining the exemption in paragraph 1A of Schedule 2 to the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994 to vehicles constructed before 1st January 1973.

16. VEHICLE EXCISE DUTY (PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF VOID LICENCES)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 35A of the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994.

17. ASSESSMENTS FOR EXCISE DUTY PURPOSES

Resolved,

That provision may be made about assessing and recovering amounts for purposes of excise duty.

18. VALUE ADDED TAX (DEEMED SUPPLIES)

Resolved,

That—

(1) Paragraph 5 of Schedule 4 to the Value Added Tax Act 1994 shall be amended as follows.

(2) In sub-paragraph (2)(a), for "is" there shall be substituted "of acquiring or, as the case may be, producing the goods was".

(3) After sub-paragraph (2) there shall be inserted the following sub-paragraph—

"(2A) For the purposes of determining the cost to the donor of acquiring or producing goods of which he has made a gift, where—

(a) the acquisition by the donor of the goods, or anything comprised in the goods, was by means of a transfer of a business, or a part of a business, as a going concern,

(b) the assets transferred by that transfer included those goods or that thing, and

(c) the transfer of those assets is one falling by virtue of an order under section 5(3) (or under an enactment re-enacted in section 5(3)) to be treated as neither a supply of goods nor a supply of services, the donor and his predecessor or, as the case may be, all of his predecessors shall be treated as if they were the same person."

(4) In sub-paragraph (5), for "is" there shall be substituted "or any of his predecessors is a person who (disregarding this paragraph) has or will become".

(5) After that sub-paragraph there shall be inserted the following sub-paragraph—

"(5A) In relation to any goods or anything comprised in any goods, a person is the predecessor of another for the purposes of this paragraph if—

(a) that other person is a person to whom he has transferred assets of his business by a transfer of that business, or a part of it, as a going concern;

(b) those assets consisted of or included those goods or that thing; and

(c) the transfer of the assets is one falling by virtue of an order under section 5(3) (or under an enactment re-enacted in section 5(3)) to be treated as neither a supply of goods nor a supply of services;

and references in this paragraph to a person's predecessors include references to the predecessors of his predecessors through any number of transfers."

(6) The preceding provisions of this Resolution apply to any case where the time when the goods are transferred or disposed of or, as the case may be, put to use, used or made available for use is on or after 17th March 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

19. VALUE ADDED TAX (PLACE OF SUPPLY ORDERS)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In the Value Added Tax Act 1994 the following section shall be inserted after section 97—

"Place of supply orders: transitional provision

97A.—(1) This section shall have effect for the purpose of giving effect to any order made on or after 17th March 1998 under section 7(11), if—

(a) the order provides for services of a description specified in the order to be treated as supplied in the United Kingdom;

(b) the services would not have fallen to be so treated apart from the order;

(c) the services are not services that would have fallen to be so treated under any provision re-enacted in the order; and

(d) the order is expressed to come into force in relation to services supplied on or after a date specified in the order ('the commencement date').

(2) Invoices and other documents provided to any person before the commencement date shall be disregarded in determining the time of the supply of any services which, if their time of supply were on or after the commencement date, would be treated by virtue of the order as supplied in the United Kingdom.

(3) If there is a payment in respect of any services of the specified description that was received by the supplier before the commencement date, so much (if any) of that payment as relates to times on or after that date shall be treated as if it were a payment received on the commencement date.

(4) If there is a payment in respect of services of the specified description that is or has been received by the supplier on or after the commencement date, so much (if any) of that payment as relates to times before that date shall be treated as if it were a payment received before that date.

(5) Subject to subsection (6) below, a payment in respect of any services shall be taken for the purposes of this section to relate to the time of the performance of those services.

(6) Where a payment is received in respect of any services the performance of which takes place over a period a part of which falls before the commencement date and a part of which does not—

(a) an apportionment shall be made, on a just and reasonable basis, of the extent to which the payment is attributable to so much of the performance of those services as took place before that date;

(b) the payment shall, to that extent, be taken for the purposes of this section to relate to a time before that date; and

(c) the remainder, if any, of the payment shall be taken for those purposes to relate to times on or after that date."

(2) In section 6 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994, after subsection (14) there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(14A) In relation to any services of a description specified in an order under section 7(11), this section and any regulations under this section or section 8(4) shall have effect subject to section 97A."

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

20. VALUE ADDED TAX (BAD DEBT RELIEF)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 36 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994.

21. VALUE ADDED TAX (LONG LEASES IN SCOTLAND)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 96 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994.

22. INCOME TAX (CHARGE AND RATES FOR 1998-99)

Motion made, and Question put,

That income tax shall be charged for the year 1998-99, and for that year—

(a) the lower rate shall be 20 per cent.;

(b) the basic rate shall be 23 per cent.; and

(c) the higher rate shall be 40 per cent.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

The House proceeded to a Division—

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am afraid that I have not been present throughout the debate, but I know that the Liberal Democrats have criticised not only this Government but the previous Government time and again for raising taxes—

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair. Continue with the Division.

The House having divided: Ayes 300, Noes 43.

Division No. 218] [10.27 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Mrs Margaret
Bell, Stuart (Middlesbrough)
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Gordon (Dunfermline E)
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Byers, Stephen
Caborn, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Rt Hon Dr David (S Shields)
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dismore, Andrew
Dobson, Rt Hon Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, David
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Bruce (Walsall S)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Harman, Rt Hon Ms Harriet
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
Love, Andrew
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
McWilliam, John
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Moran, Ms Margaret
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rapson, Syd

Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Robertson, Rt Hon George (Hamilton S)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Co'try NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Rt Hon Chris (Islington S)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stinchcombe, Paul
Stoate, Dr Howard
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Straw, Rt Hon Jack
Stringer, Graham
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Wills, Michael
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Jon Owen Jones and
Mr. Clive Betts.

NOES

Allan, Richard
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burnett, John
Burstow, Paul
Cable, Dr Vincent
Campbell, Menzies (NE Fife)
Chidgey, David
Davis, Cynog
Fearn, Ronnie
Foster, Don (Bath)
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gorrie, Donald
Hancock, Mike
Harris, Dr Evan
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Keetch, Paul
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Kirkwood, Archy
Livsey, Richard
Llwyd, Elfyn
Maclennan, Rt Hon Robert
Oaten, Mark
Öpik, Lembit
Rendel, David
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Sanders, Adrian
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Webb, Steve
Willis, Phil

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Edward Davey and
Mr. Andrew Stunell.

Question accordingly agreed to.

23. INCOME TAX (ADDITIONAL RELIEF IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In subsection (1)(c) of section 259 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, for "man" and "wife" there shall be substituted, respectively, "individual" and "spouse".

(2) In subsection (4) of that section, after "relief under this section" there shall be inserted "by virtue of subsection (1)(a) above".

(3) In section 261A(3) of that Act, for "a man" there shall be substituted "an individual".

(4) This Resolution has effect for the year 1997-98 and subsequent years of assessment.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

24. CORPORATION TAX (CHARGE AND RATE FOR 1998)

Resolved,

That, for the financial year 1998, corporation tax shall be charged at the rate of 31 per cent.

25. CORPORATION TAX (SMALL COMPANIES RATE FOR 1998)

Resolved,

That, for the financial year 1998—

(a) the small companies' rate shall be 21 per cent.; and

(b) the fraction mentioned in section 13(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 shall be one fortieth.

26. CORPORATION TAX (DUE AND PAYABLE DATE)

Motion made, and Question put,

That provision may be made for and in connection with altering the date on which corporation tax and amounts treated as corporation tax become due and payable.

The House divided: Ayes 339, Noes 147.

Division No. 219] [10.39 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Co'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, Rt Hon Mrs Margaret
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Bell, Stuart (Middlesbrough)
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Betts, Clive
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Brown, Rt Hon Gordon (Dunfermline E)
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnett, John
Burstow, Paul
Byers, Stephen
Cable, Dr Vincent
Caborn, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell, Menzies (NE Fife)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Rt Hon Dr David (S Shields)
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin

Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dismore, Andrew
Dobson, Rt Hon Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Drew, David
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Fearn, Ronnie
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galbraith, Sam
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Andrew (St Ives)
George, Bruce (Walsall S)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gorrie, Donald
Graham, Thomas
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hancock, Mike
Hanson, David
Harman, Rt Hon Ms Harriet
Harris, Dr Evan
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Henderson, Doug (Newcastle N)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kirkwood, Archy
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Livsey, Richard
Lock, David
Love, Andrew
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Rt Hon Robert
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
McWilliam, John
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall–Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Moran, Ms Margaret
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Morris, Rt Hon John (Aberavon)
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Oaten, Mark
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Rendel, David
Robertson, Rt Hon George (Hamilton S)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Cov'try NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Rt Hon Chris (Islington S)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stinchcombe, Paul
Stoate, Dr Howard
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Straw, Rt Hon Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Temple–Morris, Peter
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Tyler, Paul
Vaz, Keith
Wallace, James
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Janet Anderson and Mr. Jim Dowd.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baldry, Tony
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Mrs Virginia
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Burns, Simon
Butterfill, John
Cash, William
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James

Clark, Rt Hon Alan (Kensington)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rayleigh)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Collins, Tim
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cran, James
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Day, Stephen
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fraser, Christopher
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Sir Alastair
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Gummer, Rt Hon John
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hayes, John
Heath, Rt Hon Sir Edward
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hogg, Rt Hon Douglas
Horam, John
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Key, Robert
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Lloyd, Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Major, Rt Hon John
Malins, Humfrey
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Nicholls, Patrick
Norman, Archie
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Randall, John
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Ross, William (E Londy)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
St Aubyn, Nick
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shephard, Rt Hon Mrs Gillian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Smyth, Rev Martin (Belfast S)
Soames, Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher & Walton)
Taylor, Rt Hon John D (Strangford)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Townend, John
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Walter, Robert
Waterson, Nigel
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John Whittingdale and Mr. Oliver Heald.

Question accordingly agreed to.

27. ADVANCE CORPORATION TAX AND TAX CREDITS

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to—

(a) the set-off of advance corporation tax against liability to corporation tax; and

(b) tax credits.

28. INTEREST PAYABLE UNDER THE TAX ACTS

Resolved,

That provision may be made imposing charges to tax in relation to interest payable under the Tax Acts to companies.

29. RENTS AND OTHER RECEIPTS FROM LAND

Resolved,

That provision may be made about the taxation of rents and other receipts from land.

30. COMPUTATION OF PROFITS AND LOSSES

Resolved,

That provision may be made as to the computation of profits and losses for tax purposes.

31. REMUNERATION IN THE FORM OF SHARES OR SECURITIES

Resolved,

That provision may be made about shares or securities acquired by a person as a director or employee.

32. SUB-CONTRACTORS IN THE CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending Chapter IV of Part XIII of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

33. CONSTRUCTION WORKERS SUPPLIED BY AGENCIES

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 134 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, subsection (5)(c) shall cease to have effect.

(2) In section 559 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, in subsection (1), for "subsection (2) below" there shall be substituted "the following provisions of this section"; and after subsection (1) there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(1A) Subsection (1) above shall not apply to any payment made under the contract in question that is chargeable to income tax under Schedule E by virtue of section 134(1)."

(3) Paragraphs (1) and (2) above have effect in relation to—

(a) any payments made on or after 6th April 1998 other than any made in respect of services rendered before that date; and

(b) any payments made before 6th April 1998 in respect of services to be rendered on or after that date.

(4) Subject to paragraph (9) below, paragraph (5) below applies if—

(a) a construction trade is being carried on by a person ('the sub-contractor') at the end of the year 1997–98; and

(b) there are receipts of that trade which, but for section 134(5)(c) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, would have fallen to be treated for the year 1997–98 as the emoluments of an office or employment.

(5) Where this paragraph applies, then, subject to paragraphs (7) and (8) below—

(a) the trade shall be deemed to have been permanently discontinued at the end of the year 1997–98; and

(b) to the extent (if any) that the trade includes activities in addition to the rendering of services falling by virtue of this Resolution to be treated as the duties of an office or employment, a new trade shall be deemed to have been set up and commenced on 6th April 1998.

(6) Paragraph (7) below applies if—

(a) a construction trade ("the old trade") is deemed by virtue of paragraph (5)(a) above to have been permanently discontinued; and

(b) a construction trade ("the new trade")—

(i) is deemed by virtue of paragraph (5)(b) above to have been set up and commenced; or

(ii) (where sub-paragraph (i) above does not apply) is actually set up and commenced in the year 1998–99.

(7) Where this paragraph applies then, notwithstanding the deemed discontinuance, the old trade and the new trade shall be treated as the same for the purposes of section 385 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

(8) An officer of the Board shall not become entitled by virtue of anything in this Resolution to give a direction under paragraph 3(2) of Schedule 20 to the Finance Act 1994 in the case of a person whose trade is deemed under paragraph (5) above to cease on 5th April 1998.

(9) Paragraph (5) above does not apply if the sub-contractor by notice to an officer of the Board otherwise elects.

(10) An election under paragraph (9) above—

(a) if it relates to a trade carried on by an individual, must be included in a return under section 8 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 which is made and delivered in that individual's case on or before the day on which it is required to be made and delivered under that section; and

(b) if it relates to a trade carried on by persons in partnership, must be included in a return under section 12AA of that Act which is made and delivered in the partners' case, or in the case of any one or more of them, on or before the day specified in relation to that return under subsection (2) or (3) of that section.

(11) In this Resolution "construction trade" means a trade consisting in or including the rendering of services under contracts relating to construction operations (within the meaning of Chapter IV of Part XIII of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988).

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

34. Employment termination benefits and retirement benefits

Resolved,

That provision may be made about the taxation of benefits received—

(a) in connection with the termination, or a change in the duties of, an office or employment; or

(b) under a non-approved retirement benefits scheme.

35. Benefits in kind (car fuel)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 158 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, for the Tables in subsection (2) there shall be substituted—

TABLE A

Cylinder capacity of car in cubic centimetres	Cash equivalent
1,400 or less	£1,010
More than 1,400 but not more than 2,000	£1,280
More than 2,000	£1,890

TABLE AB

Cylinder capacity of car in cubic centimetres	Cash equivalent
2,000 or less	£1,280
More than 2,000	£1,890

TABLE B

Description of car	Cash equivalent
Any car	£1,890

(2) This Resolution shall have effect for the year 1998–99 and subsequent years of assessment.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

36. Travelling expenses

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 198(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 and related provisions.

37. Profit-related pay

Resolved,

That provision may be made about cases where profit periods for the purposes of profit-related pay overlap or are to be taken to overlap.

38. Foreign earnings deduction

Resolved,

That—

(1) Section 193(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 shall cease to have effect.

(2) Before that section there shall be inserted—

"Foreign earnings deduction for seafarers

192A.—(1) Where in any year of assessment—

(a) the duties of an employment as a seafarer are performed wholly or partly outside the United Kingdom, and

(b) any of those duties are performed in the course of a qualifying period (within the meaning of Schedule 12) which falls wholly or partly in that year and consists of at least 365 days, then, in charging tax under Case I of Schedule E on the amount of the emoluments from that employment attributable to that period, or to so much of it as falls in that year of assessment, there shall be allowed a deduction equal to the whole of that amount.

(2) In subsection (1) employment 'as a seafarer' means an employment consisting of the performance of duties on a ship (or of such duties and others incidental to them).

(3) For the purposes of this section a 'ship' does not include—

(a) any offshore installation within the meaning of the Mineral Workings (Offshore Installations) Act 1971, or

(b) what would be such an installation if the references in that Act to controlled waters were to any waters.

(4) Schedule 12 has effect for the purpose of supplementing this section.".

(3) The references in the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 to section 193(1) shall be amended as follows—

(a) in section 19(1), in Case I of Schedule E, the words from "and to section 193(1)" to the end shall be omitted;

(b) in paragraph 10 of Schedule 11, after "193(1)" there shall be inserted "or 192A";

(c) in section 132(3) and paragraphs 1, 1A, 2(1), 3(1) and (3), 5 and 6 of Schedule 12, for "193(1)" there shall be substituted "192A".

(4) In Schedule 12 to that Act—

(a) in paragraph 3(2)—

(i) in paragraph (a) for "62" there shall be substituted "183", and

(ii) in paragraph (b) for "one-sixth" there shall be substituted "one-half";

(b) in paragraph 5—

(i) for "vessel or aircraft" there shall be substituted "ship (within the meaning of section 192A)", and

(ii) in paragraphs (a) and (b) for "voyage or journey" there shall be substituted "voyage"; and

(c) paragraphs 3(2A) and 7 shall be omitted.

(5) Paragraphs (1) to (4) of this Resolution shall have effect in relation to—

(a) emoluments attributable to qualifying periods beginning on or after 17th March 1998, and

(b) emoluments attributable to qualifying periods beginning before 17th March 1998 which are received on or after that date.

(6) Nothing in those paragraphs shall affect the question what deduction (if any) falls to be made under section 193(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 in the case of emoluments attributable to a qualifying period beginning before 17th March 1998 and received before that date.

(7) For the purposes of paragraphs (5) and (6) of this Resolution the question whether emoluments are attributable to a qualifying period beginning before 17th March 1998 shall be determined without reference to any arrangements entered into on or after that date.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

39. PAYE (TRADE DEBTS)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In relation to any asset provided on or after 2nd July 1997 and before 6th April 1998, section 203F of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 shall have effect with the following two modifications.

(2) The first modification is the insertion in subsection (2), before the word "and" at the end of paragraph (b), of the following paragraph—

"(ba) an asset not falling within paragraph (a) or (b) above which consists in the rights of an assignee, or any other rights, in respect of a trade debt that is or may become due to the employer;".

(3) The second modification is the insertion in subsection (3), before the word "and" at the end of paragraph (a), of the following paragraph—

"(aa) in the case of an asset falling within subsection (2)(ba) above, the amount of the debt;".

(4) The preceding provisions of this Resolution shall be deemed, in accordance with paragraphs (5) and (6) below, to have come into force on 2nd July 1997.

(5) Subject to paragraph (6) below, this Resolution shall not be taken to have changed—

(a) the amounts which were deductible by any person under section 203 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 at any time on or before 17th March 1998; or

(b) the amounts which should have been accounted for to the Board under section 203J(3) of that Act at any time on or before 5th April 1998.

(6) Where, by virtue of this Resolution, any employer would (but for paragraph (5) above) be treated as having been under an obligation at any time on or before 17th March 1998 to make deductions from payments made by the employer of, or on account of, an employee's assessable income—

(a) sections 203 and 203J of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, and

(b) the provisions of any regulations under section 203 of that Act, shall have effect as if the employer were obliged (subject to section 203J(3) of that Act) to make those deductions from any payments that are so made on or after 24th March 1998 and before 6th April 1998.

(7) Expressions used in paragraph (6) above and in section 203J of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 have the same meanings in that paragraph as in that section.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

40. PAYE (NON-CASH BENEFITS ETC.)

Resolved,

That provision may be made—

(a) extending the circumstances in which a person is to be treated for the purposes of PAYE regulations as having made a payment; and

(b) amending section 144A of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

41. ENTERPRISE INVESTMENT SCHEME ETC

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending Chapter III of Part VII of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 and sections 150, 150A and 150B of, and Schedule 5B to, the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992.

42. VENTURE CAPITAL TRUSTS

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending section 842AA of, and Schedules 15B and 28B to, the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

43. RELIEF FOR LOAN TO BUY INTEREST IN CLOSE COMPANY

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 360 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

44. RELIEF FOR LOSSES ON CERTAIN UNLISTED SHARES

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 576 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

45. Group relief

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made about relief under Chapter IV of Part X of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

46. Life policies etc

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to policies of life insurance, contracts for life annuities and capital redemption policies.

47. Insurance companies (provisional repayments)

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to Schedule 19AB to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

48. Pension schemes etc

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made about—

(a) the approval of schemes for the purposes of Part XIV of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988; and

(b) cases in which an approval for those purposes has been given or has ceased to have effect.

49. Futures and options

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending Schedule 5AA to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

50. Exchanges of securities etc

Resolved,

That provision may be made—

(a) for sections 471 and 472 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 to cease to have effect; and

(b) for section 473 of that Act to apply in relation to shares instead of securities.

51. Double taxation relief on foreign interest and dividends

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending Chapter II of Part XVIII of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

52. Notification of adjustment of foreign tax

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 806 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, after subsection (2) there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(3) Subject to subsection (5) below, where—

(a) any credit for foreign tax has been allowed to a person under any arrangements, and

(b) the amount of that credit is subsequently rendered excessive by reason of an adjustment of the amount of any tax payable under the laws of a territory outside the United Kingdom, that person shall give notice in writing to an officer of the Board that an adjustment has been made that has rendered the amount of the credit excessive.

(4) A notice under subsection (3) above must be given within one year from the time of the making of the adjustment.

(5) Subsections (3) and (4) above do not apply where the adjustment is one the consequences of which in relation to the credit fall to be given effect to in accordance with regulations made under—

(a) section 182(1) of the Finance Act 1993 (regulations relating to individual members of Lloyd's); or

(b) section 229 of the Finance Act 1994 (regulations relating to corporate members of Lloyd's).

(6) A person who fails to comply with the requirements imposed on him by subsections (3) and (4) above in relation to any adjustment shall be liable to a penalty of an amount not exceeding the amount by which the credit allowed has been rendered excessive by reason of the adjustment."

(2) This Resolution has effect in relation to adjustments made on or after 17th March 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

53. Transfer pricing (new regime)

Resolved,

That provision for the purposes of income tax and corporation tax may be made, in place of sections 770 to 773 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, in relation to cases where provision is made or imposed as between any two persons which would not have been made as between independent enterprises.

54. Exchange gains and losses and financial instruments

Resolved,

That provision may be made about the application in relation to any transaction of sections 135, 136, 136A and 137 of the Finance Act 1993 and section 167 of the Finance Act 1994.

55. Controlled foreign companies

Resolved,

That provision may be made in relation to controlled foreign companies.

56. Corporation tax (change of ownership)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made for the payment of unpaid tax, by persons other than the company liable, in cases where there has been a change in the ownership of a company and corporation tax assessed on that company or an associated company remains unpaid.

57. Corporation tax self-assessment, etc

Resolved,

That provision may be made about corporation tax self-assessment and other matters relating to the management of that tax.

The references in this Resolution to corporation tax include any amount treated as if it were corporation tax.

58. Chargeable gains (rate for trustees etc)

Resolved,

That provision may be made about the rate of capital gains tax in respect of gains accruing to trustees and personal representatives.

59. Chargeable gains (indexation and taper relief)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992—

(a) to restrict entitlement to indexation allowance; and

(b) for purposes connected with the introduction of taper relief, to restrict the availability of other reliefs.

60. CHARGEABLE GAINS (POOLING AND IDENTIFICATION)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992—

(a) limiting the circumstances in which different assets are to be treated as parts of a single asset; and

(b) setting out new rules for the identification of assets disposed of.

61. CHARGEABLE GAINS (STOCK DIVIDENDS)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 about stock dividends.

62. CHARGEABLE GAINS (NON-RESIDENTS)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of capital gains tax in relation to individuals who, having ceased to be resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, again become so resident or ordinarily resident.

63. CHARGEABLE GAINS (OFFSHORE SETTLEMENTS)

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made imposing charges under the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 on the beneficiaries and settlors of settlements where there has been a time when the trustees of the settlement, or of a settlement from which property comprised in the settlement directly or indirectly derives—

(a) have not been resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, or

(b) have fallen for the purposes of any double taxation relief arrangements to be regarded as resident in a territory outside the United Kingdom.

64. CHARGEABLE GAINS (TRANSFERS WITHIN A GROUP ETC.)

Resolved,

That provision may be made, for the purposes of the taxation of chargeable gains, about—

(a) the persons who are companies for the purposes of sections 170 to 181 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992;

(b) transfers between companies within a group; and

(c) schemes of reconstruction or amalgamation involving the transfer of a business.

65. CHARGEABLE GAINS (ABOLITION OF RELIEFS)

Resolved,

That provision may be made repealing Chapter IA of Part V and sections 254 and 255 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992.

66. CHARGEABLE GAINS (PRE-ENTRY GAINS)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 so as to restrict the amounts which, where a company has joined a group, may be set against chargeable gains accruing to the company before it joined the group.

67. INHERITANCE TAX (PROPERTY OF HISTORIC INTEREST ETC)

Resolved,

That provision may be made about—

(a) the designation of property for the purposes of any exemption under the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 or for the purposes of section 258 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992;

(b) the undertakings given for any of those purposes or for the purposes of any exemption under the Finance Act 1976 or the Finance Act 1975; and

(c) the conditions for exemption under section 27 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984.

68. INHERITANCE TAX (GIFTS FOR PUBLIC BENEFIT)

Resolved,

That provision may be made repealing section 26 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984.

69. INSURANCE PREMIUM TAX

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the purposes of insurance premium tax—

(a) in relation to premiums taxable at the higher rate; and

(b) in relation to taxable intermediaries.

70. LANDFILL TAX

Resolved,

That provision may be made applying section 1 of the Collection of Taxes Act 1968 to landfill tax.

71. STAMP DUTY (CONVEYANCES AND TRANSFERS ON SALE)

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall have effect for the period beginning 24th March 1998 and ending 31 days after the earliest of the dates mentioned in section 50(2) of the Finance Act 1973—

(1) Section 55 of the Finance Act 1963 and section 4 of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1963 shall each be amended in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs (2) and (3) below.

(2) In subsection (1)(d), for "£1.50p" there shall be substituted "£2".

(3) In subsection (1)(e), for "£2" there shall be substituted "£3".

(4) This Resolution shall apply to instruments executed on or after 24th March 1998, except where the instrument in question is executed in pursuance of a contract made on or before 17th March 1998.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1973.

72. GAS VALUATION

Resolved,

That provision (including provision having retrospective effect) may be made amending paragraph 3A of Schedule 3 to the Oil Taxation Act 1975, paragraph 12 of Schedule 2 to the Oil Taxation Act 1983 and section 493 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

73. EUROPEAN SINGLE CURRENCY

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the modification, in connection with the adoption of a single currency by other member States of the European Community, of enactments and subordinate legislation relating to matters under the care and management of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

74. RELIEF FROM TAX (INCIDENTAL AND CONSEQUENTIAL CHARGES)

Resolved,

That it is expedient to authorise any incidental or consequential charges to any duty or tax (including charges having retrospective effect) which may arise from provisions designed in general to afford relief from taxation.

PROCEDURE (FUTURE TAXATION)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters which may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain the following provisions taking effect in a future year—

(a) provision modifying the effect of sections 256, 257C and 347B of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988;

(b) provision for charging corporation tax for the financial year 1999 and with respect to the rates of that tax for that year and the fraction mentioned in section 13(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988;

(c) provision for and in connection with the abolition of advance corporation tax;

(d) provision for the repeal of sections 26 and 27 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988;

(e) provision as to the computation of profits and losses for tax purposes;

(f) provision for reducing, in the case of cars capable of running on road fuel gas, the cash equivalents of the benefits chargeable to tax under section 157 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988;

(g) provision preventing the opening of tax-exempt special savings accounts after 5th April 1999;

(h) provision relating to tax credits;

(i) provision relating to the taxation of payments representative of dividends and other distributions of companies;

(j) provision about the attribution of gains to the settlors of settlements created before 19th March 1991;

(k) provision phasing out retirement relief under sections 163 and 164 of, and Schedule 6 to, the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992.

FINANCE (No. 2) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act of the present Session relating to finance, it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of sums payable by the Secretary of State by virtue of provisions of that Act relating to vehicle excise and registration;

(b) the making out of the Consolidated Fund of repayments of gas levy and of payments of interest on such repayments;

(c) any increase attributable to any provision of that Act relating to the Debt Management Account in the sums payable out of money provided by Parliament;

(d) any increase attributable to any provision of that Act relating to that Account in the sums payable out of or into the National Loans Fund or the Consolidated Fund;

(e) payments out of or into that Account.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing resolutions: And that the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Secretary Straw, Mr. Secretary Blunkett, Secretary Margaret Beckett, Mr. Secretary Dobson, Secretary Harriet Harman, Mr. Alistair Darling, Mr. Geoffrey Robinson, Mrs. Helen Liddell and Dawn Primarolo do prepare and bring it in.

FINANCE (No. 2) BILL

Dawn Primarolo accordingly presented a Bill to grant certain duties, to alter other duties, and to amend the law relating to the National Debt and the Public Revenue, and to make further provision in connection with Finance: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 156].

PETITIONS

Green Belt (Development)

10.53 pm

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): This petition of 170 signatures—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Hon. Members who are leaving the Chamber should do so quietly. A lady is on her feet trying to present a petition.

Mrs. Roe: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

This petition, with 170 signatures, is from the residents of Northaw and Cuffley and surrounding areas in my constituency in Hertfordshire, and is entitled "Save our Countryside". It reads:

The petition of the residents of Cuffley and Northaw declares that we are concerned about the decisions to sanction plans for new development throughout the countryside.

My constituents have been appalled by the decision of the Labour Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions not to intervene in the Liberal Democrat and Labour-controlled Hertfordshire county council's structure plan proposals to build 10,000 houses on green-belt land to the west of Stevenage near my constituency. That area of green belt will be destroyed by that major housing development in spite of the Government's claims before the general election to be committed to protecting the environment. The whole point of green-belt land is that it is not an elastic idea.

The petition continues:

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to ensure that more homes are built in city areas instead of the countryside or green belt, to breathe new life into our cities and to protect valuable countryside for future generations.

The petition has my whole-hearted support.

To lie upon the Table.

Disabled People (Benefits)

10.55 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): I want to present a petition on behalf of 342 people of Bolton who have either suffered long-term mental illness or who are friends or relatives of such a person, which seeks to protect their welfare benefits. It reads:

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons

1) Seek clarification from Government as to the plans that are being proposed and ask the Government to recognise the levels of concern and anxiety that the proposals have caused to people.

2) Urges the Secretary of State for Social Security to look for alternative ways of addressing the costs of the welfare state in preference to victimising the most vulnerable members of our society.

To lie upon the Table.

Local Government (Experimental Arrangements)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Allen.]

10.56 pm

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): When I first applied for this debate, it was to be a celebration of the start of the passage through the House of the Local Government (Experimental Arrangements) Bill, which has been promoted in the other place by Lord Hunt and in this House by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead). However, I understand that that Bill was opposed on Friday by the Conservative Whips, so this debate is more in the nature of a lament for opportunities denied, or at least delayed.

Local government in the United Kingdom, unlike that in most European countries, has no separate or independent constitutional position. The powers, functions and financing of local authorities can be altered by statute, and the Crown in Parliament could abolish them altogether.

Under the previous Government, it sometimes appeared to those of us who were then in local government that abolition was the ultimate agenda. The previous Government increasingly controlled the finances, both capital and revenue, of local councils, stripped away their ability to provide affordable housing and, through compulsory competitive tendering, tried to end the role of councils as direct service providers.

Under the previous Government, there was an increasing number of areas in which local government was simply made an agent of central Government. The expansion of the quango state removed whole functions from local government. In spite of all that, local government—predominantly, although not exclusively, Labour local government—began to reinvent and modernise local democracy.

The key features of most progressive Labour councils were their commitment to quality services, to working in partnership with the private and voluntary sectors, and to making democracy in their localities more participative. They concentrated on making public services high-quality and user-friendly. For example, York council pioneered the citizens charter, which was taken over by the previous Government. Councils also pioneered customer guarantees and tenant consultation and user panels and, instead of the paternalistic provision of monolithic services for people, developed the provision of flexible services with the people.

Councils pioneered partnership, developing a facilitating role with the other players in community governance. They increasingly saw themselves not only as service providers but as facilitators and advocates for local communities, using their democratic legitimacy to take a leadership role. They also pioneered a variety of forms of more participative democracy, using citizens' juries and representative panels of citizens such as the Kirklees talkback scheme, neighbourhood forums with delegated budgets and tenant management co-operatives.

The council in Milton Keynes runs a health forum that brings together local NHS providers, the council and the voluntary sector to plan health services. The council consulted young people in Milton Keynes before the unitary council came into effect, to ensure that it provided the services that young people wanted and identified a need for. It set up a benchmark survey of more than 1,000 local residents, backed up by citizens' panels, to consult on its budget priorities. It also set up a scrutiny committee, chaired by the main opposition group on the council, the Liberal Democrats.

Since the general election, the atmosphere has become distinctly more promising for local government. Unlike their predecessor, the new Labour Government are committed to renewing local democracy. There have been important symbols and signs of the new approach. The Government signed the European charter of local self-government, which recognises the independent democratic legitimacy of local government. They have brought into being a central-local concordat which recognises that central and local government are mutually dependent and sets out meetings at least twice a year between the Deputy Prime Minister, Cabinet and other Ministers, and leading members of the Local Government Association. The Government are committed to giving local authorities new powers to promote the economic, social and environmental well-being of their communities.

Lord Hunt's Bill was part of the new approach. It would have allowed councils to experiment with more effective forms of internal decision making, enabling them to give much greater clarity of direction to their programmes while retaining proper accountability to the local electorate. It was permissive, not prescriptive, and would have allowed councils to experiment in the way appropriate to them by developing cabinet-style government, decision making by lead members, or an elected mayor. I leave my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test to talk in more detail about the events of Friday's Second Reading.

Many councils have already started to develop improved internal arrangements of the sort that would be permitted by the Hunt Bill. Several London boroughs have well-developed plans, including Hammersmith and Fulham, Barnet and Islington, as have several metropolitan boroughs and unitary councils such as Bradford, Kirklees, Southampton and Leicester.

Milton Keynes unitary council was also hoping to exploit the opportunity of the Bill in two particular ways. Milton Keynes is a city with a young population. The council had attempted to set up an innovative departmental structure that split children's from adult social services and then brought together all services relating to children. Children's social services, education, leisure, and arts and museums were to be brought into the same structure, to deliver proper, comprehensive services to meet the needs of children and young people. Unfortunately, the current rules for social services committees demand complex management arrangements that add nothing to service delivery.

The second way in which Milton Keynes council had hoped to use the opportunities of the Hunt Bill was to introduce a cabinet system that would have simplified the complex committee structure set up by the unitary council, and allowed councillors to concentrate their time and resources on delivering services rather than on keeping the committee system going. I am sorry to have to say that some of these sensible measures are being opposed by some Liberal Democrat councillors. I am particularly sorry because I know that, when the Bill was discussed in the Lords, it was supported by several Liberal Democrat—and, indeed, Conservative—peers.

[Dr. Phyllis Starkey]

I should like to quote from the speech of Baroness Maddock on 17 December. She said that she shared Lord Hunt's

"desire to make local government much more accountable; much more accessible, particularly for constituents; and more attractive so that people will put themselves forward as councillors to serve their communities."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 December 1997; Vol. 584, c. 693.]

Some peers expressed concerns about the need for effective scrutiny of the new proposals, but those concerns were addressed in amendments before the Bill completed its stages in the Lords. I hope that those Liberal Democrats in the Lords and in the Local Government Association who support the Bill will use their power to persuade their colleagues on Milton Keynes council to stop opposing the Labour administration's attempts to modernise and simplify local democracy.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will join me in regretting the steps taken on Friday to delay the Local Government (Experimental Arrangements) Bill. As I understand it, those steps will prevent the Bill from progressing to Committee stage, where genuine concerns that Opposition Members might have about the detail of the Bill could have been addressed. It would be helpful to all those progressive forces in local government that wish to bring local decision making into the 21st century if the Minister could say what steps the Government are proposing to introduce the sort of changes outlined in Lord Hunt's Bill, so that the proposed experiments can go ahead.

11.5 pm

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): I should like to add my support to the case made by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey). I was delighted to be able to pick up the Local Government (Experimental Arrangements) Bill when it came to this House from another place. It went through that other place with all-party support; indeed, several concerns expressed earlier in the Bill's passage were alleviated on Report, when all parties participated in drafting amendments to ensure that the Bill reached this House in a form that commanded a wide range of support, and that was genuinely innovative in terms of local government.

The Bill is permissive, as my hon. Friend said. No local authority is forced to undertake the measures contained in the Bill, yet it allows local authorities, if they wish, to experiment with different—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. It may be helpful to the hon. Gentleman if I tell him that he cannot speak in detail about a Bill that is going before either this House or the other place. He can speak about the topic, but not about the Bill in detail.

Dr. Whitehead: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall try to make my remarks more general.

The Bill was significant because local government has historically thrived on local innovation, not only because local is best in many areas of policy, but because good practice is best spread by example and local government needs to learn by its own experience, not by experiences imposed on it by others.

The problem of local government over the past 20 years is that central Government have all too often reacted to the problems that are sometimes thrown up by local government practice by exercising their prerogative to second-guess what local government is doing and by passing legislation, often in minute detail, to prescribe what local government can and cannot do. That has led to an atmosphere and a feeling prevalent in local government that it is always second-guessed and subject to decrees from above, and that its energies, innovation and experience are all too often ignored.

We must resolve not to do that again: it is bad for local government, and bad for democracy as a whole. If people believe that voting in local government is a waste of time, it is hardly surprising if their cynicism spreads to national politics.

I welcomed the recent comments of the Leader of the Opposition when he spoke to Conservative local councillors at Kensington town hall. I did not agree with everything he had to say, but I detected a welcome change of heart. He said that he considered local government to be important and that what it had to say was relevant for local and national purposes. He declared, on behalf of his party, a new beginning in the relationship between the centre and the local in the realm of local government.

For all these reasons, I was dismayed when my private Member's Bill last Friday was objected to by a Conservative Whip. Local government of all party persuasions wants that Bill on the statute book. It wants the freedom to do the things suggested in the Bill, and it wants to make a new start of the type that the Leader of the Opposition suggested at Kensington town hall was on offer. This House, regardless of party, should not deny local government that opportunity.

I have set the date of 24 April for another attempt at a Second Reading for the Bill. That provides a month for mature reflection. I hope that the Government tonight will give the assurances that the Opposition need to allow the Bill to proceed. I also hope that the Opposition will prove big enough to allow the Bill to go into Committee, where we can discuss the details that need discussion, to ensure that the Bill gives local government the opportunities it deserves.

11.10 pm

The Minister for Local Government and Housing (Ms Hilary Armstrong): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) on securing the debate, and my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) on supporting her.

This evening marks a rather remarkable event. It is some time since the House, in an Adjournment debate, has considered innovation and the future shape of local government, and whether central Government should allow experimentation in that area. It is also some time since so many Members attended an Adjournment debate on such an issue. That signals the importance of the subject to Members of this Parliament, an unprecedented number of whom served in local government before coming here. That experience drives them to recognise that central Government have, for far too long, tried to shackle local government and not allow it to develop in response to the aims and ambitions of local people.

The Government are now pushing forward their agenda to enable local government to change its relationship with central Government, and with local people. For far too long, local government has had to look to central Government for its legitimacy, its opportunities to act, and approval for what it can spend money on.

This Government came to power on a manifesto making it abundantly clear that we are committed to democratic renewal in local government. That is why we recently published a consultation paper on local democracy and community leadership, as part of modernising local government. It is why we have been keen to encourage councils to begin to plan for change in a structured way that emerges from the all-party discussions of the past five or six years. Those discussions were reflected in the Bill that recently passed through the other place.

However, we do so not because we believe that it would be good for our party, but because we believe that it is healthy for democracy and better for local government, and therefore, in the long-term, better for government as a whole. The more we have a revived and a living democracy at local level, the more people become involved and interested in what government is up to at other levels, which is very healthy.

The issue of experimental arrangements for democratic renewal in local government has always been a cross-party one; I urge that it should not now become a partisan issue. We have been pleased, therefore, that cross-party initiatives have guided the way in which the topic has been handled.

In July 1993, a report of the working party on the internal management of local authorities in England, entitled "Community Leadership and Representation: Unlocking the Potential", said:

"the Secretary of State for the Environment should take powers to allow, in consultation with local government, experimental changes to their internal management arrangements proposed by individual local authorities; legislation would allow approval of experiments subject to suitable safeguards."

That working party existed during the previous Parliament and under the auspices of the previous Administration.

Following the working party's report, a Select Committee on Relations Between Central and Local Government was established in the other place, and in July 1996 it published its report, "Rebuilding Trust". The all-party Select Committee in the other place took the view that

"local authorities need to be allowed to experiment on the lines of the Scandinavian free commune system. This would include the freedom to experiment with ideas such as elected mayors and local referenda and new approaches to the provision of services and other responsibilities."

In November 1996, the previous Administration responded to the report, and welcomed that part of it. They welcomed the Committee's examination of the subject, identifying the report as an important contribution to the debate about the nature of local government in Britain.

The Government's response at that time was:

"on freedom to experiment with internal structure and voting arrangements, the Government accepts the general principle of the Committee's recommendation that local authorities should be able to experiment with internal working arrangements."

In other words, the idea that we are discussing tonight was specifically welcomed by the previous Administration, and I know that they were committed to finding time in the House to introduce legislation.

As you can see, Mr. Deputy Speaker, this topic, which led to the introduction of a Bill in the other place, has developed in a cross-party way over several years, so the Government were keen to support progress on the topic.

It is not unusual for topics such as this to be introduced by the private Member's Bill route. For example, the Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985 was introduced as a private Member's Bill by a Conservative Member, Mr. Robin Squire, who was then a Back Bencher. No Government time was provided for the Bill. The Government did, however, support it in the way that the present Government have supported the developments in the other place.

To demonstrate the degree to which we wish to support this initiative, we should be prepared to see much more cross-party involvement, not only in the development of the Bill but in its implementation, should it proceed through Parliament.

Therefore, I would first like to offer to have cross-party consultation on any guidance that legislation of this nature would produce, with all parties closely involved in its drafting in order to ensure maximum cross-party support. Throughout the preparation of any guidance that would attach to such legislation, we would wish to involve parties other than simply the Local Government Association, academics and so on.

For example, we shall invite the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs to provide input into the content of any guidance. We believe that that is the best and most appropriate way of involving Members of Parliament from all parties in the preparation of such a document. I propose that because I want any guidance to reflect all-party support for the legislation, which is imperative if we are to renew the political culture in local government. The House must approach the matter in a manner that is more mature than folk outside are used to seeing. We must consider what is in the best interests not of central Government but of local government.

Secondly, I propose to build in all-party participation when considering any submissions in which local authorities set out their plans for experimentation, which legislation of this sort would facilitate. It will be necessary to involve more than hon. Members in this place: it will be important to involve organisations such as the Local Government Association and the Audit Commission in consideration of such proposals. I shall invite the Select Committee to consider applications for inclusion under the provisions of any such legislation prior to a final decision being made by the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

I have written already to the Chairman of the Select Committee inviting the Committee to consider this role. It is interested, and will discuss the matter in early April. That is another important step in developing the principle of all-party involvement in any arrangements of this nature. I believe that the proposals allow for cross-party involvement not simply in the passage of legislation but in its implementation if such legislation were to become law.

I believe that this is an important issue, which the House must consider carefully. I understand that all parties are seeking to re-establish important relationships—as well as establish new ones—with local government during this Parliament. They view those relationships much more as a partnership arrangement. The process began in 1992, with the review of local government initiated by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). That review was undertaken to replace the poll tax and to examine the internal, external and financial arrangements of local government.

[Ms Hilary Armstrong]

I believe that it would be an opportunity missed if the House were to act in its own interests and say, "We shall not consider these issues any further." It would also be a great disappointment to the Local Government Association and to many local councils—including Conservative councils—that are keen to experiment with their internal democratic arrangements. That is why I am bringing forward a unique package of cross-party involvement in legislation. Government have gone the extra mile. I strongly urge all hon. Members to do the same.

In the remaining few weeks, we can all become persuaders for experimentation in the way in which local authorities order their business to involve local people more effectively and to renew local democracy. I know that hon. Members from all parts of the House support the right of local councils to reform themselves and experiment with democratic innovation. I urge all those hon. Members to join us as persuaders to take the matter forward in the House, and to make sure that the House does not once again let local government down.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-five minutes past Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Tuesday 24 March 1998

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

LLOYDS TSB BILL [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

To be read a Second time on Tuesday 31 March.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Co-operation

1. Ms Rosie Winterton: What action he is taking to promote better co-operation between health authorities and social services. [34369]

7. Caroline Flint: What action he is taking to promote better co-operation between health authorities and social services. [34375]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): Since taking office, my ministerial colleagues and I have devoted a great deal of effort to promoting a closer and better working relationship between health authorities and social services. The fruits of that effort were apparent this winter, in the brilliant success of both the health service and social services in dealing with emergencies.

Ms Winterton: Will my right hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the work of Home Start, which has—through close co-operation between health authorities and social services, and with the help of volunteers—assisted many families in times of crisis? Is he aware that, in my own constituency, Doncaster Home Start is currently helping 54 families, and that 36 families are on the waiting list? Will he tell the House what assistance the Government will give to that very worthwhile organisation?

Mr. Dobson: Home Start is a splendid voluntary organisation, operating on the boundary of the national health service and social services. Specifically, it provides help to families. The Government recognised Home Start's valuable contribution by deciding to provide it with a grant of over £1 million.

Caroline Flint: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, compared with the national average, Doncaster health authority has a very good overall record on reducing its waiting lists? In the light of last week's pledge by the Government—to reduce waiting lists by the end of April 1999, so that they are lower than they were under the Tories—does he agree that Doncaster's partnership between the health authority, social services and other parties has demonstrated that such partnerships are crucial in reducing waiting lists?

Mr. Dobson: I certainly share the point of view expressed by my hon. Friend, and think that the most precious resources in the national health service are the million people who work daily to make the service a success. I am determined to take more notice of staff than the previous Government did. I also want to seek their advice. I am therefore taking unprecedented action by writing to everyone working in the health service, inviting them to let me have their ideas for improving the service. I have always believed that, if one wants to improve the way in which jobs are done, the first people to ask are those doing the work, rather than collections of overpaid management consultants.

Mrs. Roe: Is it not a contradiction for the Government to speak glibly of co-operation, whereas coercion is the method that they have chosen for dragooning general practitioners into primary care groups?

Mr. Dobson: We are not dragooning anyone.

Mr. Pickles: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the important part of the partnership is between GPs, local hospitals and social services? Does he believe that, in rural areas, that relationship is extended by including cottage hospitals, which provide services over a wider area and deal with cases that would otherwise clog major hospitals? If the right hon. Gentleman is currently consulting staff, may I communicate a message from staff of the Ongar War Memorial hospital in my constituency? They would like that hospital to remain open, so that it can continue playing an effective part in providing care and medicine in a rural area.

Mr. Dobson: I certainly bear in mind all the representations that are made, but it comes ill from the mouth of someone who supported the previous Government to talk about the threat to cottage hospitals, when that Government carried out an 18-year search-and-destroy operation on cottage hospitals.

Mr. White: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the partnership between local authorities and health authorities has led to initiatives such as NHS Direct, which he launched successfully in my area yesterday? Does he agree that that kind of partnership deal is the way forward for the health service?

Mr. Dobson: Certainly. NHS Direct is a nurse-based helpline that will offer help and advice to people who, in the middle of the night, might be bothered about their own health or that of their child. In the pilot areas, people will be able to ring a 24-hour, nurse-based service for advice or reassurance or, if the nurse thinks it appropriate, immediate attention from an ambulance crew. That will be a big step forward. We are trying to sort out any wrinkles in the arrangements, but we are confident that the pilot schemes will work and bring great benefits. That is why we are committed to introducing NHS Direct to every part of England by 2000.

Waiting Lists (Oxfordshire)

2. Mr. Baldry: If he will make a statement on the number of patients in the area covered by the Oxfordshire health authority who have been waiting for operations for over a year; and what was the figure on 1 May 1997. [34370]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): Available information shows all patients awaiting admission to hospital, not just those waiting for operations. Provisional figures show that on 31 December there were 963 Oxfordshire health authority residents who had been waiting more than a year. Figures for 1 May 1997 are not available.

Mr. Baldry: The Minister of State will be aware that, during the last general election, the Labour candidate in my constituency dished out pledge cards to electors, which gave a firm promise that, if elected, a Labour Government would reduce waiting lists by 100,000. The reality is somewhat different. In Oxfordshire, waiting lists have gone up by 11 per cent. and, as the Minister has just made clear, as at 1 January, nearly 1,000 people had been waiting for more than a year, and more than 100 had been waiting more than 18 months. Given the trusts' accumulated deficits of nearly £7 million, when do the Government believe that waiting lists in Oxfordshire will start to fall? Is he confident that Oxfordshire will get a fair allocation of the money made available by the Chancellor last week?

Mr. Milburn: I can only presume that the hon. Gentleman was not around for the Budget or for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's statement last week; had he been so, he would have been aware that the £500 million made available through the Budget will be targeted specifically at cutting waiting lists. As we have made absolutely clear, the top priority for the national health service for next year is to get waiting lists down. Waiting lists will be shorter by April next year than when we came to power. By the end of this Parliament, the pledge will have been fulfilled.

Mr. Hinchliffe: In respect of waiting lists in Oxfordshire and elsewhere in the country—

Madam Speaker: In Oxfordshire.

Mr. Hinchliffe: And elsewhere in the country.

Madam Speaker: No, only Oxfordshire.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I am very concerned about Oxfordshire. In respect of waiting lists in Oxfordshire, has my hon. Friend examined the possible connection between the activities of certain part-time consultants and their waiting lists and their private practice? Is it not a fact that if there were no waiting lists, there would not be private practice—in Oxfordshire?

Mr. Milburn: As my hon. Friend has just shown, his knowledge of this country stretches well beyond Wakefield. He is terribly familiar with the problems of Oxfordshire and has due regard for the way in which the Government will be tackling them. I believe that the overwhelming majority of hospital consultants are performing well above the contract on which they are employed in the NHS. We rely on their endeavours now and will do so even more in the year ahead when we will expect them to do even more with the money that we will be making available to them.

Dr. Harris: I shall not pursue what I am sure was an unintended slur by the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on the hard-working NHS staff in Oxfordshire.

In Oxfordshire, as nationally, there is a great fear that the funding to deal with waiting lists might not be sufficient to reduce waiting lists as well as to preserve community hospitals, community care beds and mental health services. If local managers decide that, while reducing waiting lists is important, they also wish to preserve drug addiction services, mental health services and community health services, will they be sanctioned, or will they have to say that, although they are embarrassed, they can do no more than make their own judgments and follow the clinicians' judgments as to what are the top priorities, given the insufficient resources available?

Mr. Milburn: It is a tired old record that we hear from the hon. Gentleman and his party. Whenever we put more money into the national health service, the Liberal Democrats decide that the only tactic is to leapfrog us. We should remember that, at the last general election, the Liberal Democrats were committed to investing an extra £540 million in the national health service. We have doubled that amount—that is how much is going into the NHS—and £320 million of the £500 million for the health service that my right hon. Friend announced last week is targeted at waiting lists. They are the top priority, and we shall reduce them because that is what counts for patients. In my view and that of my party, lengthening waiting lists merely dents public confidence in the ability of the NHS.

Mr. Truswell: Does my hon. Friend know how many patients in Oxfordshire have shared the experience of my constituent, six-year-old Kristie Swift? Six months ago, she was told that she needed an operation. She was then told that she could not have it because her GP was not a fundholder, and was then informed that she could have it because the trust had made a mistake and her GP was a fundholder. Is not that typical of the hokey cokey bureaucracy with which patients have to deal under the two-tier system that we inherited from the Conservative Government? Will my hon. Friend speed Kristie's recovery by assuring her that she will be one of the last people to suffer from it?

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, not just about the circumstances in Oxfordshire, but about those throughout the country. In future, we want treatment to be given according to need alone. That is the founding principle of the NHS, by which the Government abide.

Mr. Maples: If the Secretary of State tells Oxfordshire health authority to make the reduction of waiting lists its overriding objective next year, is there not a serious danger that some other aspect of the service—probably drug budgets—will worsen? Can he promise hon. Members that drug budgets will not be reduced as a consequence of the waiting list initiative in Oxfordshire health authority?

Mr. Milburn: The hon. Gentleman conveniently forgets one fact: the £500 million allocated in the Budget is on top of the extra £1.2 billion made available to the NHS in the previous Budget, which makes £1.7 billion more for the next financial year than the Conservative party promised.

Mr. Maples: Hon. Members will have noticed that the Minister dodged a simple and straightforward question. Is not his problem that waiting lists cannot improve without some other service worsening unless and until the NHS receives real annual increases in funding of more than 3 per cent. a year, as happened, on average, for the past 18 years? The NHS would have an additional £940 million next year if the Government had maintained that policy, and I would not have had to ask my first question.

Mr. Milburn: The hon. Gentleman has a very bad case of wanting to have his cake and eat it. He complained when waiting lists were going up; now he complains when waiting lists are coming down. As we said at the general election, the Government want shorter waiting lists, and are pledged to deliver that. I remind him that, under the Conservative Government, waiting lists went on rising—year in, year out. Under this Government, they will continue to fall year on year, and as a consequence patients will be in a better position.

Medical Negligence Claims

3. Dr. Tony Wright: What was the cost to the NHS last year of medical negligence claims. [34371]

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): The cost of clinical negligence to the Department of Health in 1996–97 was £300 million, £235 million of which was a cost to the national health service that was largely made up of provision for probable future settlements. The remaining £65 million was a direct cash cost to the Department of Health under the existing liabilities scheme.

Dr. Wright: Does not every health authority and trust face rapidly escalating bills for medical negligence claims? Every pound spent on defending such claims is a pound less spent on patient care, which is unsustainable. Is not the way forward the clear separation of complaints against doctors from compensation for medical accidents and a no-fault medical injuries compensation scheme?

Ms Jowell: The Government do not intend to establish a no-fault compensation scheme; instead, we intend to drive up the standards of treatment in the national health service that lie behind so many negligence claims. We want to keep doctors out of court, and lawyers out of the operating theatre. We want a national health service in which doctors and nurses are in the driving seat, not judges and lawyers.

Mr. Wardle: Will the Minister reconsider the plight of women who suffer permanent injury and disability as a result of radiotherapy treatment for breast cancer, who are represented by the campaign RAGE—Radiotherapy Action Group Exposure? Rather than insisting that negligence in the limited number of cases involved should be proved in the courts, will the Minister agree to compensation now, so that the matter can be settled without further agonising delay?

Ms Jowell: It is utterly cynical of the hon. Gentleman to seek to secure compensation on the Floor of the House. He will be aware that my hon. Friend the Minister of State has met representatives of RAGE a number of times. The Government's policy is clear: that compensation will be paid when negligence is established in court. That, we believe, is the right way in which to protect patients, and to safeguard the precious resources of the national health service for patient care.

Mrs. Betty Williams: In view of recent events in my local NHS hospital trust, is my hon. Friend prepared to consider tightening procedures for the employment of NHS staff?

Ms Jowell: If my hon. Friend writes to me about matters of particular concern in the context of medical negligence, I shall be happy to deal with them.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: May I return to the question of accepting liability for harm done? The Minister will know that a great many haemophiliacs have contracted hepatitis C from blood donations. Her Department has already paid money to those who have contracted HIV, and I know that the Secretary of State met representatives of haemophiliacs in September last year and promised them a speedy response to the issues that they had raised. Will the Minister enlighten us about what has happened between last September and today, so that I can avoid being instructed—in another capacity entirely—by haemophiliacs to pursue a case against the Government?

Ms Jowell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met representatives of the Haemophilia Society last year, and the content of that discussion is currently under consideration. As the hon. Lady is doubtless aware, my right hon. Friend recently announced the Government's intention to make recombinant factor VIII available to children.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Is the Minister aware of the distinction between cases in which there is clearly no answer to the question of liability in regard to medical negligence—cases in which the Government should come clean, admit that there has been negligence and dispose of the claims—and the variety of other cases of an individual kind in which negligence must be clearly established in accordance with the normal processes in the court? Is that not a valid distinction that the Government should take on board?

Ms Jowell: We fully take on board the scale of human misery that litigation causes in such cases, but it is important for the House to know that only 17 per cent. of cases taken to court succeed. In the 83 per cent. that fail, the only person who walks away with a cheque is the lawyer.

Barnet and Edgware Hospitals

4. Mr. Clappison: If he will visit (a) Barnet and (b) Edgware hospitals to discuss health provision in north London and south Hertfordshire. [34372]

Mr. Milburn: We have no plans at present to visit either hospital.

Mr. Clappison: Is the Minister aware that the trust concerned with Barnet and Edgware hospitals is proposing a programme of service cuts that will result in the loss of one quarter of in-patient beds? If that happens, there is precious little hope for an improvement in waiting lists or anything else for the residents of north London and south Hertfordshire. Despite all the talk of money and improvements in waiting lists, will the Minister take a look at the trust's financial situation and ensure that the service offered to my constituents does not fall below that offered elsewhere in the country?

Mr. Milburn: I am aware of the concerns in the local community about the issue and the difficult position in which the health authority finds itself—having to sort out the legacy left by the previous Administration. The trust, the health authority and the regional office are working very closely to ensure the best possible outcome for the local community.

Audrey Wise: Will my hon. Friend take note that at least one good thing has come from what I am afraid I think was a mess over Barnet and Edgware: the establishment of a very progressive birth centre, which will be opening officially very soon? Will he wish that birth centre all the best, keep an eye on it and ensure that it does not become a temporary project, to be discontinued as soon as its value is proven, as is happening to so many useful maternity projects at the moment?

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. Thanks to all the efforts in the local community over the past few months, we have the option in the Edgware area of a high-quality community hospital, which will blaze a trail that many others will follow. Much work has been done, involving the community health council, some of my hon. Friends' local campaign groups and local GPs, to ensure that the best possible services are provided for the Edgware community.

Eye and Dental Checks

5. Mr. Wallace: If he will make it his policy to reinstate free eye and dental checks. [34373]

Ms Jowell: The question is being addressed as part of the comprehensive spending review of all Departments' expenditure. The review is being carried out in the context of the Government's clear election manifesto commitment that,

"if you are ill or injured there will be a national health service there to help; and access to it will be based on need and need alone".

Mr. Wallace: Does the Minister recall that, when her party and mine resisted the Conservative Government's efforts to introduce charges for dental check-ups and eye tests, one of the arguments that we used was that intervention could identify at an early stage diseases that could cause later problems? Does she still agree that that is a valid argument? By making necessary investment to restore free eye and dental checks, the Government could improve the general well-being and health of many, make savings in the long term and—conceivably—even reduce waiting lists. Will she repeal those Tory health taxes?

Ms Jowell: On the deliberations of the comprehensive spending review, the hon. and learned Gentleman will simply have to wait. It is however important that prevention is available wherever possible. Forty per cent. of people are eligible for free sight tests due to risk of conditions such as glaucoma and diabetes. It is extremely important that every encouragement be given to people to take up such eligibility.

The Government have recently announced a total of £19 million-worth of investment in dentistry in order to tackle inequality of access in some of the poorest parts of the country.

Mr. Blizzard: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way in which to restore all parts of the health service, such as free eye and dental checks, is to make sustainable increases in expenditure, rather than adopt the method proposed by the Liberal Democrats, which would serve only to raise expectations, which would later be met with cuts, as the magic penny would fail to deliver the kind of money about which they are always talking?

Ms Jowell: My hon. Friend is right. Spraying around spending commitments is the prerogative of a party that will always be in opposition. The people of this country did the best thing for the national health service by electing a Labour Government last year.

Suicide

6. Mr. Lock: What targets he proposes to set for reducing deaths from suicide and undetermined injury. [34374]

11. Mr. Levitt: What targets he proposes to set for reducing deaths from suicide and undetermined injury. [34379]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): The Green Paper "Our Healthier Nation" sets out the Government's proposed mental health target, which is to reduce the death rate from suicide and undetermined injury by at least a further sixth by the year 2010.

Mr. Lock: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. Does he accept that suicide rates among the socially disadvantaged are higher than those in the rest of the population? Does he agree that taking appropriate action to reduce suicide rates would be one of the best ways of getting rid of the appalling legacy of health inequality that we inherited from the previous Government?

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend is right to point out the impact of inequality, which affects that area of health like every other. We are particularly concerned that, while the overall suicide rate is decreasing, it is increasing among young men between 16 and 25. We are addressing that problem as a matter of urgency.

Mr. Levitt: My hon. Friend has pointed out that the Green Paper says that we should address health problems by getting the social conditions right. Will he explain how we will tackle social conditions to reduce the suicide rate, which runs at 16 unnecessary deaths a year in north Derbyshire alone?

Mr. Boateng: Socio-economic conditions, not least unemployment, have clearly contributed to the stress that impacts on young men, which inevitably affects their suicide rate. We aim to reduce that rate through economic regeneration. The health action zones will provide ample opportunity for that.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I warmly welcome the fact that the Government have chosen similar mental health targets to ours—our target was a 15 per cent. reduction in such deaths by 2000, while they have chosen a 17 per cent. reduction by 2010.

More people take their own life than are killed on the roads. There should be a bipartisan approach to reducing that appalling loss. Does the Minister agree that the issue requires not just resources—in social services as much as in health—but partnership between Government agencies, voluntary bodies and employers? New legislation is required. There was resistance to the introduction of supervised discharge and supervision registers, but if people in the community are to get the care they need to reduce that loss of life, we need to look again at the mental health legislation.

Mr. Boateng: The right hon. Lady had an opportunity to review that legislation. She did not take it.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Does the Minister agree that mental health provision continues to be the Cinderella of the national health service? Does he further accept that care in the community is a mixed blessing and has been proven not to work in many cases? Will he ensure that Government policy focuses particularly on reducing loss of life among the young? Will he consider the example of VISYON—the Voluntary Initiative Supporting Youngsters' Ongoing Needs—which is an organisation in my constituency that seeks to help young people with mental health problems?

Mr. Boateng: I should be happy to consider what we can learn from the hon. Lady's constituency to tackle the problem. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear that we believe that care in the community has failed large numbers of our fellow citizens. We are determined to get it right. We shall bring forward proposals on the issue in due course.

NHS Anniversary

8. Mr. Dismore: What resources he is making available to schools to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the NHS. [34376]

Ms Jowell: The Department has produced a national health service 50th anniversary education pack, which is available to schools and colleges throughout England on request.

Mr. Dismore: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as part of the celebrations, schoolchildren should learn the history of the NHS in their area? Will she make resources available so that children in my area can learn about the history of Edgware hospital, which was closed by the previous Government in its 49th year, but which, thanks to the efforts of the local community, will be reborn in its 50th year as the new Edgware community hospital, with widespread local support?

Ms Jowell: I entirely accept that local history is as important as the proud history of the national health service created by a Labour Government 50 years ago, and rescued and renewed 50 years later by another Labour Government.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Does the hon. Lady think that the Secretary of State is wise to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the national health service by closing Horncastle hospital, especially bearing in mind the fact that more than 2,000 school children are bussed into Horncastle every day from an extensive rural area, and that, if that much-valued hospital is closed, they will be more than 20 miles away from any other hospital, along difficult winding country lanes that are sometimes almost impassable in the winter months?

Ms Jowell: The hon. Gentleman asked me in particular about the Secretary of State's wisdom. My right hon. Friend is infinitely wise, as is evident from all his decisions.

Mr. Grocott: Does my hon. Friend agree that an important part of celebrating the 50th anniversary of the national health service will be to remind the people of this country, especially the young people, which party established it, and which party opposed its establishment?

Ms Jowell: I recommend that hon. Members with an odd moment to spare read the report of the Second Reading debate on the National Health Service Bill, which makes my hon. Friend's point entirely clear: the national health service was created in the teeth of the opposition of the Conservative party.

Mr. Nicholls: Would not school children really have something to celebrate for the 50th anniversary if Ministers would stop pretending to have a better record on funding the national health service than their Conservative predecessors, and pledged instead to bring their funding up to the previous Administration's average increase of 3.1 per cent. per annum? That would be a pledge worth celebrating. Why does the hon. Lady not give it?

Ms Jowell: As we have improved on the Conservative Government's funding record on every count, that comment comes ill from the hon. Gentleman.

South Humber Health Authority

9. Mr. Mitchell: What proposals he has for reform of health service structures in South Humber health authority area. [34377]

Mr. Milburn: Our plans for modernising the national health service were set out in the recent White Paper, "The new NHS", which envisages fewer but larger health authorities, more co-operation between NHS trusts, and the development of new primary care groups. As part of that process, we shall work with health authorities and the professions to determine the best configuration of local services.

Mr. Mitchell: May I express the hope that my hon. Friend will look favourably on the sensible proposals for reorganisation of the health service that the South Humber health authority has now finally produced? Those envisage reducing the number of provider trusts from three to two, setting up two primary care groups to take charge of community services, and putting mental health services, which have always been the Cinderella of the service both locally and nationally, under a wider provider, preferably from the north bank.

Mr. Milburn: On the face of it, those proposals sound consistent with the policy directions set out in the White Paper, and I look forward to receiving the representations of the health authority. I assume that there will be a period of public consultation before the proposals are agreed. It is important that such proposals meet the needs of the local community, and I know that my hon. Friend and others of my hon. Friends have been in negotiations and discussions with the health authority and others over recent weeks, and I look forward to receiving their representations, too.

Cancer Deaths

10. Mr. Corbett: What targets he proposes to set for reducing deaths from cancer among people aged under 65 years. [34378]

Ms Jowell: A reduction in deaths from cancer among people under 65 will be achieved by improving access to treatment and the quality of treatment, and by widening the scope for prevention.

Mr. Corbett: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Will she confirm that the death rate from cancer is twice as high among the unskilled as among professionals, and that one third of the people who die from cancer are under 65? Can she assure me that efforts will be focused on offering deprived communities extra health care and advice to ensure that we overcome the inequalities in health provision?

Ms Jowell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is estimated that about a third of cancers are in some way linked to poor diet, and half of all those who smoke are likely to die of cancer. Against any measure, the poorer you are, the greater your chance of contracting cancer. That is why, as part of our drive to tackle health inequality and to improve healthy years of life, we will focus resources and efforts on the most deprived communities.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the Minister's early response on steps to help cancer victims, but, having almost deified the Secretary of State for his infinite wisdom, can she tell us what steps have been taken to help mortal man who may be afflicted with prostate cancer?

Ms Jowell: The hon. Gentleman may be aware of the proposals under consideration on the case for screening of prostate cancer. Recently, I was involved in discussions about the importance of an improved focus on men's health. It may not be a matter for discussion on the Floor of the House, but it was put to me that self-examination by men as a preventive step in relation to prostate cancer should be undertaken in the same way as women undertake breast examinations to detect early signs of breast cancer.

Mr. Sheerman: Does my hon. Friend accept that the great increase in smoking among young women in particular is a cause of great concern? We are waiting for the Government to launch a hard-hitting advertising campaign which goes on and on and on, until the consciousness of young people is raised to the real dangers of blighting their lives and their health through smoking. Will we see an early start to that campaign, as we are getting impatient?

Ms Jowell: My hon. Friend will be aware of the recent advertising campaign—which was successful and was well received among young people—on the risks of smoking, which targeted in particular young people aged 16 to 24. He is absolutely right; we are deeply concerned about the rise in the numbers of young people—particularly young women—who smoke. One in three 15-year-old women are regular smokers.

To suggest that an advertising campaign alone will be enough to tackle this disturbing rise is too simple a view of an intractable public health problem. That is why the White Paper which we will publish later this summer will focus on protecting children, reducing smoking among children and supporting the seven out of 10 smokers who wish to give up. We must never forget that the 15-year-old woman who smokes today will be a lung cancer victim in 30 years' time.

NHS Trust Mergers

12. Mr. Breed: If he will make a statement on the Government's policy on NHS trusts mergers indicating the estimated savings to the NHS from trust mergers in 1998–99. [34380]

Mr. Milburn: Any merger proposal will be considered on its own merits, on the basis of demonstrable benefits to health and health care and savings in administration. We expect to see about £3 million in savings from mergers of national health service trusts next year, leading to longer-term savings of £10 million per year.

Mr. Breed: Will the Minister assure my constituents that there will be no hospital closures or bed reductions in advance of trust merger proposals, so that any administrative savings can be directed to front-line services?

Mr. Milburn: That is precisely our commitment. Any money that comes out of administration and bureaucracy as a consequence of trust mergers will be reinvested locally for the benefit of front-line patient care. That is the right priority, which I believe both staff and patients support. We do not have a national blueprint for trust mergers, but we are prepared to listen to local proposals that come about as a result of local decision-making rather than of any national edict.

Mr. Edwards: May I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the Nevill Hall trust proposal for a separate trust for north Gwent, as opposed to Gwent health authority's proposal for a single trust for the whole of Gwent? I assure him that the health authority's proposal would produce the savings that the Government want, reduce the number of trusts in Gwent, and maintain the integrity of Nevill Hall hospital as a district general hospital.

Mr. Milburn: It is important that any trust merger proposal takes as its yardstick the improvement of services for patients—that is how trust merger proposals are judged. Moreover, they have to demonstrate that there will be administrative savings. We all know that the lunacy of the internal market led to the embedding of far too many trust organisations in the national health service, all competing against one another. Thankfully, a new spirit of co-operation is abroad in the national health service, which we expect to lead over time to fewer trusts rather than more.

Mr. Rowe: Does the Minister accept that consultations—in east Kent, for example—are both led and controlled not by medical staff but by lay administrators, whose jobs, of course, are at risk from trust merger proposals? Will he assure the House that he will be robust in ensuring that, in any proposal for trust mergers, the vested interests of administrators do not override medical provision?

Mr. Milburn: On east Kent, as on any other trust merger proposals, Ministers will examine carefully local proposals that have come about as a result of local consultation and local decision-making. As I said, we do not have a national blueprint that we want to apply to all areas. Different parts of the country have different needs, and it is right that different organisational structures should reflect that.

Mr. Dawson: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his wise decision in approving the merger of acute health trusts in Lancaster, Kendal and Barrow, and of community health trusts in Lancaster and Barrow. Does he agree that those mergers will produce substantial savings in bureaucracy, which will build on the great strides that have been made in Lancaster in reducing waiting lists month on month since 1 May 1997? Does he also agree that there is now a real need to get on with the appointment of non-executive directors to maintain the impetus that has been created?

Mr. Milburn: Wisdom is obviously contagious, which is useful to all Ministers. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is considering the issue of appointments to non-executive directorships; we expect to make an announcement in due course. I believe that the proposal for the Morecambe bay area is right for the people who live there, for patients and staff, and for the national health service. Thankfully, there will be a new spirit of co-operation in the Morecambe bay area, just as there is throughout the country.

NHS Waiting Lists

13. Mr. Ruffley: If he will make a statement on NHS waiting lists. [34381]

15. Mr. Prior: If he will make a statement on NHS hospital waiting lists. [34383]

Mr. Dobson: Waiting lists are far too long and must be reduced. Last Wednesday, following the Budget statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I announced that the Government had found an extra £500 million for the health service for next year on top of the previously announced extra £1.2 billion, and that that sum would be devoted to reducing waiting lists by April next year to below the record level that we inherited from the Tory Government.

That will be followed by further targeted efforts to reduce waiting lists by at least a further 100,000 during this Parliament. Reductions on that scale have never been achieved before in the history of the national health service.

Mr. Ruffley: Is the Secretary of State aware that, in February 1997, West Suffolk hospital in my constituency had fewer than 5,500 on the waiting list, but that since 1 May the number has risen to more than 5,600? That is a result of the spending allocations for Suffolk being the joint worst in the Anglia and Oxford region. When will he stop the policy of moving money away from rural health authorities and into urban areas?

Mr. Dobson: As the policy has not started, there will be no need to stop it. The only thing that has started is Opposition Members peddling stories that are not true. The only significant change in allocations was an item to recognise the additional cost that ambulance services in rural areas have to bear because of the distances covered, so rural areas are generally better off. Exactly half the increase in the number on the waiting list in Suffolk last year occurred in the first quarter of the year—the period for which the Conservative Government were entirely responsible.

Mr. Prior: The Secretary of State has publicly and disgracefully threatened to dismiss local health service chiefs if his targets for waiting list reductions are not met, although he has not provided them with the resources to meet those targets. Is that fair?

Mr. Dobson: The waiting list reduction target that I announced at the Dispatch Box last Wednesday, to be funded by the extra money that I announced at the time, was not conjured out of the air by Ministers: it was the product of the considered view of the chief executive of the national health service. The British Medical Association, representing doctors, and the National Health Service Confederation, representing board members and managers, confirm that it is a realistic target. It must be taken seriously by everybody in the national health service. It is in the interests of patients and of the service that targets should be met, and I am making it clear to all concerned that they will be met.

Mr. Hepburn: I applaud the Government's policies to reduce waiting lists, but what assistance does the Secretary of State intend to give to NHS trusts in financial difficulties? Will he take into consideration the representations that I have made to him in writing on the future of the minor injuries unit at Jarrow hospital?

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend will know that I cannot give him an off-the-cuff answer on the future of the minor injuries unit in Jarrow, and he would not expect me to; but I can tell him that most of the debts that health authorities face are the hangover of the debts that they faced under the previous Government—except that, generally speaking, the amounts are a lot lower. I am making it clear to the non-executive directors, chairs and chief executives of every health authority and trust that not a penny of the extra money for targeting on waiting lists is to be spent on anything else. The people who think that they can divert the money had better think again.

Miss Melanie Johnson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that not only have we put in an extra £1.7 billion, but we have had to face the fact that the Conservatives in government wasted a huge amount that could have gone towards cutting waiting lists on the introduction of the marketplace in the health service, and that that led to the increasing waiting lists that we have inherited? We are now promoting co-operation, and, in addition to the extra resources, we have the capacity to make the money work better in the NHS. Is it not a disgrace that Conservatives Members should now be hopping up and down, when they could not deliver on behalf of the people of this country in all their 18 years in government?

Mr. Dobson: I accept all the points that my hon. Friend has made. During this winter, which is just coming to an end, the NHS and people working in social services have amply demonstrated to everyone that, given targeted additional resources, they can deliver the targets laid down. On the basis of the confidence that I have developed in the capacity of the health service to do that, we have found an additional £5 million, which is to be targeted on waiting lists and will not be diverted for any other purpose.

That is why, on the advice of the chief executive of the NHS, I am confident that, by the end of the coming year, we will get waiting lists down to below the level that we inherited, and will go on from there—it is not a stunt for one year or anything of that sort—to get them down by at least 100,000 more before the end of this Parliament, and, hopefully, considerably more.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Given that the whole country now knows that, if the Labour party had been really honest, its election "early pledge" would have read, "Waiting lists will be shorter, but not yet," or, "Waiting lists will be shorter, but not for years," does the Secretary of State accept the view now widely held among the professionals he quoted and informed journalists—the view that my colleagues on the Liberal Democrat Benches have held for years—that waiting lists and times will not come down significantly and the NHS will not escape a profound financial crisis until it receives at least a 3 per cent. a year increase in real terms?

Given that the right hon. Gentleman said last week that managers would not have confidence in the Government exercising their position if they did not use their resources properly, why should the country have confidence in the Government's claim that they are saving the health service if, in the first two years, they have given it less than it needs even to stand still?

Mr. Dobson: I do not know who these people are in the professions, and as for "informed journalists", that is almost a contradiction in terms. The fact of the matter is that I have talked to the leaders of the professions, and they are confident that the £500 million—

Mr. Hughes: Is it enough?

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman was on his feet speaking for about five minutes and now wants to continue bleating on.

I was saying that the leaders of the professions have told me that they believe that £500 million targeted specifically on waiting lists will achieve what we have asked for, the British Medical Association has said the same, and that is the considered opinion of the chief executive of the national health service, who was not in thumbscrews or on a rack when he gave that advice—it was entirely voluntary. He thought that it was a good idea, and we have accepted his advice.

We have set the target, and we are now determined that we will help the 1 million people in the health service to deliver it. If the Liberals do not want it delivered in their areas, they can give me a list of the places where they do not want waiting lists to come down, and I am sure we can oblige.

Mr. McCabe: Will my right hon. Friend tell us how he envisages that the extra £500 million will be put to use to cut the waiting lists in the Birmingham area?

Mr. Dobson: It will be straightforward. It will be spent on more operations, more work by doctors and more nurses employed in the Birmingham area, on more effort in the Birmingham area to stop people who would be better off at home from having to go into hospital, and on more concerted effort to get out of hospital people who are better off at home. All that will be happening in real terms to real people, carried out by real doctors and real nurses, in real Birmingham.

Hotel Charges (Health Trusts)

14. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: If he will list those health trusts which make available facilities for which patients pay hotel charges; and if he will make a statement. [34382]

Mr. Boateng: All basic services, such as catering, cleaning and laundry, are free of charge to national health service patients. Information is not held centrally on extra services that they may be offered—for example, bedside television.

Mr. Winterton: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but does he not feel that the national health service as a whole should he able to maximise the use of facilities to provide additional resources for patient care? Hospitals are being closed, wings are being decommissioned and beds are going out of commission. There is a growing need for facilities for people who for reasons of their own require a private room and facilities. Would it not be good for the health service if it could offer that facility—without in any way creating a two-tier system, to which I am 100 per cent. opposed?

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman deserves to be heard with respect, because he has on occasion stood on his own among Conservative Members in defending the NHS. Nevertheless, he will understand that it is vital that any extra income-generating proposals from trusts must concern optional extras, and they must be just that: optional and extra.

Dr. Iddon: Will my hon. Friend comment on the huge amount of debt owed to the NHS by people in the private sector who have not yet coughed up their full whack?

Mr. Boateng: It is important that anyone who owes anything coughs up.

Anthrax

3.30 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the threat from, and the precautions Her Majesty's Government are taking against, any possible attempt to bring anthrax into the United Kingdom.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): The Government receive a variety of information of the kind that led to today's newspaper reports. As the country knows, Iraq has a clear capability to produce chemical and biological weapons. One purpose, among others, of the United Nations weapons inspectors in Iraq has been to detect any production by Iraq of anthrax.

A number of countries have received intelligence about possible threats by Iraq to smuggle anthrax, but our information is that there is no specific threat to the United Kingdom. There is no evidence to suggest that any attempt has actually been made to smuggle anthrax into this country. There is also no evidence that such an attempt at smuggling might be in prospect.

The House would not expect me to go into detail about the intelligence that we have or the specific counter-measures that we have taken. However, we monitor the terrorist threat to the United Kingdom very closely, and we remain vigilant, taking all the necessary precautions. In doing so, we bear in mind the need both for prudence and for a measured, proportionate response that does not generate unnecessary public alarm.

When the initial information about possible anthrax smuggling was received, it was assessed thoroughly alongside all other relevant information and our assessment of Iraqi intentions. In the light of all that, detailed guidance was subsequently given to operational staff at all our ports on the detection of any such attempted smuggling.

Let me emphasise that this warning was a prudent, precautionary measure, and that we have no reason to believe that such an attempt at smuggling is in prospect. All-ports guidance of this nature is not unusual, and has in the past included information on chemical and biological materials.

Our first aim must be to prevent terrorism, but, if necessary, we have the means to deal swiftly and expertly with its consequences. Our plans are well prepared and continually reviewed. They are tested often and at all levels. Our preparations cover all forms of terrorism, including chemical and biological threats. Those preparations include active co-operation with our allies. As part of our European Union presidency, we organised an expert seminar on biological and chemical terrorism which, coincidentally, is being held in the south of England today.

It is right to take sensible measures, but it is unnecessary to be alarmist. The duty of Government is to ensure that we remain prepared and vigilant. We will continue to fulfil that duty with care.

Mr. Beith: I thank the Home Secretary for recognising that, once the stories appeared in the press, it was desirable for him to respond with a Government statement putting the matter in perspective. Is he satisfied that sufficient resources are available at the ports to deal with any needs that may result from such activities? We feel strongly that those who sometimes risk their lives in bringing us such warnings are people on whose work we place a high value and greatly respect.

Does the Home Secretary recognise that we have to be ready to expect anything from a dictator who has already sought to gas the citizens of his own country? That underlines the importance of the stand that Britain took on restarting the weapons inspection system effectively. Is he aware that there is evidence that, during the 1980s, before this Government's time, anthrax was obtained by Iraq from western US sources, and that development of the culture medium and some of the training of Iraqi scientists may have taken place in Britain? Will he consult his right hon. Friends, to whom my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) has put questions on that last point?

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman asks me whether I am satisfied that sufficient resources exist to deal with any threat that may arise. Yes, I am. They include, necessarily, not only resources at ports but resources effectively to assess the intelligence and other information that is received and the overall assessment of the threat that is posed at any stage by Iraq. Of course I pay tribute, as the right hon. Gentleman has done, to those on whom Britain relies for a variety of information.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me a specific question related to things that may or may not have happened in the 1980s. He will understand that I have no personal knowledge of those things, but I shall certainly refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As this matter was raised last month by me and others, may I ask on what date the perceived threat first became apparent to the Home Office?

Mr. Straw: The specific information to which reference is made in today's edition of The Sun became available on 6 March, but I should emphasise to my hon. Friend that that is part of a series of information that is available. The information has to be assessed within its context, not out of context.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire): Does the Home Secretary accept that it is our considered view that, while we demand maximum vigilance at our national points of entry, we should not give Saddam any satisfaction by allowing anyone to generate indefensible public anxiety in this country? While I do not wish him to reveal the contents of the intelligence that he has received, will he assure the House that it has no special features that would constitute a particular threat to this country and/or something about which our public should be told?

Mr. Straw: I most warmly thank the right hon. Gentleman for the tenor of his remarks. He is entirely right to say that we have to balance our response carefully and take sensible and prudent measures without, as he says, giving Saddam the comfort of raising indefensible public anxieties that are not necessary. As I have already explained, the information is part, as he will fully understand, of a series of information that is received from time to time. It has no particular special features. However, it was information that we had to take into account. Following a thorough assessment of that information, the all-ports warning was issued.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): While we do not want panic or undue anxiety, should not the British people learn the useful lesson that the present Iraqi regime is capable of any evil, bearing in mind what has already been said about the gassing in March 1988 in Iraq itself? Does not all this demonstrate that, as the regime continues to have such means of mass destruction, the United Nations weapons inspection needs to continue for a very long time to come?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend has been robust in support of the allied effort against Saddam Hussein—rightly, in my view. The answer to both his questions about the evil nature of the Iraqi regime and the continuing need for weapons inspections is yes.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that there has always been a risk that terrorists, whether state-driven or domestic, would resort to biological and chemical weapons? Does he accept that that is a fact that has to be taken into account when determining the proper degree of control at external frontiers, and that we should try to ensure that, when people dismantle external frontiers, they leave in place systems that are capable of identifying the import of such weapons? Does he also agree that it is important that nations that are committed to fighting terrorism should ensure that they exchange information as rapidly as possible when they identify any risk of this sort?

Mr. Straw: I agree with all the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks. While important, the need to maintain vigilance at ports is not only to detect illegal immigrants, but to detect matters such as this. However, he will understand that the primary information has to become available first; otherwise, one is searching for things that are virtually impossible to find. Therefore, it is important that effective systems are in place.

I should correct a small error that I made a moment ago: the information was received in the Home Office on 5 March, not 6 March, as I said.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Is it not the case that information about firms in Britain that supplied the components of chemical and biological weapons was conveyed by the United Nations Special Commission to the previous Government and that, unlike other countries such as Germany, where there have been prosecutions of such companies, no prosecutions have taken place in this country? Will my right hon. Friend look again at that matter?

Mr. Straw: I shall certainly draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friends with responsibility for those matters, but my hon. Friend will understand that, by definition, I do not have information that relates to the previous Administration.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): May I thank the Home Secretary very much for the constructive and informative statement that he has made to the House this afternoon? It was quite clear that, once the matter became public, it was vital that the people of this country should be reassured and given the basic information. The Home Secretary has done that, and I believe that the country will be grateful.

Mr. Straw: May I, in turn, say to the hon. Gentleman that I am extremely grateful for the tone of his remarks?

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): May I thank my right hon. Friend for his measured statement, to counter some very scary stories this morning? Will he confirm that his Department's role is just one part of the total effort by the Government to deal with the real threat posed to this country by Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Straw: Yes, the role of the Home Office is principally internal to this country. We work with the intelligence agencies, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, who joins me on the Treasury Bench for this statement, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and other Ministers as part of a joint effort, not only by the United Kingdom, but, very importantly, by our allies, to ensure that the threat posed by Saddam Hussein is as minimal as possible.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): A fortnight ago, hon. Members on both sides of the House were deeply impressed by the bravery of the Secretary of State for Defence and his ministerial team in baring their arms for anthrax vaccinations. Are we now to assume that perhaps that gesture was a little more self-interested than it appeared at the time?

Mr. Straw: I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that there is no politician in the House who is less self-interested than my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): May I join in thanking my right hon. Friend for the way in which he presented his statement? In order to put it into perspective, can he give any general idea how many reports of this character reach his Department in the course of a year? There must be a number of alarms of one sort or another, and it would be helpful for us to know, roughly, how regularly warnings of this sort reach his Department.

Mr. Straw: My right hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not give him the specific information that he seeks, because I genuinely do not believe that it would be in the public interest to do so. As I made clear in my opening statement, all-ports warnings are issued from time to time, and an all-ports warning was issued some time ago specifically in relation to a biological or chemical threat.

Dr. Stephen Ladyman (South Thanet): I am partially reassured by my right hon. Friend's statement, but only partially. As I previously told the House, the thing that makes anthrax a lethal terrorist weapon is the fact that it is very easy to store, which means that, if such an attack was planned—thank goodness, it appears to be a very big "if"—the anthrax spores could have been in the country for the past six months, stored quite happily in any dark cellar. I would be really reassured only if I knew that the Department of Health had made plans to look out for the symptoms of possible attack, and to respond before any announcement might be made by the terrorists.

[Dr. Stephen Ladyman]

Mr. Straw: Let me make it clear to my hon. Friend that this Government—like the previous Government, very assiduously—take every possible precaution to prevent terrorism, including that of a chemical and biological kind, and to deal with it should it arise. That includes a number of terrorist exercises, which are handled by Ministers as well as by officials. A month ago, I and a number of ministerial colleagues took part in a terrorist exercise to ensure that preparations were fully in place.

Coincidentally, the EU presidency seminar on biological and chemical terrorism, which we organised as part of our presidency, is being held today. That is an indication of our earnest intent to ensure that proper preparations are laid down for any threat that may arise.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): I and all hon. Members are grateful to my right hon. Friend for the reassurance that he has given us this afternoon. Will he further assure us that, should such a threat exist in future, international points of entry—such as Cardiff, Wales airport in my constituency—which do not have, and have not had for some years, full-time customs cover, will always remain secure?

Mr. Straw: I assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to ensure that all parts of the United Kingdom are effectively covered by the kind of scrutiny that we put in place.

Points of Order

3.46 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I bring to your attention an article in today's edition of The Times by Mr. Andrew Pierce, its political correspondent, which refers to the extraordinary practice that seems to have been carried out by the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs? The hon. Gentleman may have literary talents of which we were unaware, but it would appear, if the article is to be believed, that he has been writing the questions that he himself has subsequently answered. That may be a way to ensure that the tame Members on Government Benches ask the questions to which he can reply, but it is surely an abuse of the practice of the House. It is also an abuse of his ministerial office to do the drafting on Department of Trade and Industry writing paper.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, has, I believe, correctly put this matter to you in writing. We all deprecate planted questions, but ministerial planting of questions is a thoroughly bad abuse, which I hope that, with the full panoply of your office, you will be able to eradicate on our behalf.

Madam Speaker: I have read the report to which the hon. Gentleman refers, although I have to tell him very clearly at the outset that the matter has not been brought to my notice in the way that he suggests. We all know that the practice that he describes is not new. All Governments have sought to inspire questions, and ministerial aides have often enlisted Back Benchers to ask helpful questions. Generally, in my experience, it has been done in a more subtle way than appears to have been used in this case. Perhaps I may be permitted to add that I find it a sad reflection on Ministers' views of the quality of Back Benchers if they cannot be trusted to devise their own questions.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: No. I have cleared that point of order.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As you will be aware, in the past few years I have initiated several Adjournment debates, and tabled more than 100 questions, on problems relating to the measles and rubella vaccination, and the measles, mumps and rubella vaccination. Yesterday, the Medical Research Council assembled a working group to look into the research findings of Dr. Andrew Wakefield. Although I and the parents of a number of children who were damaged as a result of those vaccinations were totally dissatisfied with the way in which the working group was conducted and set up, I accept that that is not your problem, Madam Speaker.

I want to bring it to your attention that the Medical Research Council organised a press conference with the support, I assume, of the Department of Health. I contacted the Department and the MRC to see whether, as a Member of Parliament who had shown particular interest in the subject, I could gain admission to the press conference. I was told that that was not possible. Initially, I was told that there was not a spare chair, which I found it difficult to believe. After something of a row with those in authority, they found a chair. They said that I could attend, but that I could not ask a question.

Would you, Madam Speaker, look into the powers of Members of Parliament to question bodies that were set up under the royal charter and which receive public funds? It is ironic that we are not allowed to question such bodies, but the media are.

Madam Speaker: The point of order for me is whether the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Member can ask questions of Ministers—who, of course, have the final responsibility. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will continue to ask questions, initiate Adjournment debates and, perhaps, table a private notice question, if he is not satisfied with what has happened.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I refer to the exchange that you had yesterday with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) about whether the Foreign Secretary would come to the House and make a statement on his visit to the middle east. At that time, you expressed the view that perhaps he would, but that in any event you would do what you could to help. We have not seen the Foreign Secretary today, so we must assume that he is not coming to the House.

It has been a long-established principle that Foreign Ministers should report to the House on the outcome of important foreign visits. Would you, Madam Speaker, do your best, as you were kind enough to say you would do yesterday in a particular way, to ensure that the general practice is not being abandoned by the Government?

Madam Speaker: The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that it is for him, as a long-standing Member, and the many other hon. Members who are interested in this matter, to use the facilities available—his Front Bench, the shadow Leader of the House and the usual channels—to let it be known that the Opposition want a statement. That is the way to proceed now.

Mr. Hoyle: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Are you aware that a letter was sent out stating:

"Dear Colleague,

John Maples would appreciate it if you could be in the Chamber for Health Questions tomorrow.

I enclose a briefing note but it is particularly effective if colleagues are able to ask supplementary questions which relate to the experiences of their own constituents. Health Ministers in our last Government have confirmed that it is almost impossible for a Minister at the Despatch Box to deal effectively with questions involving individual cases and the impression given is of widespread problems and discontent"?

That was very naughty.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order for me. It looked as if the hon. Gentleman needed some Scotch tape to hold that together.

Crown Estate (Amendment)

3.52 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require the Crown Estate Commissioners to exercise their functions with due regard to the non-commercial interests of local communities; to regulate the granting of sea-bed leases by the Crown Estate Commissioners and establishing the rent therefor; to amend section 4 of the Crown Estate Act 1961; and for connected purposes.

I welcome this opportunity to raise the activities of the Crown Estate Commissioners in relation to sea bed leases. It is a subject that has generated much controversy in the highlands and islands, in particular in my Orkney and Shetland constituency. Indeed, in the northern isles there was even a legal challenge, based on Udal law, as to whether the Crown Estate had legal title to the sea bed. As the Court of Session found that it did, that is the legal basis on which we now have to proceed.

The nub of the problem is that the Crown Estate Commissioners charge excessive rents for the use of the sea bed—a use which, in practice, may not amount to much more than dropping an anchor. That can have a serious financial impact on salmon farming, shellfish farming and non-profit-making community marinas. Their rental charges also have consequences for the cost of providing lifeline transport links in the islands areas.

In all those cases, rent is charged, but the obligations on the Crown Estate as landlord are virtually non-existent. There is almost a parasitic quality about these rental agreements. In fact, the position is that, on the one hand, the Government and Government agencies are claiming to support industries such as fish farming, as well as investing in the transport infrastructure, while on the other, the Crown Estate Commissioners are sucking resources out of those industries and contributing to higher transport costs.

The regulatory function of the Crown Estate in relation to the granting of fish farm leases is currently the subject of Scottish Office consultation. The Bill could provide an opportunity to transfer that function to relevant local authorities in Scotland.

I shall deal with each of those points in turn. My Bill would regulate the way in which rents are charged for sea bed leases, not least to allow for realistic account to be taken of the aquaculture industry and the straitened circumstances that it currently faces. Anyone familiar with the salmon farming industry knows that it is in crisis, with prices barely—if at all—covering production costs. One of the costs that must be borne is the rent charged by the Crown Estate.

In 1996–97, the Crown Estate received some £2.3 million from the Scottish aquaculture industry at a time when it could ill afford it. Although more recently some of the demands for rent have been moderated, salmon farmers still believe that the Treasury, through the Crown Estate, is imposing a production tax on an industry in crisis. What adds to the injury is the feeling that as landlord the Crown Estate has little or no responsibility.

The annual report of the Crown Estate Commissioners shows how much is invested in research. The most recent report informs us that £1 million has been spent on that investment, which sounds a large sum, until one realises that it was spread over 10 years.

[Mr. James Wallace]

Not even that limited discharge of landlordly responsibility can be found in relation to the charges made for community marinas in Shetland. As the House will readily understand, island communities have a strong affinity with the sea. For centuries, many of my constituents in Orkney and Shetland have kept boats, and only in very recent times have they been asked by the Crown Estate to pay a charge for the privilege of mooring their boat.

Many communities have worked hard to establish marinas to afford better protection and safety, yet the Crown Estate insists on charging those non-profit-making community associations the same rent as is charged for moorings in the larger and grander yachting clubs on the mainland in Scotland.

Where rentals have not been agreed, the district valuer has been brought in. Sometimes that has led to even higher proposed rents. It is not always clear on what basis a rent can be charged for permission simply to drop an anchor. In one case, the district valuer proposed an annual rent of £450. The secretary of the Marina Users Association made an interesting observation in a letter to me:

"Local land valued by the DV can be bought from approx. 28 pence per square metre, yet he is suggesting an annual rent of 42 pence per square metre for the sea bed."

In another case in which there was concern that excessive rental charges would lead to some port users giving up, therefore putting a bigger financial cost on those left, the commodore of that boating club wrote:

"We rent the foreshore for £3 per annum and feel strongly that any rent levied by the Crown Estate should be similarly nominal. We would in preference like to buy the land and have done with this anachronistic quango for good."

The Crown Estate Act 1961 makes provision in section 4 for the commissioners to waive consideration or dispose of the land where land is to be used and occupied for "any communal facilities for recreation".

The kind of community marina to which I have referred might be considered a good case for the rental charges to be waived. The two First Crown Estate Commissioners and the two previous Secretaries of State for Scotland have rejected that plea, on the ground that there were strong legal doubts about whether rent charges could be waived.

It would be one of the purposes of my Bill to clarify the law, so that the commissioners could waive rent or merely charge a nominal rent in the case of non-profit-making facilities. If they did not do so, it would be open to the Secretary of State to use his powers of direction.

Similar considerations can apply in the case of transport infrastructure for lifeline services. The ferry terminals operated by Orkney islands council, for example, are also liable to rent charges by the Crown Estate. At the time of the last review, the Crown Estate's valuation agents proposed increases in excess of 900 per cent. for the terminals at Tingwall, Rousay, Egilsay and Wyre. That was modest compared with the 2,000 per cent. increase proposed for Rapness in Westray and the 3,000 per cent. increase for Loth in Sanday.

As those costs must be met from a harbour account that must balance, they must inevitably be passed on to the ferry company and on to the fares paid by ferry passengers. Surely it cannot make sense that fragile communities should have to bear such additional costs. The legislation needs amendment to relieve the commissioners of the obligation to go for every penny they can in such situations.

Finally, I should like to deal with the Crown Estate Commissioners' regulatory functions in the operation of marine fish farm leases. Last December, the Scottish Office issued a consultation document proposing that local authorities assume responsibility for determining siting of fish farms, having regard to the environmental impact of such developments. Although there seems to be a consensus that, in principle, the Crown Estate Commissioners' regulatory powers should be transferred to local councils, the difficulty is in determining how such a transfer can be made. It is difficult to imagine it happening without legislation. Moreover, I do not believe that it would be a simple matter of extending planning legislation to include the sea bed.

The Government propose that, after Scottish devolution, the Crown Estate should be a reserved matter—next week, we might debate that proposal. However, surely it would be better if we passed the necessary legislation while the House has responsibility not only for the Crown Estate but for Scottish local government. My Bill could serve as a vehicle for such a change.

I believe that the problems that I have highlighted are serious, not least in connection with the social and economic well-being of some of our nation's distant and fragile communities. I do not believe that the Government wish to undermine those communities by using back-door taxation. Therefore, if the Crown Estate Commissioners are either unwilling or unable to show greater flexibility than they have shown until now, legislation will be necessary to provide that greater flexibility and fairness.

Even if my Bill suffers the fate of most ten-minute Bills, I hope that Ministers who are listening will be willing to act.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Wallace, Mr. Robert Maclennan, Mr. John Home Robertson, Mrs. Ray Michie, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mrs. Margaret Ewing and Mr. Andrew George.

CROWN ESTATE (AMENDMENT)

Mr. James Wallace accordingly presented a Bill to require the Crown Estate Commissioners to exercise their functions with due regard to the non-commercial interests of local communities; to regulate the granting of sea-bed leases by the Crown Estate Commissioners and establishing the rent therefor; to amend section 4 of the Crown Estate Act 1961; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 24 April, and to be printed [Bill 157].

Orders of the Day

School Standards and Framework Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

New clause 7

TEACHERS' PAY AND CONDITIONS

'.—Notwithstanding the provisions of the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1991, a pay and conditions order issued under the Act shall not apply to the statutory conditions of employment of the school teachers employed in a foundation, foundation special or voluntary aided school.'.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.1 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 7 deals with an absolutely key part of the responsibility of foundation and voluntary aided schools. Clause 52 makes it clear that, ultimately, the appointment and dismissal of teachers in community and voluntary controlled schools will be a responsibility of the local education authority. However, clause 53 makes it clear that a different principle will apply to foundation schools and voluntary aided schools—which reflects the Government's policy, as stated in "Excellence in Schools", and is part of their commitment to creating a difference between foundation and voluntary aided schools and community and voluntary controlled schools.

I agree with an approach offering two alternative ways of running schools. In the long run, some schools may opt to accept that their teachers should be employed by the local education authority, and that their assets should be managed and owned by the local education authority. I understand why the Government have included that option in the Bill, as some schools may wish to continue operating on that basis. However, I also believe that the Bill should allow schools that wish to accept greater responsibility for their own affairs to be responsible for managing their own teaching and non-teaching employees and their own buildings and assets. Such a freedom should be available to schools.

The Government have come some way in the Bill in recognising that such freedom should exist. We tabled the new clause to encourage them to follow their own logic, and to go a couple of stages further in providing that freedom.

Clause 53 and schedule 17 will allow foundation and voluntary aided schools to be responsible for the appointment of teachers, subject to a process involving those schools' head teacher and other teachers. They also make it clear that the management of the teaching force is the responsibility of the head teacher reporting to the governing body. However, the Bill does not allow the head teacher or the governing body, in negotiation with the teachers they employ, to vary the terms of the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1991. The new clause is an attempt to open the door to that possibility.

We contend that, if a school is to be the employer of teachers, and if it is to have the freedom to follow its own ideas about how the skills and dedication of those teachers can best be used to meet the needs of its children and the community it serves, the freedom to vary teachers' nationally negotiated terms and conditions should be vested in the governing body which is, according to the Government's own drafting, the employing agency for those teachers.

I do not understand why the Government should open the door to the principle that the school is the teacher's employer, only to deny to the governing body and the school one of the basic instruments that an employer ought to have: the ability to create a context that best allows it to meet its needs by varying—by negotiation, of course—the teachers' employment terms.

I am not opposed—nor is my party—to the Review Body on School Teachers' Pay and Conditions of Service; it would be odd if we were, as we set it up. The principle of independent advice about teachers' pay and conditions, provided by a body working to the Government, is one which we established and which has a continuing role in the employment of teachers. Indeed, it could be argued that allowing more schools the freedom to develop their own pay and conditions packages to respond to local needs reinforces rather than undermines the need for an independent review body to examine how teachers' pay and conditions evolve. The development of local variations and local flexibility reinforces, rather than undermines, the principle of the review body.

It is important to emphasise that not every voluntary aided and foundation school would want to follow up the freedom provided in the new clause. We know that only a tiny minority of grant-maintained schools used the freedom when it was available to them. If the new clause were accepted, there would be nothing to stop a foundation or voluntary aided school declaring as a matter of policy that it intended to apply national pay and conditions to its teaching force. That freedom would be available, but alongside it would be the freedom for a school not to apply national pay and conditions if it thought that, given its conditions, a different set of arrangements or a variation on the national arrangements would allow it better to deliver its service.

My argument is intrinsic to the delivery of what the Minister for School Standards said repeatedly in Committee was the Government's objective—to focus responsibility within the school. He is right about that, so why not give those responsible for the management of the school the greatest possible range of instruments to enable them to fulfil the responsibility which the Minister correctly places primarily on them?

There are two reasons why the Government cannot argue that they are opposed to that idea in principle. First, paragraph 5 of schedule 31—what might loosely be termed the Oratory school exemption—allows existing exemptions to continue to operate. Presumably the Minister would have withdrawn the exemption if he thought it in some sense inimical to the standard and delivery of high-quality education in the maintained sector; indeed, he would not have extended it to his favourite children—those in the education action zones.

Secondly, the Government are regrettably withdrawing from grant-maintained schools the ability to apply the principle contained in new clause 7 that there should be greater variety and flexibility in teachers' pay and conditions, but under clause 13 they are extending it in education action zones, which will—in certain circumstances and after proper process—be exempt from the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1991. New clause 7 acknowledges that the Government are offering the right provision on teachers' pay and conditions in education action zones.

[Mr. Stephen Dorrell]

For exactly the reasons why the Minister is applying the provisions of clause 13 to education action zones, he should extend that freedom to employing schools—the voluntary aided and foundation schools. He vests in them primary responsibility for delivering high standards, and has given them responsibility for employing teachers. Why does he not give them the same freedom to vary teachers' pay and conditions that he is to extend to the education action zones under schedule 31(5).

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): I support the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). I made it clear in Committee that I would go further than the new clause; in my view, the watchwords should be maximum flexibility, which should be introduced generally at individual school level. It is illogical for the Government to accept the principle that schools should be able to move away from national terms and conditions under the Oratory school exemption, where the school is the employing body, and to apply it to education action zones, where the employing body will continue to be the local education authority.

We debated that issue in Committee, and it will be discussed again because of the practical difficulties that may arise. The Government are to allow a school of a particular type that is an employing body for teachers to depart from national terms and conditions, but also intend to allow schools that are not employing bodies that come under the headline description that the Minister for School Standards so favours—education action zones—to do the same. It would be much more logical to extend the ability to move away from national pay, terms and conditions to schools that are employing bodies, to which new clause 7 refers.

The Government will have to reconsider the matter in the future if they do not accept the new clause. Teacher recruitment has been debated in the Chamber and in the Select Committee on Education and Employment. Problems with teacher recruitment, and the crisis that is developing in our education system, are forcing us to consider locally devised solutions to teacher recruitment package problems. That could be done at LEA level.

I have been involved in putting together innovative recruitment and retention packages outside national pay, terms and conditions to attract teachers to schools that had experienced problems in attracting teachers. The Government must accept that schools and local education authorities will have to be given more flexibility to enable them to move outside the scope of national pay and conditions—albeit potentially within a national framework—in order to identify local circumstances, put together packages that respect those circumstances and employ the teachers who are required to provide the standard of education that the Government keep telling us they seek.

It is particularly illogical that the Minister should tell schools that are employing bodies as the Bill stands, "Yes, you can employ the teachers, but you cannot have flexibility in regard to the terms and conditions under which you employ them." Few schools would be willing to employ staff on that basis. Surely, if the Minister accepts the principle of the Oratory school clause—if he accepts the principle in terms of non-employing bodies, namely schools within education action zones—it is entirely reasonable to extend that principle to schools that are identified in the Bill, which the Government acknowledge will themselves be employing bodies.

The new clause would produce the freedom and flexibility for which any employer should ask, and I trust that the Government will accept it.

4.15 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): I trust that the Oratory School exception will no longer be an exception by the time the Bill is on the statute book, but we need to ask what are the real motives behind new clause 7.

The new clause cannot have anything to do with the experience of grant-maintained schools and their ability to disapply terms and conditions. I believe that only two grant-maintained schools used that exemption, and we must presume that the vast majority saw certain advantages in remaining within the current national pay and conditions system. Moreover, the system for disapplying pay and conditions was not employed in the case of state schools. If the last Administration thought that the system was such a good idea for grant-maintained schools, surely they ought to have applied it to all schools; but it was applied only to schools that the Government wanted to support.

The new clause cannot be a result of consultation with representatives of teachers' or head teachers' organisations. In a quick trawl of all those organisations this morning, I did not find one that the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) and his colleagues had consulted. This is another example of something that the teaching profession does not want imposed on it, for reasons that I will come to shortly.

Nor can the new clause be a result of increasing resources for schools. If resources had been increased and given to teachers, there might have been some logic in it, but the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues made no provision for increased teachers' pay, either through the budget process or in their spending plans, which the present Government have inherited. During the last Government's time in office, teachers were underpaid year on year, and were paid in stages. That is how their current terms and conditions were applied.

The new clause cannot be aimed at improving teachers' morale. Few Members who have visited schools in the past few years—certainly none who were elected on 1 May 1997—have not been struck by the fact that in almost all of them there is a real lack of morale: a sense of wanting to get on with the job and to be left alone rather than being plunged into yet more turmoil. That is exactly what the new clause would do—create further division in the teaching profession and further animosity between those schools to which pay and conditions were disapplied and those schools to which they were not. Indeed, without additional resources, the new clause would create division even within schools to which the provisions applied.

To be charitable to the right hon. Member for Charnwood, there is a more important purpose behind the new clause: to draw attention to teachers' pay and conditions. If the Government are committed to improving standards in our schools—we have to believe that that is so—they must address teachers' pay and conditions. In many schools, there is a sense of injustice that, yet again in this year's settlement, teachers are having to bear the brunt, with a two-stage pay award, rather than being rewarded for the changes that they are expected to make.

I hope that, following consideration in Committee of the Teaching and Higher Education Bill next week, the General Teaching Council will be much more powerful and will give teachers real status. We also require a professional contract for teachers, so that there is a sense of a professionalism to go with the GTC. Teachers want fair pay, decent conditions and esteem among the populace rather than new clauses that would create division.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I support my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May). There is a theme to this Bill with which those of us who served on the Committee are familiar. There are two sides to the Government, and two sides to their policy. On issues such as varying teachers' pay, we see contradictions in the Government's policy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood rightly pointed out the contradiction between the Government's opposition to the new clause and their stated enthusiasm for education action zones. Not all members of the Labour party are enthusiastic about education action zones. Indeed, this week's edition of The Times Educational Supplement carried the headline "Old Left dislikes tone of the zones". That sums up why we face not one Government but two.

Even when the Bill completes its passage through the House, we will not know in which direction Ministers will drive it. In the article about the attitude of the old left to education action zones—the Secretary of State should be aware of what his old friends in the north are saying about him—one head of education policy is quoted as saying:

> "The north is Labour's stronghold and the idea of its schools being taken over by business made a lot of people shudder."

The idea of our education policy being taken over by the old left makes many Conservative Members shudder. What worries us deeply is the fact that the Bill gives powers to the centre that will enable the old left to take over the running of our education policy. It would be for the health of the Government's education policy, and give a clear sense of where they are leading the country, if they accepted the new clause.

I was sorry to read in the press that Ministers are disappointed by the number of applications for education action zones. We are told that they are particularly disappointed by the small number of Labour authorities that have come forward. I can tell the Minister for School Standards that he will be receiving an application from Guildford; we want to take part in EAZs. One reason is that the scheme will enable us to vary our teachers' remuneration. We hope in particular to attract, to any of our schools that are not up to what we deem the appropriate standard, the quality of teaching that all children in our area deserve. Owing to the high cost of living in areas such as the one that I represent, it is very hard to attract that calibre of teacher.

Only if the Government are interested in improving the quality of education in all parts of the country—not just education action zones—and embracing the years of Conservative innovation will they remain true to their pledge to build on our improvements in education. To do so, they should support the new clause.

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): We are grateful to the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) for tabling the new clause, which has, indeed, encouraged us to follow our own logic. We do not want to follow the logic of the new clause.

Conservative Members have rightly identified the Government's proposed education action zones as a separate category. We want to provide the opportunity to disregard the national pay and conditions when that is felt appropriate. We look forward to seeing the details of the many applications for education action zones that have come forward. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) quoted from an article in The Times Educational Supplement, which was written a few days before the deadline for applications. By last Friday, which was the deadline and the day of publication of the TES, we were pleased with the number of applications.

Thanks to the effort of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the additional funding provided in the Budget, we can now increase the number of education action zones. As my right hon. Friend said, we want 12 established from September and a further 13 from January 1999. We look forward to those education action zones being at the forefront of innovation. That will mean giving careful consideration to appropriate pay and conditions for teachers.

Mr. Willis: Will the Minister confirm that private companies applying for education action zones are being made to jump through every conceivable hoop that the Department can create, whereas a local education authority that the Department wants to encourage to promote an education action zone has only to submit a letter of intent?

Mr. Byers: All applications are being treated in the same way. It would be unfair and inappropriate to treat one group differently from another. In all applications, whether from the private sector in partnership with local education authorities and whether school-led or local education authority-led, we are looking for proposals that will raise standards in schools.

I know that we are all excited about education action zones, but we should talk about the new clause. We are concerned that it would cause chaos in thousands of schools by allowing them to establish their own pay and conditions in place of the national agreements. Schools that wanted to follow the national conditions would have to impose them.

It will be far better to use the opportunity provided by EAZs to test different ways of paying teachers and different conditions. That will give us a national perspective on what practices work in recruitment, in rewarding teachers and in new structures for the school day and the school year. Education action zones will provide that flexibility and freedom, allowing the Secretary of State to monitor and evaluate the changes. The Government moved amendments on the first day of the Report stage to allow the Secretary of State to consider the detailed proposals of those promoting EAZs.

[Mr. Byers]

We have some concerns about the implications of new clause 7. The right hon. Member for Charnwood referred to one of the paragraphs of schedule 31 as the "Oratory exemption clause". I would not describe it in quite those terms myself; none the less, the fact that only two grant-maintained schools have taken advantage of the freedom to opt out of national pay and conditions demonstrates that simply giving a freedom is not the best way to encourage change.

By the end of the coming school year, education action zones will cover several hundred schools. An examination of what happens there is probably a better way of seeing whether we can begin to break down existing practice and try new ways of determining teachers' pay and conditions. In many people's minds, there is no doubt that the time has come to examine carefully teachers' contracts, pay and conditions, and education action zones will provide us with an opportunity to do that in a focused way.

Another reason why I feel that moving in the direction suggested by the new clause would cause concern is that it specifically refers to voluntary aided schools. I know that the Church authorities would not support the proposal, and would have grave reservations about the prospect of national pay and conditions being unilaterally lifted from teachers in their schools.

We believe that a better way forward would be to consider the idea in a focused way, and examine how we can develop new methods in the education action zones. That is a more appropriate way of dealing with change. New clause 7 would divert attention in schools away from their main task, which must be raising standards and providing a better quality of education than may be being provided at present. For those reasons, if the new clause is pressed to a vote, I shall ask the House to vote against it.

4.30 pm

Mr. Dorrell: I regret the overall conclusion that the Minister has reached in his response to this brief debate. However, I draw some comfort from one or two of his comments. He made it more explicit that, in his eyes, one of the objectives of education action zones is to try out new ideas for teachers' pay and conditions. I believe that his phrase was that we could break down national terms and conditions for teachers, which represents a welcome inching forward of the Government's objectives for the zones.

I agree that it is desirable to introduce greater flexibility in pay and conditions for teachers, and I am pleased that the Minister has set out so clearly the fact that that is one of the purposes of education action zones. I regret that he thinks that the idea can be tried out only in those zones, and that there is no role for foundation schools or voluntary aided schools in pushing forward the objectives that he has set.

However, as the Minister is prepared at least to countenance the objective of testing new approaches as alternatives to national pay and conditions for teachers, and in the interests of making progress, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 13

DISCONTINUANCE OF MAINTAINED RURAL PRIMARY SCHOOLS

'(1) Where a local education authority proposes the discontinuance of a maintained primary school in a rural area the matter shall be referred to the Secretary of State for determination.

(2) Such referral for determination shall take place after consultation under section 28(4) has been concluded.

(3) A rural primary school is a school identified in a list under subsection (4).

(4) A local education authority shall maintain a list of rural primary schools; and in compiling and maintaining that list they shall have regard to any guidance given from time to time by the Secretary of State.'.—[Mrs. Browning.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In some ways, the new clause could be seen as something of a tidying-up measure. On Saturday 28 February, when I was sitting at home sponging the mud off my coat ready for the countryside march in London the following day, I, in common with the rest of the nation, was treated to the sight of the Minister for School Standards gracing our television screens to make an important announcement about village schools.

We were all delighted to hear that announcement, and I hastened to obtain a copy of the press release that accompanied the Minister's television appearance. In it, he is reported as saying:

"Today, I am announcing tough new protection for village schools . . . we have decided that any proposal by a Local Education Authority to close a rural school will be called in to the Secretary of State for decision.

Further, Ministers will have a presumption against closure. And Ministers will have particular regard to the need to provide access to a local school for rural communities."

That is all jolly good stuff, which we can totally support. Hence the new clause.

The Minister went on to say:

"Of course, we cannot guarantee that no school will ever close. But these changes will give village schools strong new protection".

I have explained how supportive we are of the announcement, but I was doubly surprised: not only by the sudden announcement on 28 February, but because the Committee had been sitting for some time—we had had no fewer than 19 sittings at that time. I sat through all the sittings of the Committee, and I do not recall the Minister saying that this was a matter of any priority for the Government.

It seems rather strange that, out of the blue—two days after the final Committee sitting—the Minister made this announcement on Saturday evening television. The Government were clearly in trouble that weekend. Some Ministers said that they would be attending the countryside rally, while others said that they would not, because they thought that the whole thing was a put-up job. However, here was the Minister rushing to the support of rural communities and trying to pour a little oil on what would be a troubled weekend for the Government from the media.

We have questions for the Minister, and I should be grateful if he would break the habit of a lifetime and answer the specifics tonight.

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): That was unkind.

Mrs. Browning: Yes, it was rather unkind—I withdraw it. I want the Government to vote with us tonight, so I shall try not to be unkind to the Minister for the remainder of our discussions on the new clause.

Does the Government's promise apply for any restricted length of time? For example, can we assume that it will continue after the Bill receives Royal Assent? Or was it just a short-term measure to bolster the Government through a political problem that will no longer apply once the Bill has received Royal Assent?

The Minister describes this as "tough new protection". If it is tough, it should have the statutory protection of the law. If it is new, we would have expected the Minister to table a Government new clause when the Committee reconvened—as it did for several more sittings—or on Report to put into statute the tough new measures he announced on television on Saturday 28 February. It might be that, as a busy person, the Minister is minded to table the new clause in another place.

Will the Minister clarify how the promise and the tough new protection will fit in with schedule 7 and clause 33, which clearly still require the Secretary of State to contact local education authorities to ask them to look at the numbers in their schools and to deal with the rationalisation of surplus places? Clearly the Minister has a new strong power in mind, so that, when the Secretary of State considers each school that comes to his desk, he will almost certainly wish to make changes to the powers he currently has to require LEAs to go through the rationalisation process and to submit to him—as the Bill proposes—some plan as to how they are to deal with rationalisation.

Schedule 7 proposes that, in some cases, the rationalisation of surplus places will require LEAs to come forward with proposals which could result in the discontinuance of a school. I assume that the Secretary of State will wish to make some modification to the Bill on that. There seems no point in them going through a paper exercise if there is to be a presumption against closure. One could assume that village primary schools will be exempted from that requirement.

Mr. Byers: If the hon. Lady, as well as watching the teatime news, occasionally referred to the Official Report, she would have read my written answer on 26 February about the removal of surplus school places, in which I gave a clear commitment that, in considering surplus places, local authorities must take into account such circumstances as geography. That must be a factor in the consideration of rural schools.

Mrs. Browning: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but a written answer is not tough new statutory protection. If the promise he made on television in such specific terms is tough and new, why did not the Government table such a new clause in Committee or on Report, rather than leave it to the Opposition to do so? Perhaps the matter slipped his mind—I know that his officials are busy. As I said—I shall not tease him—we are very much in favour of what he said, and we shall be pleased to accept the support of Labour Members in the Lobby if the new clause is pressed to a Division.

I hope that the Minister will answer my specific questions, and also say what he had in mind when, as a qualification, he said:

"Of course, we cannot guarantee that no school will ever close."

Was he referring to rationalisation of places? What number of pupils does he think makes a village school viable?

I have been a Member of Parliament for six years, in which time the only school in my constituency to close had a total school roll of 14. In my experience—and I am sure in that of most hon. Members—when a school of any category, but particularly a village primary school, has been considered for closure, the matter has almost certainly gone to the Secretary of State, whom Members of Parliament and governing bodies lobby. That certainly happened under the Conservative Administration, except on the rare occasion when there were no objections. If, over and above that, there will be new, tough powers to protect rural primary schools, I want to know what, specifically, the Minister has in mind.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): I support the new clause moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning). The Minister's honeyed words at the Dispatch Box sit extremely ill with the letter, signed by an official from his Department, that was sent on 9 March to Kent education authority. Hon. Members will, I hope, share my deep disquiet at the fact that the letter contained a list of 45 secondary and primary schools in Kent, including some in rural areas—it could be termed a hit list of schools for closure on grounds of surplus places. The existence of such a list is a matter of deep concern to me, and, I know, to a number of my hon. Friends.

The list includes no fewer than four schools in the rural parts of my constituency: Shipbourne primary school; Blacklands junior school; Hever Church of England primary school; and the Eden Valley school. The wording of the letter—for which, of course, the Secretary of State has responsibility—is somewhat threatening. For example, in its request to the local authority, it states:

"In each case please set out the reasons for the surplus, as far as this can be ascertained, and the justification for continuing to maintain all the schools on the list still open and not yet proposed for closure."

As I said, that sits ill with the Minister's words.

For two critical reasons, I hope that the House will support the new clause. First, the continuation of village schools is indispensable. Schools are the lifeblood of a village. If the school is lost, so is the heart of the village—young people will leave, and others from outside will be reluctant to move in.

4.45 pm

Secondly, I believe that the Department's exercise rests on a false premise—that it is possible to predict in the long term the demand for places in a village school. In my experience, it is not possible to make such long-term—or even medium-term—predictions about demand for places.

[Sir John Stanley]

The St. Mark's Church of England infants school in the village of Eccles, which was part of my constituency before the boundary changes, was once considered for closure. However, only last year, my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), as Secretary of State and Education and Employment, authorised the upgrading of that school to a full-scale primary school, because of the influx of people into the village and the surrounding areas.

That graphically illustrates the fact that the demand for places at a school can vary enormously over 10 or 20 years. I believe that the Bill's provisions for the protection of rural schools need strengthening, so I warmly support the new clause.

Mr. Willis: I think that the Minister will, on reflection, come to regret his statement before the countryside rally to prevent the people of North Tyneside from marching on his home later that day. He made a foolish promise—if he meant what he said, the Government should support the new clause, as it would bear out what he said on television, and the commitment that he made in his press release. We do not support the new clause, however, and perhaps the Government will agree with our position.

The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) made a passionate plea for rural schools in Kent—any hon. Member whose constituency contains a large number of rural schools could have made almost the same speech. I doubt whether any hon. Member—especially those who represent rural areas—does not accept that the protection of village schools is important, provided that they meet appropriate educational standards and are supported by the local community.

What has happened in the past four or five years, however, does not bear out what the Conservatives now say. Since 1992, 450 village schools were closed, and—until the Minister gave his commitment—thousands were under threat because of the lack of resources. Many small village schools—especially those with fewer than 25 pupils—are concerned that they have to live on a year-by-year basis.

The new clause will do nothing to preserve village schools. It would undermine the Government's attempt to create a level playing field. All schools, be they urban or rural, small or large, should be given the same consideration when a local education authority proposes closure. The Government's intention in the legislation was to make the decisions closer to the people, giving local education authorities a duty to plan for places and to make proper recommendations on closure.

The issue of the closure of small village primary schools is very real, as is the issue of surplus places. It is clearly nonsense to include the issue of surplus places in the whole of an LEA's provision in a measure designed to apply to small rural primary schools.

If we are to maintain those schools, we have to accept that there will be surplus places in them, unless there is expansion in particular villages. The communities in many of the affected areas—especially the Yorkshire dales, near my constituency—remain relatively stable: numbers fluctuate, but they do not go up or down by huge leaps or bounds.

All schools should be treated the same, and LEAs should be obliged to make rational decisions close to the people. We would prefer it to be up to the LEA, in consultation with local communities, to make decisions about the closure of schools, be they small rural primary schools or large urban secondary schools, on the basis of standards, of what is required for the community, and of what is financially acceptable to the authority.

Mrs. May: The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) summed up the debate about the new clause when he said that, if the Minister meant what he said in the media about small village schools, he would support it.

The new clause is designed to put into effect what the Minister stated was the Government's policy. I hope that he will be able to put us out of our misery by saying that he does indeed support it, but I have a suspicion that he may not do so. That says an awful lot about the Government's attitude to rural communities and the cynical way in which he was willing to appear on television at the drop of a hat to announce a new policy to pacify those who are genuinely concerned about the Government's general attack on the rural community.

In Committee, we debated the removal of the right of parish and town councils to appoint governors to the governing bodies of their local schools. That is an issue about which my local parish and town councils are extremely concerned. They have written to me to point out that the school is an essential part of the local community, as is the parish council. It is important to retain the heart of the local community, especially in dispersed rural communities, which is represented by the village school.

The Minister tried to placate people in rural areas by suggesting that the Government are adopting a more helpful policy towards village schools than was intended when the Bill was first drafted. There are 14 new clauses and well over 100 amendments on the amendment paper today. More than half are Government amendments, yet nowhere in them is there an attempt by the Government to place on a statutory basis the new policy that they claim, hand on heart, to have adopted. That says more than anything else about the Minister's press release and appearance on television. The policy he announced is a policy in words only. If it were not, the Government would support the new clause.

The Government should think again about rural schools, which play a key part in the community. They may find that the issue comes into conflict with their announcements on infant class sizes. They have said that, if a 31st child is due to come into a village school, either he or she could go to another rural school, which may indeed have been closed, or the money could be given to the first school to accommodate that child. They will have to think carefully about the interaction of their policy on rural schools with their commitment on infant class sizes.

If he is serious about the policy that he announced in the national media, the Minister should accept new clause 13 with open arms, and thank the Opposition for having put into words, for inclusion in the Bill, a policy that he claims to support.

Mr. St. Aubyn: My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) wondered why the Minister's honeyed words had not translated into an amendment to the Bill. The answer is simply that a march by 385,000 people generates a media response from the Government, but that, to get a measure into one of their education Bills, one has to belong to the union.

In whatever areas the unions have opined regarding the Bill—on partnership provision between LEAs and independent schools, for example, or on terms and conditions—the Government bend to what they are told behind closed doors; but when it comes to trying to pacify rural areas, it is a different story. Unless the Minister can spin a convincing tale, we will draw the natural conclusion that what he said was all for effect, with no real meaning.

I am delighted to support the new clause moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton. It was a previous Angela—Dame Angela Rumbold—who, as a schools Minister in the previous Government, first outlined a clear Government pledge in support of village schools. She did so in February 1987, which I remember because I was making my first attempt to enter Parliament. Despite my lack of success on that occasion, we all learned the importance of village schools.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) spoke of a level playing field. In a rural area, such as the part of Cornwall in which I lived for 10 years, there is no level playing field. It sometimes takes a wider view, which may come from a departmental angle rather than from a local education authority, to balance the needs of a rural area against the diktats of the pure numbers and costs of keeping a school open.

In the light of the epic announcement last week of the ending of outdoor lavatories at schools, how many of the schools involved are village primary schools?

Noble though the Minister's aim may be of eliminating that inheritance from, as he told us last week, the Victorian era—I am glad that he does not blame everything on the previous Conservative Government—what is the education priority for a village primary school that is facing closure? Is it to spend on average £60,000 to provide loos for the children, or is it to spend it in a way that will guarantee that the school continues through hard times as well as good?

5 pm

I know from experience of village schools in my constituency that they are often on a knife edge because of their financial situation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said, many will be under particular pressure because of the Government's commitment on class sizes.

One village school near where I live has 70 children and can just afford to provide two full teachers, which makes for a class size of 35. I challenge Ministers to show me any primary school in which children get a better education than they do at that school. It serves nearly all the children in the village, and if it has to reduce the numbers in its classes to 30, not only will some children in the village have to travel much further to school, causing yet more congestion on roads when commuter traffic is at its height, but the very survival of the school will be put at risk because of the loss of income from the additional children.

These are serious questions for the Minister. Will schools that have the £60,000 be given the option to choose to spend it on higher priorities, and will schools that have more than 30 children per class be allowed to put the survival of the school before the priority of a class size of 30?

Mr. Blunkett: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the acquisition of an inside toilet might persuade some of his constituents who are putting their hard-earned money into private education to send their children to that excellent infants school instead?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that people who send their children to schools in Surrey take into account a range of factors. The factor that he has suggested is pretty well bottom of the list. It is not a key factor in deciding where one sends one's child to school. Parents will consider the performance of the school—for example, in attaining literacy standards, and its proximity to their home.

Frankly, as someone who has survived the indignity, as the right hon. Gentleman sees it, of an outside loo when I was at school—he may judge for himself how much damage it has done to my character and personality—I hold no brief against my parents for deciding on that school despite the lack of basic necessities. The right hon. Gentleman's argument is absurd, and I note that he avoided the real question, which was why a school that might need the £60,000 to keep going should be obliged to pander to his whims and sentiments at the expense of its very survival.

Mr. Byers: A number of issues have been raised in this brief debate on new clause 13, and I will try to answer all of them. First, I must deal with the concerns outlined by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley)—in particular, the letter sent by an official from my Department. Letters were sent asking each local education authority to consider surplus places—an issue that the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) raised—and drawing attention to schools that had more than 25 per cent. of places empty.

The Government take the view that local authorities should review provision to ensure that value for money is achieved. In Kent, 48 primary schools and 25 secondary schools have more than 25 per cent. of their places vacant, and it is appropriate for the Government to ask the local authority for an explanation.

However, that must be seen in the context of my written reply to a question from the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) on 26 February on surplus places and the duty and responsibility of local education authorities. In that reply, I clearly said that the Government recognise "that authorities will want to take into account any unusual circumstances, for example geography and social make-up."—[Official Report, 26 February 1998; Vol. 306, c. 364.]

Therefore, in answer to our request for information about those schools, it is for the Kent local education authority to point out the rural communities that might be served by them. It is clearly important for both the Government and Kent local education authority to consider the needs of the school in the context of the community it serves.

[Mr. Byers]

I take the point made by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling. We are not considering all schools equally. As was said in the statement on 28 February, we recognise that, yes, the matter should be determined by the Secretary of State, but, more importantly, that there should be a presumption against closure, which is vital if we are to offer rural schools far greater protection than they have had.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald): The Minister will be aware that, in the list of Kent schools to which he has extensively referred, no fewer than 10 are Church of England primary schools. He will also be aware of the considerable concern about what will happen to denominational schools that face the problem of the 31st child.

Parents who seek to place their children in denominational schools put first and foremost the teaching of the faith and are looking for the denominational school concerned. If 10 under-subscribed Church of England primary schools are taking children who could not get into over-subscribed schools of the same denomination, would that be a sufficiently unusual circumstance to guarantee that the school continued to function even if it remained heavily under-subscribed?

Mr. Byers: I will deal in a second with the issues that we might need to take into account when determining the schools that might be closed. As we made clear in the announcement on 28 February, we are not saying, "Never, ever," to the closure of a village or rural school. There must be circumstances in which a closure would be wholly appropriate, but we will consider whether parents are being offered real choice of denominational education if that is what they want. That factor must be taken into account.

I am sure that the right hon. Lady is aware that, in the discussions with the Church authorities on our class size pledge and our policy towards surplus places, we have reached a situation in which the authorities are broadly supportive of the Government's position. The Church education authorities have approached us about our pledge to reduce class sizes in infant schools, and broadly welcome our measures.

Miss Widdecombe: I am extremely grateful to the Minister for his generosity in giving way again. He has several times prayed in aid the attitude of the Churches to this issue. Is it not the case that the Roman Catholic Church at any rate broadly supports some limit on class sizes, and would want such a limitation to come about, but not at the expense of denying Roman Catholic education to Roman Catholic children?

Mr. Byers: That is the case, which is why, elsewhere in the Bill, we have made specific admissions provisions to meet those concerns. There is a special provision that admissions will not be dealt with by the adjudicator, as normally would be the case, but referred to the Secretary of State.

We inserted that provision to meet the concerns expressed by the Roman Catholic Church in particular. Our approach has been clear: that, if the Bill needs to be amended to make it better, we are prepared to amend it. We had several constructive meetings with representatives of the Church education authorities. In the light of their views and their concerns about the Bill as originally drafted, we made several changes. The admissions change is an example of one that we made because we believe that it meets the reasonable concerns of the Church authorities, and makes the Bill better.

On the point made by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling, if there is concern in Kent, I am happy to write to the chief education officer to clarify the Government's view on the matter. Geography and service to a rural village community are factors that must be considered in replying to letters from officials about surplus places. I hope that that clarifies the Government's thinking, and will reassure parents and teachers in the schools to which he referred.

It is interesting that the Conservatives seem suddenly to have discovered the importance of rural schools in this debate.

Mr. Dorrell: We offered exactly the same safeguard.

Mr. Byers: The right hon. Gentleman says that the Conservatives had exactly the safeguard that is being offered. He fails to realise that there are safeguards; I use the plural, because there are more than one. The great weakness of new clause 13 is that it seeks only to refer the matter to the Secretary of State. We need to go far beyond that if we are serious about protecting rural schools.

Since 1983, under the previous Government, 450 rural village schools have been closed. The Bill means that, between now and September 1999, such matters will be referred to the Secretary of State, as I made clear in my press notice. Most importantly, there will be a presumption against closure. Ministers will have particular regard to the need to provide access to a local school for local communities. No such presumption operated under the previous Government. That is why they were able to embark on wholesale closure of village schools. I will deal in a moment with the framework after September 1999.

It is not enough to refer such matters to the Secretary of State. There has to be a referral, and a presumption against closure, which will operate between now and 1999. The rate of closures under the previous Government works out at more than 40 a year. We will at least guarantee that, by September 1999, there will not have been such a closure rate.

Mrs. Browning: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: I want first to describe what we are doing to ensure that village schools provide the quality of education that the children attending them want. I do not want to take an announcement away from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but in April he will make known the allocations for the national grid for learning. They will make it clear that village schools will be linked to the national grid. By harnessing the benefits of new technology, we will be able to provide pupils in rural schools with a breadth and range of education experience that has been denied them.

Mrs. Browning: If it is simply a question of adding presumption of closure to new clause 13, or to another amendment, would the Minister accept such an amendment in another place?

Mr. Byers: I will not, because I was talking about safeguards, of which there need to be a number. It is not only a referral to the Secretary of State, a presumption against closure, and linking rural schools to the national grid for learning. It is also about reducing class sizes, which will benefit many schools, and giving them the benefits of the new deal capital money, which will make a real difference to rural primary schools.

I have an illustration of the contrasting approaches. Under the previous Government, Willington county primary school in Lincolnshire was closed in 1995, despite 28 statutory objections, an action committee and a delegation led by the local Member of Parliament. There were 23 children on the roll, and the alternative school was almost three miles away.

It is worth contrasting that with what happened to Edenham primary school, which is also in Lincolnshire, and which serves a village rural community. As a result of £97,000 from our new deal capital money, linked with £17,700 funded from people locally, it was able to provide new classrooms, making the school even more popular. Those measures are important, because they are part of the safeguards that rural schools need.

5.15 pm

The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) referred to what will happen after September 1999. That is important, because a new framework will operate under the Bill. Such matters will go to the school organisation committee. If there is no agreement, they will go to the local adjudicator. From September 1999, the Secretary of State will issue guidance about the measures. [Interruption.] If Conservative Members will listen, I will take them through what will happen, and what local parents will be able to do if they are unhappy about the final decision.

The school organisation committee will have to act in a reasonable way. If it fails to do so, and, for example, ignores the advice, guidance and regulations laid down by the Secretary of State, it can be challenged by parents for not acting in a reasonable way. If the matter goes to the adjudicator, he will also have to follow the guidance laid down by the Secretary of State, and that guidance will once again be a presumption against closure. If local parents feel aggrieved that the adjudicator has failed to take into account the guidance provided by the Secretary of State, they will be able to subject him to judicial review, which is exactly the position in respect of the Secretary of State at the moment.

The right hon. Member for Charnwood has not come to terms with the Bill. He needs to be aware that, between now and September 1999, every issue to do with potential closures of village schools will be referred to the Secretary of State. From September 1999, we move into a new school framework. When that happens, the school organisation committee and the adjudicator will have to act in line with guidance from the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State's guidance will include a presumption against closure. Despite crocodile tears from Conservative Members on behalf of rural village schools, they closed 450 in their period in office. That is the reality.

The Government have put in place safeguards and measures that will protect rural primary schools. We are acting where the previous Government failed to act. Whether under the existing arrangements or under the new framework that takes effect from September next year, we will provide the safeguards and resources to ensure that rural primary schools will provide high-quality education to meet the needs of their local communities.

Mrs. Browning: I once had a go at tapestry. The most frustrating thing was having to unpick the bits that went wrong. I was reminded of that by the Minister. I might take it up again.

What the Minister said on 28 February was short of the full story. We have now had the full story. When he said that an LEA's proposal to close a rural school would be called in by the Secretary of State for decision, the assumption among parents and in rural schools was that the Secretary of State would personally intervene in future, with a presumption against closure to protect rural primary schools. At the same time as the Minister was saying that, he was taking a Bill through Committee. He knew that there was a cut-off date about a year after the Bill would receive Royal Assent, after which the whole system would be changed.

An adjudicator will make a judgment independently, on the merits of a case put before him or her. It is clear that, whatever guidance the Secretary of State gives, there is no comparison between an adjudicator's decision and something being called in by the Secretary of State.

I raise again a point that I made in Committee. When a school is due to be closed, Members of Parliament rightly wish to represent their constituents. They have the power, with the Secretary of State's permission, to take delegations to Ministers in the Department to make sure that their case is raised at the highest levels of Government. They can call Ministers to account—at least, they certainly could under the previous Government—on the Floor of the House for decisions they make. The Government's proposals are a departure from that.

The Minister has revealed tonight that, on 28 February, he had to come to the aid of the party on an issue that was different from anything that his Department normally has to deal with. He had to stitch together some press statement that would make his part in the Government sound user-friendly to the rural communities, at the eleventh hour. He is now having to unpick what he said, so that he can continue to take the Bill through the House without having to amend it to honour that pledge. It is a matter of honour.

If the Minister really believes what he said on 28 February but cannot accept the wording of new clause 13, he could amend the Bill in another place, or he could have tabled an amendment on Report. The fact that he did not table an amendment in Committee or on Report to back up the pledge he gave on 28 February shows that, for all the rhetoric and going round the houses on money for this and money for that, rural primary schools are no better off with all these new pledges than they were before.

[Mrs. Browning]

Measures in the Bill that we had already debated by 28 February made that clear. We had already been through that part of the Bill. Liberal Democrat Members know that that is the case. Rural primary schools' fate was already signed and sealed, because we had dealt with the adjudicator by that stage; but that did not figure in the Minister's press release. The press release did not tell the full story, if I may use those words.

As I have the attention of the two Liberal Democrat Members, may I say that this is the first time that I have ever heard a Liberal Democrate—Liberal Democrat—[Laughter.] "Crate" was perhaps the right word. This is the first time that I have heard a Liberal Democrat make the case for not taking into account the problems of rural areas. They are normally the first on their feet to say that there are special circumstances when rural issues are debated. I have to say to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) that I feel an "In Touch" coming on.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): I remind the hon. Lady that "In Touch" is the newsletter put out, rarely, by the Conservatives. The Liberal Democrat one, which goes out more frequently, is called "Focus".

Does the hon. Lady agree that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough did not make the comments that she has just said he made? Does she accept that, when closure of any school is considered, three criteria should be taken into account? The first is the educational impact that the closure may have. The second is the financial implications. The third should be the impact that the closure may have on the local community. All three should be taken into account on every closure, whether of a small rural primary school or of any other school.

Mrs. Browning: I did mean "In Touch". I do feel a Conservative "In Touch" coming forward. The record will show exactly what the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough said in putting his case.

I support what the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) says, except that, as he knows—I shall not waste the time of the House in rehearsing this too long—the effect of closure of a school on a rural community is different from the effect on an urban community. There is often no nearby school in a rural community, and transport problems are exacerbated by the closure of rural primary schools.

I am disappointed—but, perhaps cynically, not surprised—that the Minister says that he will not support the new clause tonight. I am saddened by that. It will make many people, especially in rural areas, question the statement that he made on television on 28 February. I ask the House to support rural primary schools, and to vote for the new clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 138, Noes 319.

Division No. 220] [5.24 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baldry, Tony
Beggs, Roy
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Burns, Simon
Butterfill, John
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James
Clark, Rt Hon Alan (Kensington)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rayleigh)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davies, Quentin (Grantham)
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Day, Stephen
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Faber, David
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Sir Alastair
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Gummer, Rt Hon John
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hawkins, Nick
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Madden, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Nicholls, Patrick
Norman, Archie
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Randall, John
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
St Aubyn, Nick
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shephard, Rt Hon Mrs Gillian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Smyth, Rev Martin (Belfast S)
Soames, Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher & Walton)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Townend, John
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Tyrie, Andrew
Walter, Robert
Wardle, Charles
Waterson, Nigel
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Wilkinson, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Sir David Madel and
Mr. James Cran.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashton, Joe
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Bradshaw, Ben
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Byers, Stephen
Cable, Dr Vincent
Caborn, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell–Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Corbett, Robin
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Crausby, David
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dewar, Rt Hon Donald
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Fatchett, Derek
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hancock, Mike
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Illsley, Eric
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kirkwood, Archy
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Livingstone, Ken
Lock, David
Love, Andrew
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall–Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Meale, Alan
Michie, Bill (Sheff'ld Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Oaten, Mark
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Rendel, David
Robertson, Rt Hon George (Hamilton S)
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Sarwar, Mohammad
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stinchcombe, Paul
Stoate, Dr Howard
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Straw, Rt Hon Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)

Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. David Clelland and
Mr. Jim Dowd.

Question accordingly negatived.

New clause 24

REINSTITUTION OF STANDARDS FOR EDUCATIONAL PREMISES

'.—Section 542 (Prescribed standards for school premises) of the Education Act 1996 shall be amended as follows—

(a) before "regulations" in subsection (1), there shall be inserted "Subject to subsection (1A)".

(b) after subsection (1), there shall be inserted—

"(1A) the minimum standard that regulations will prescribe are those as set out in the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1981".'.—[Mr. Don Foster.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Don Foster: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I am conscious of the fact that, later today, we shall have an opportunity to debate the issue of Office for Standards in Education inspections and the chief inspector's annual report. Although there may be many hon. Members who find some aspects of the chief inspector's comments controversial, I doubt that any would disagree with one of his comments in his 1996 annual report:

"Teachers who lack proper resources or who work in poor buildings experience problems which at best frustrate and at worst defeat their best efforts to do a decent job."

The chief inspector was talking not only about the quality of the buildings in terms of their fabric, but about the availability of appropriate space in which pupils can learn and teachers teach. Many of us are well aware of the serious detrimental impact that classroom overcrowding can have on the education of children.

The effect of the new clause is to reinstate into legislation requirements for minimum space standards. Those standards existed for a number of years, but were removed by the previous Administration in September 1996. When they were removed, there was an outcry from the Opposition parties—from the Liberal Democrats and from the then official Opposition, the Labour party. The minimum space standards which we are debating were laid out in the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1981, which established space standards in respect of recreation areas, playing fields, teaching accommodation, school land, school accommodation and even provision for boarders, and the individual regulations included a minimum net area of 2.3 sq m for each pupil in a nursery school.

The House will be well aware that very many of our schools, especially our primary schools, are bursting at the seams, not least because the schools standard number—the number of pupils that a school must admit—was based on the bulge years of the 1980s, when every bit of space in schools was used. As a result, very popular schools, and those in population growth areas, are too full. The situation is made even worse when, as sometimes happens, the admission limit set by a local education authority is higher than the standard number, creating real difficulty for many schools.

The capacity needs of our schools have changed since the introduction of the concept of the standard number. There have been huge changes in the requirement, not least because of changes in relation to the national curriculum and changes in our approach to providing support for children with special educational needs. Rightly, there has also been much greater concern about health and safety issues.

In those circumstances, it seems appropriate that, instead of the current general guidance, clear regulations are laid down on the space standards that should apply in our schools. One would assume that to be the view of the present Government, because, when in opposition, they were vociferous about that issue.

I draw the attention of the House to comments by the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), now Secretary of State for Education and Employment, in a speech when in opposition:

"There is nothing clever about a Government who . . . have now decided to deregulate the space available in our classrooms and the area available for leisure and recreation . . . if the schools do not have the space available, there are two answers. The Government can either provide the resources to ensure that they have the space and the safeguards, or they can deregulate and pretend that the problem does not exist."

Referring to the former Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), he said that she was

"bowing and capitulating to right-wing pressures on her, rather than meeting the needs of the service and making the provision required to improve our children's educational standards and to ensure the proper teaching that classroom staff want to deliver to the children in their charge."—[Official Report, 18 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 124-27.]

Those comments by the present Secretary of State were backed up by several Labour Members. I especially draw the attention of the House to the words of the present Co-Chairman of the Select Committee on Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge), in that debate. She said:

"The new proposals"— to remove the space standards—

"will lower standards, not improve them. They will prepare the ground for further cuts in capital investment in our schools, not lead to the much-needed physical improvement in our schools".

She said that the regulations that removed those space standards were

"short-sighted and wrong. They should not be introduced, and they cannot stand the test of time. They are wrong for our schools, they are wrong for our teachers, and, most importantly, they are wrong for our children."

I entirely agree with everything that the hon. Member for Barking said on that occasion. It was wrong to remove those minimum space standards, and the new clause gives an opportunity to reinstate them, which is obviously the wish of many members of the Labour party.

The idea of pupil entitlement to a reasonable learning environment was lost when the previous Government abandoned school premises regulations, but, as the hon. Member for Barking said in that debate, reinstating space standards is about

"sensible rules laid down by Parliament to ensure that minimum standards are enjoyed by all our children in all schools."—[Official Report, 16 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 132-34.]

I entirely agree with the hon. Lady, so I hope that hon. Members will support new clause 24.

Mr. Byers: The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and I share a belief in the need to ensure a quality learning environment in our schools, because we consider that high-quality education takes place where children have access to the facilities that they deserve. I disagree with the hon. Gentleman—and ask the House not to support new clause 24—because I do not believe that, by locking ourselves into the regulations that were appropriate in 1981, we shall provide the accommodation and buildings that are necessary for our children into the next century. New clause 24 would require us to return to the position in 1981.

The hon. Member for Bath rightly refers to the need to ensure that we invest in school buildings, and to ensure that we do not use the fact that there are no regulations under the Bill as an excuse to cut capital investment. The previous Government used the deregulation of school premises as an excuse to cut schools' capital spending. The present Government intend to increase the amount that we spend on schools' capital, but in a way that is flexible, and meets the needs of a variety of schools throughout the country. We are not convinced that the best way to do that would be to implement the 1981 regulations.

5.45 pm

We shall require authorities to prepare asset management plans, in which they will review their current accommodation, giving priority to those buildings and school premises that need to be updated, and that need investment to provide the type of accommodation in which high-quality learning can take place.

The asset management plans will not be filed away in the Department. They will provide the opportunity for investment with public money and—perhaps most important—will enable the private sector to support investment in school buildings. It has emerged from discussions between the Government and the private sector that the private sector needs, in effect, an audit of the condition of school premises, to make possible its financial support for increased investment in school buildings.

The Government are investing well in excess of £1 billion in schools capital as part of our new deal for schools, based on the experience this year, when £83 million of public spending led to £115 million of investment in our schools. We believe that, with funding from local authorities, Church authorities and the private sector, the new deal will make it possible for about £2 billion extra to be spent on schools capital.

In last week's Budget statement, it was announced that an extra £90 million would be made available for schools capital. The Bill provides new safeguards on the disposal of playing fields. We are increasing investment and safeguarding important assets.

I agree with the hon. Member for Bath that we should not simply defend the status quo and that changes are needed. I know that the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about this issue. I make this contribution in the hope that, when he has heard what I have to say, he will feel able to ask leave to withdraw the motion and new clause 24.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): Before the general election, there was considerable speculation from the Labour Front Bench about how much money would be needed to bring schools throughout the country up to what we would consider an acceptable standard; the figures suggested ran into several billion pounds. In the year that has nearly elapsed since Labour came to power, has the Department for Education and Employment done any work on finalising what it now estimates to be the total capital that will need to be spent on the school building programme over the next five years to bring schools to what we would all consider to be a desirable state of repair?

Mr. Byers: One reason why we want local education authorities to carry out their own asset management plans is to provide exactly that sort of detailed information. There will be 150 LEAs in England with effect from April this year, and all will be required to develop asset management plans. Once we have those, we will be able to identify the precise cost of bringing premises up to a suitable standard, not just for 1998 but for the next century as well. It will also allow us to trigger in investment from the private sector, which will be important in meeting our objectives.

On the points raised by the hon. Member for Bath and the concerns he expressed, at the moment we are operating under the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1996. It is our intention to review the regulations in the light of the hon. Gentleman's comments, recognising that they need to be changed to meet the objectives that I think we share. We will be prepared not just to review them in the light of the commitments in the Bill on, for example, school playing fields; if more general amendments are necessary—the hon. Gentleman may wish to suggest some for consideration—we will consider them.

I hope that, in response to what I hope the hon. Gentleman will view as a positive response to the issues which he raised, we will be able to avoid a Division on the new clause. However, if he presses the motion to a vote, I shall ask the House to reject it.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister was generous and positive in his response to this brief debate, but I shall still urge my hon. Friends to press the new clause to a Division.

I think that the whole House will welcome the Government's plans for an audit of the state of school buildings. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) said, we are well aware of the magnitude of the figure likely to be revealed by the audit. Some suggest that the backlog of repairs and maintenance to our school buildings amounts to £4.3 billion—and that does not take into account some of the additional sums that will be needed for the reduction of class sizes in key stage 1 primary schools and the overcrowding in a number of other schools. I suspect that the figure which my hon. Friend suggested is probably right.

[Mr. Don Foster]

It is also welcome that the Government are putting additional money into the repair and maintenance of school buildings. However, we should not be fooled by the sums of money that the Minister mentioned. When he spoke about £1 billion or so, he failed to remind us that that would be spent over a five-year period. When that is taken into account, the additional amount per year is much smaller than he suggested. The hon. Gentleman also did not point out that some of that money is to be used for capital purposes to meet another of the Government's election pledges, which is to reduce class sizes in key stage 1. Initially, the Government said that that pledge would be met entirely from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme, but we were then told in the Budget that additional capital money would be required from other sources.

We are pleased that some of that money will be used to get rid of outdoor loos in some of our primary schools. Hon. Members will have found it surprising that the Minister was able to announce the precise number of schools that will be assisted, when only two weeks ago, in answer to a question from me, he said that information on the number of schools with outside loos was not centrally available. I am delighted that, in only two weeks, he has been able to do such a detailed study and give the House the assurances that he did.

Mr. Byers: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way; I am sure that he would not want inadvertently to mislead the House. In replying to his parliamentary question, I did say that the Government did not hold the information centrally. However, we discovered subsequently that the two local authority associations had conducted their own survey, and it was on the basis of that information that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was able to announce that we shall assist more than 600 schools.

Mr. Foster: I am delighted that the Minister has confirmed my version of events. Two weeks ago, the Minister did not know that information; now he does. I am sure that the House is pleased that he has obtained that information and made the appropriate announcement.

I intend to press the new clause to a vote. The Minister said that it would lock us into the 1981 regulations, but that would be true for only a very brief period. The Minister was right to say that the regulations needed updating. However, the purpose of the new clause is to ensure that we put back on to the statute book a requirement to have premises regulations. When the Labour party was in opposition, it said that it was passionately in favour of that. We still believe in what the Labour party believed in less than 18 months ago. For that reason, I ask the House to support new clause 24.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 39, Noes 279.

Division No. 221] [5.55 pm

AYES

Allan, Richard
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Beggs, Roy
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Cable, Dr Vincent
Chidgey, David
Davis, Cynog
Foster, Don (Bath)
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Hancock, Mike
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Kirkwood, Archy
Livsey, Richard
Oaten, Mark
Öpik, Lembit
Rendel, David
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Smyth, Rev Martin (Belfast S)
Stunell, Andrew
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Webb, Steve
Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd
Willis, Phil

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Edward Davey and
Mr. Adrian Sanders.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashton, Joe
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Byers, Stephen
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Crausby, David
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dewar, Rt Hon Donald
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil

Hopkins, Kelvin
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Dr Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
Love, Andrew
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Meale, Alan
Michie, Bill (Sheffld Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Robertson, Rt Hon George (Hamilton S)
Robinson, Geoffrey (Cov'try NW)
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sarwar, Mohammad
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stinchcombe, Paul
Stoate, Dr Howard
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Straw, Rt Hon Jack
Stringer, Graham
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Wills, Michael
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. David Clelland and
Mr. Jim Dowd.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 21

KINDS OF FOUNDATION AND VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS AND TYPES OF FOUNDATIONS

Mr. Byers: I beg to move amendment No. 47, in page 19, line 10, leave out 'two' and insert 'three'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 48 to 51, 31, 65 and 70 to 75.

Mr. Byers: These are all technical amendments affecting voluntary schools. The vast majority of voluntary schools have foundations, but a small number do not. As the Bill is worded, a school would need to have a foundation to join the voluntary category. The amendments ensure that, if a voluntary school or a former grant-maintained school wishes to become a new voluntary aided school, it can do so without the procedural necessity of creating a foundation. The amendments do not more than that, and I hope that they will be agreeable to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 48, in page 19, line 13, leave out 'and'.

No. 49, in page 19, line 15, at end insert

'; and

(c) those not falling within either of paragraphs (a) and (b) but having been either of the following immediately before the appointed day, namely—

(i) a voluntary school, or

(ii) a grant-maintained school that was a voluntary school immediately before becoming grant-maintained, within the meaning of the Education Act 1996.'.

No. 50, in page 19, leave out lines 18 and 19 and insert—

'(i) any body of persons (whether incorporated or not but excluding the governing body) which holds land on trust for the purposes of the school, or

(ii) a foundation body;'.

No. 51, in page 19, line 20, leave out from 'if' to end of line 22 and insert—

'(i) such a body of persons exists for holding land on trust for the purposes of the school, or

(ii) the school belongs to a group of schools for which a foundation body acts under this section;'.

No. 31, in page 19, line 37, leave out

'by schools in connection with'

and insert

'in connection with schools'.

No. 65, in page 20, line 13, at end insert—

'(6A) Regulations under subsection (5) may, in connection with any matters falling within that subsection—

(a) modify any provision made by or under this Part of this Act;

(b) apply any such provision with or without modifications;

(c) make provision corresponding or similar to any such provision.'.

No. 70, in page 20, line 18, at end insert 'and'.

No. 71, in page 20, line 19, leave out from 'section;' to end of line 22.

No. 72, in page 20, leave out line 24.

No. 73, in page 20, line 30, at end insert—

'(9A) Any foundation established otherwise than under this Act which has no property other than the premises of any school or schools falling within subsection (8)(a) shall be a charity which (subject to section 3(5A) of the Charities Act 1993) is not required to be registered for the purposes of that Act (but is not an exempt charity for the purposes of that Act).

For this purpose "premises" includes a teacher's dwelling-house.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Clause 23

SCHOOL ORGANISATION COMMITTEES

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): I beg to move amendment No. 161, in page 22, line 9, at end insert—

'(d) a person nominated by other appropriate religious and local community groups.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 141, in clause 25, page 22, line 41, leave out from beginning to end of line 30 on page 23.

No. 162, in page 23, line 9, at end insert—

'(bb) requiring that agreement of the draft plan by the school organisation committee in respect of denominational school provision shall be by unanimity.'.

No. 163, in page 23, line 30, at end insert—

'(h) requiring the school organisation committee to consult with potential promoters of new schools in the formulation of the draft plan.'.

No. 142, in page 23, line 31, leave out 'in Wales'.

No. 143, in page 23, line 36, leave out 'in Wales'.

Mr. Dafis: The amendments that I have tabled in this group—Nos. 161 and 163—should be considered with amendment No. 164 and that group of amendments. I shall therefore deal only briefly with my two amendments—as an introduction to the main theme, to which I shall return in our debate on that later group of amendments.

I have tabled my amendments at the request of an organisation called the Third Sector Schools Alliance. I have absolutely no constituency interest in the issue, as I have no schools in my own constituency of the type dealt with in the amendments.

I was approached about the matter specifically because I tabled an amendment in Committee on the Education Bill in 1993, which would have enabled schools with alternative curriculums—such as Steiner and Montessori schools—to enter the state sector. In Committee, the then Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy)—now the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office—said that Labour, if elected to government, would support the principle of state funding for that type of school. I hope that Labour in power will maintain that position. A strong case can be made for providing those schools with state funding.

Amendment No. 161 would amend clause 23 by adding to the list of categories from which the regulations require that people are appointed to school organisation committees. The amendment would therefore add to the categories of local education authority members and representatives of the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church. Who in a pluralist society could quarrel with the principle of including persons from other religions and groups in school organisation committees? It is perfectly appropriate, and is at the heart of the amendment.

"a person nominated by other appropriate religious and local community groups"

Amendment No. 163 would amend clause 25—which deals with school organisation plans—and require consultation

"with potential promoters of new schools in the formulation of the draft plan."

The amendment would amount to extending the consultation process, to enable people with proposals for new schools to be consulted in the formulation of a draft plan.

I shall leave my comments on the matter there for now.

Miss Widdecombe: I shall address all my remarks to amendment No. 162, which I tabled, and which I shall, at the appropriate place—with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker—seek to press to a Division.

The basis of the amendment is the underlying presumption that, unless something is written in the Bill, it carries virtually no meaningful weight. Undertakings may be given behind the scenes; Churches may be reassured; bland words may be exchanged; very earnest sentiments may be uttered; and intentions may even be perfectly honourable—but the fact remains that, unless something is written in the Bill, nothing whatever will give it binding force. Circumstances change; financial and other constraints appear; Ministers come and go; and, occasionally, even Governments come and go.

There can be no reliance whatever on undertakings given in private, or even on notes in Committee, which do not carry statutory force. They can convey nothing other than a Minister's immediate intention in immediate circumstances.

In the extensive negotiations on the Bill that the Government have apparently been having with Churches, Churches may not have had the wool pulled over their eyes, but they have been much too easily satisfied with undertakings given that do not have the force of statute to back them up. Therefore, I am doing the job that I would rather the Churches themselves had done, and am trying to ensure that the Bill includes some powers for Churches, to safeguard their own specific interests.

6.15 pm

I have already expressed the Church's broad position. I have had consultations at the highest level—perhaps not the highest level, because I have not been to Rome about it, but the highest level in this country. From those consultations, I understand that the Church's position is that it supports lowering class sizes, if that is possible. It certainly supports the principle that class sizes should be limited if possible. However, that should not happen at the expense of denying a child—I speak specifically to the Roman Catholic issue—a Roman Catholic education. I am sure that the Church of England would also say that, although it might want to limit class sizes, if parents want their children to have a Church of England education, the 31st child should not find himself or herself denied that opportunity and forced instead to take a secular education.

When I explained the position to Church representatives, first they said, "The Government have promised us that we shall have more denominational places." I have not heard that promise reiterated, but I should be quite interested to hear whether Ministers have made such a promise, or whether perhaps there was a misinterpretation. If Ministers have made such a promise, how will they honour it, and in what circumstances?

If, for example, children are denied admission to the nearest Roman Catholic or Church of England school because class sizes are too big, will other denominational places immediately be created—which would require considerable Government investment? Or will secular schools first have to be filled with surplus students, who will thereby be denied denominational education? Perhaps only after that has been achieved and there are no surplus secular places, a few more denominational places will be included in the creation of more places. Which of those two routes will Ministers go down, to honour what Churches think is a commitment to provide more denominational places?

Church representatives also said to me, "It is all right, because even if all that starts to go wrong and we do not get the new denominational places, Churches have a veto." My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) stood at the Dispatch Box and asked the Minister, "What is that veto?" He had never heard of it; there was no veto.

I did a bit of exploration to discover how that misunderstanding could have arisen. It seems to have arisen because there will be representatives of Churches on school organisation committees. In Committee, it was said that there would be a drive for unanimity, and that, if there was not unanimity, the plan would have to go to the adjudicator. From that, Churches deduced that they effectively had a veto. They could always prevent unanimity on a plan that they did not like, and the matter would end up with the adjudicator.

Anyone can see that there is no provision for a veto in the Bill. The drive for unanimity depends only on a note in Committee and has absolutely no statutory force. Therefore, if a committee were not unanimous but had a clear majority, nothing in law or in statute would stop the committee enforcing its view over, above and contrary to the wishes of its denominational representatives.

I am seeking to give statutory force to the undertaking that was apparently given in Committee, but to limit it to denominational schools, because I am very exercised by the consideration that my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) raised in Committee. He said that, if one always insisted on unanimity throughout the system, every case would end up before the adjudicator. Therefore, I have sought to limit to denominational schools the undertaking that the Churches believe that they have been given—I believe that they are mistaken, but I hope that it was not done deliberately—that they will be able to exercise some sort of veto.

The amendment would mean that in a denominational school, it would not be possible to put through a draft plan—this could cover class sizes and the organisation of class sizes to meet any size limitation—without it going to the adjudicator if there were objections from the denominational representatives on the school organisation committee, unless the plan were already unanimously accepted. I do not think that even that is a wonderful solution, but regard it very much as second best. I hope that, when the Bill goes to another place, the original amendment, tabled by Conservative Members, simply to grant flexibility to denominational schools, will again be debated, perhaps with a happier outcome.

I make no apology for saying that I regard the amendment as a third or fourth best option from among the various ones already tried by my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood and my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton. However, it at least tests the Government to some extent. In their negotiations with the Churches, the Government promised more denominational places—they have allegedly promised this; I do not know, as I was not there—and a veto. The amendment tests whether they are going to come up with the second, and I hope that the Minister will deal with the first.

Mr. Willis: I am always interested in what the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) has to say, but I think she has done herself an injustice by tabling amendment No. 162. She rightly says that it is the third or fourth best option. The amendments tabled in Committee were superior in terms of their overall effect.

I have much sympathy with the need to protect admissions to Church schools—I have some very fine Church schools in my constituency—but the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald is basically saying that parents who opt for a denominational school should have their choice guaranteed. That is the effect of what she proposes.

Miss Widdecombe: That is not quite the effect. At the moment, if a school is heavily over-subscribed, the head can turn away a child of the relevant denomination, although he will bend over backwards not to do so. However, under the new proposals, the exact opposite will be the case. Even where a head and a governing body believe that they have the flexibility to accommodate extra children, they will not be allowed to do so. The amendment does not give a guarantee; I wish it did.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful for that clarification, but if the plan had to be agreed by the school organisation committee and the members representing denominational schools, because they had the veto, and if they insisted that there were sufficient places in Church schools to meet the demand, they would in effect be guaranteeing places to parents who wished to send their children to denominational schools. It is not worth having a long debate on the matter, but the issue has been highlighted.

I want to speak particularly to amendments Nos. 141 to 143. I am conscious of the time and the fact that we have much business to get through, so I shall be relatively brief.

[Mr. Willis]

We have somewhat reluctantly agreed that the school organisation committee will have a reasonable function. The Government have made a case for it, and we support the idea of greater co-operation between various groups of people in drawing up the organisational plan. There is a great deal of sense in that, but we do not accept that there should be yet another layer of bureaucracy involving the adjudicator.

If the Secretary of State does not trust local education authorities sufficiently to give them control over the plans, he should say so. He should say that there is not to be an adjudicator, but that, if the plan cannot be agreed by the school organisation committee and the local education authority, he himself will decide. In effect, the adjudicator will be the Secretary of State's placeman, and represents an unnecessary level of bureaucracy. Indeed, every attempt should be made to get the school organisation committee and local education authority to agree. Conflict between the two does not bode well for the harmonious running of an authority or for satisfaction for parents. Conflict makes it less likely that parents will be satisfied with the number and quality of places and where they are.

We shall not press our amendments to the vote, but we should like an assurance from the Minister that she will reconsider the issue of the adjudicator and allow local education authorities to decide on the plans once they have been submitted to them by the school organisation committee.

Mr. Dorrell: I endorse what my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) said. Her preference would be to solve the problem of the individual child from a denominational family by making the class size pledge more flexible. I entirely agree with her. Indeed, we tabled several amendments to that end in Committee and earlier on Report.

I also share my right hon. Friend's hope that, when the Bill reaches another place, a means will be found to introduce precisely the principle to which she referred. Should the other place choose to do that, we shall certainly sustain the principle when the Bill returns here. Given that that principle does not appear in the Bill, I support amendment No. 162. Should the Government not accept it, the official Opposition will support my right hon. Friend in pressing it to a vote when we reach the appropriate point.

Amendment No. 162 would establish that the denominational interest cannot be overruled in the school organisation committee. As my right hon. Friend stressed, to rely on an informal piece of advice that was circulated in Committee, and which was rather vaguely worded anyway, is no reassurance at all. It certainly does not constitute an enforceable veto, even it that is what was meant. My right hon. Friend is attempting to include that principle in the Bill, and she is right to do so.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) left me unclear whether it is still the Liberal Democrats' view that school organisation matters should rest with the local education authority, which I thought was the position that they adopted in Committee, or whether they are now saying that, whenever there is a contest in the school organisation committee, the matter should be referred not to the adjudicator, as the Bill provides, but to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Willis: We believe that the local education authority should make the final decision in consultation with the school organisation committee. My point was to ask: if there is to be another authority in the form of an adjudicator, who is to be appointed effectively by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of State might as well do the job himself. Why have yet another layer of bureaucracy?

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for clarifying the position. He continues to adopt the view that decisions are best made by the local education authority. I set out in Committee why we disagree with that proposition. I continue to believe that schools should be seen not as part of an integrated system, but as a series of local institutions responsible to the local community and accountable to parents. The principal responsibility rests with the governing body and the teachers at the school.

The difference between Conservative Members and Liberal Democrats was ventilated a number of times in Committee, and will come up again later—Liberal Democrats believe that the Government are insufficiently committed to the future of local education authorities to the extent that they are edging away from them, but we encourage the Government to go down that path, because we want a more varied, plural system of school provision that gives professionals working within the system a greater opportunity to develop new ideas and approaches to the delivery of high-quality, schools-based education. Plurality and variety would give parents real choice: I emphasise that key difference between Liberal Democrats and the official Opposition.

We support amendment No. 162, which stands in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald, for the reasons that I have given.

6.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Estelle Morris): There was agreement in Committee that the move to making decisions at the local level would be widely welcomed. Decisions are currently taken centrally in the name of the Secretary of State, except where local authorities publish unopposed plans. I should emphasise that our premise was that the existing system is not ideal, because that has not been apparent from the comments of Opposition Members.

The move to local decision making is crucial. We must maintain and treasure the important partnerships between providers of education, such as local authorities and the Churches. Such bodies must work together to provide sufficient places for children to ensure a cohesive pattern of education. I disagree with the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who said that those bodies are separate institutions with no relationship to each other. They have a relationship, because they serve the same community and sometimes members of the same family.

School organisation committees will ensure that that pattern can continue to serve the interests of children and their families. I said in Committee and say again that local authorities have played an important part in the provision of schools and education, as have the Churches over many centuries. We want that to continue, which is why the Bill will enshrine the representation of local authorities and Church of England and Roman Catholic Church diocese on school organisation committees. Hon. Members will welcome the recognition of the important role that those organisations play.

Amendment No. 161, which was moved by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis), is inappropriate. Some groups may be established in certain local authority areas, but not in others. We shall consult on the make-up of school organisation committees and publish regulations accordingly. The special place of the Church and local authorities is recognised in the Bill, but the issue of which other groups might be represented on the committees is best left to regulation.

Amendment No. 161 refers to "appropriate religious and local community groups".

Who would decide which groups were appropriate, and who would choose which community groups should be represented? Who would approach such groups and decide how they would be represented? I am not persuaded that groups that do not provide education should have a role on school organisation committees. I accept the spirit in which the hon. Member for Ceredigion moved the amendment on behalf of the Third Sector Schools Alliance, and I know of its work, but the amendment is inappropriate.

School organisation plans will be important facts-and-figures documents that describe the historical background of the provision of schools and places in local authority areas. They will provide the background against which decisions on individual schools will be made by school organisation committees. I remind hon. Members that the documents will not contain proposals for the future of individual schools, but will give a context for the proposals.

Amendment No. 163, which also stands in the name of the hon. Member for Ceredigion, requires

"the school organisation committee to consult with potential promoters of new schools" and is inappropriate. It will not be for a school organisation committee to consult; it must put facts and figures about the supply of places in its area in a school organisation plan, and therefore into the public domain. Promoters of new schools, whoever and wherever they may be, will be able to study it, object to it and make proposals.

The documents will not be secret; there will be consultation on them and they will be published locally. Decisions about how new schools should be set up will be taken locally.

Mrs. May: Will the Minister clarify her references to decisions being taken locally? I understand that school organisation committees would consider such decisions, but would they be referred to an adjudicator in certain circumstances—for example, when challenged? Did not she make it clear in Committee that adjudicators would not be local people, but would be brought in from outside?

Ms Morris: The hon. Lady is absolutely right to say that a decision would be taken by an adjudicator if a school organisation committee could not agree unanimously. An adjudicator with local knowledge, who works locally and visits an area—rather than someone who sits in Westminster—would take account of local considerations far more than does the current process.

We debated the matter long and hard in Committee. Our proposals for school organisation committees and adjudicators will ensure that decisions are made locally. The hon. Lady knows that it is not always possible to ensure that adjudicators are locals, but we shall consider regional balance when we appoint them. Her opening premise was right: decisions will go to an adjudicator when there is not unanimity.

The issue of unanimity brings me nicely to amendment No. 162, tabled by the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe). I hesitate to say this, and do not mean to be disparaging, but she claims to speak for the Churches because she does not think that they can speak for themselves. My hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards has had many lengthy discussions with the Churches and the Bill is better for that. Our early drafts have been changed because of the representations that were made by many groups, such as the Churches.

To imply that we have sought to pull the wool over the eyes of the Churches during many months of discussion is to discredit not only my hon. Friend, but the Churches. They are happy with the assurances on unanimity that we have given them.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Will the Minister give way?

Ms Morris: I shall give way in a moment.

The right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald is correct about the Churches, but we differ over whether her proposal should be included in the Bill. We have given assurances in Committee, and now on the Floor of the House, that school organisation committee decisions must be unanimous and will go to an adjudicator if they are not. Whether she believes them is a matter of trust—indeed, a matter of faith.

The right hon. Lady is a former Minister in a leading Department. She knows that primary legislation does not deal with every issue; we are not the first ministerial team to say that some issues are more appropriately dealt with by regulations. The matter will not rest on what has been distributed on a piece of paper—regulations with statutory force will provide for the need for unanimity.

Miss Widdecombe: The Minister said that assurances had been given in Committee and were now being repeated on the Floor of the House. As I have said, I was not present at the time, but the Churches believe they have been assured that, rather than a child's being denied a denominational place, extra denominational places will be provided. Has that assurance indeed been given?

Ms Morris: The right hon. Lady should not go over debates that have taken place in the past. We are well past the clauses that deal with class sizes. The right hon. Lady should have been present at the first sitting of the

[Ms Morris]

Committee if she wanted to debate issues of class size and denomination. She could then have supported her right hon. and hon. Friends.

Miss Widdecombe rose—

Ms Morris: I shall not give way again on this point. Class sizes are a matter for my hon. Friend the Minister of State, and he answered questions on that subject fully on Second Reading and in Committee. He has dealt fully with amendments tabled by the right hon. Lady and her colleagues. I suggest that the right hon. Lady read the reports in Hansard.

The measures proposed in the amendments will be contained in regulations. They will not rest on a whim based on something written on a piece of paper—and, as the right hon. Lady has already admitted, the Churches are well satisfied with the assurances that they have been given.

We have no intention of pulling the wool over the eyes of the Churches or anyone else. We do not wish to do that and we have no interest in doing it. We value the education that the Churches provide, and have provided for centuries, and we want to retain it in the future.

Mr. Dorrell: The Minister insists that she agrees with the principle in amendment No. 162. Why, then, will she not write it into the Bill?

Ms Morris: As I have already made clear, some measures are better left to regulations. The difference between the right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald is that the right hon. Lady does not believe us. At least the right hon. Gentleman seems to be saying that he believes us, although he would prefer the provision to be contained in primary legislation.

Mr. Dorrell: Why should it be in secondary legislation?

Ms Morris: We are advised by those who help us to draft legislation that the matter is appropriate for regulations.

Ultimately, what matters to the Churches—and what will matter to parents and children—is the honouring of a pledge; the pledge will be honoured. People can cite in court and elsewhere what is said by Ministers on the Floor of the House and in Committee: that has been proved. The pledge has been given, and it will be implemented in regulations. There is no need for it to be in the Bill as well. Those who speak officially on behalf of the Churches are happy with the assurances that have been given; I am sorry that the right hon. Members for Charnwood and for Maidstone and the Weald are not happy with them as well.

As for the amendments tabled by the hon. Members for Bath (Mr. Foster) and for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), I, too, was a little confused about whether they had moved substantially from what they said in Committee, but, following interventions from the right hon. Member for Charnwood, I think that we simply disagree on the issue. I think we agree that decisions are better taken locally and that—although hon. Members may not approve of the way in which the school organisation committees will be composed—there is grudging acceptance of the fact that they will do a good job, will protect interests and will try to secure unanimity, which is always right. The difference in opinion concerns whether the committees should be able to advise local education authorities or whether authorities should appeal to adjudicators or to the Secretary of State.

We dealt with the arguments in Committee. We want to take the centralised decision-making power away from Westminster and Whitehall and move it to the localities involved. As I told the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald earlier, the committee members will be in the locality. They will be able to weigh up arguments locally and perhaps look at patterns of decision making around the country. If the school organisation committee that we have established cannot agree, the appeal mechanism should also be as locally based as possible. We see that as a natural next step. Requiring unanimity in SOCs and recourse to the Secretary of State as the very next step surely flies in the face of our attempt to localise decision making.

Mr. Willis: We do not want the Secretary of State to interfere; we want decisions to be made by local education authorities after they have consulted SOCs. We think that decisions should be made locally by those who go to the ballot box every year—or every four years—to obtain the consent of the people.

Ms Morris: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that clarification. As he knows, local authorities will play a key role on SOCs, but they are not the only education providers in the locality. We are establishing a local decision-making process that will bring the partners together and aim for unanimity but enable the adjudicator to make a decision if unanimity is not possible.

Mr. Don Foster: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Morris: I will, for the last time.

Mr. Foster: As a democrat, does the Minister consider it more appropriate for decisions to be made by an individual appointed by the Secretary of State who has no democratic accountability to local people or by a group of people who have been elected by the local community?

6.45 pm

Ms Morris: The adjudicator will not make decisions in isolation. The Secretary of State, a democratically accountable individual, will issue guidance and regulations according to which adjudicators should make their decisions. Under the current system, more than 300 cases have been decided in Whitehall, in the name of the Secretary of State. It makes sense for such decisions to be made locally, but the democratic accountability exists because the guidance that the adjudicator will use will have been issued by the Secretary of State.

We have discussed these matters in Committee and now on the Floor of the House. Clause 25 is a move towards local decision making; we have established a mechanism to ensure that decisions are made locally and that the interests of local education authorities, Churches and parents are protected. I hope that the hon. Member for Ceredigion will see fit to withdraw amendment No. 161, but if he does not, I shall ask the House to vote against it and to resist those with which it is grouped.

Mr. Dafis: I shall ask leave to withdraw my amendment, but I noted what the Minister said about the appropriateness of including the proposals in regulations. I merely wish to emphasise the importance of proper consultation with interested parties before the regulations are drawn up.

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman has my party's support and I am sure that the Minister acknowledges the importance of talking to a wide range of bodies—especially those in the Third Sector Schools Alliance.

Mr. Dafis: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support. I await the Minister's response to the next group of amendments but one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Before the hon. Gentleman withdraws his amendment, perhaps we can hear from the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe). I believe that she wants to press her amendment to a vote.

Miss Widdecombe: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Having heard such an inadequate response, I feel that I must press amendment No. 162 to a Division.

I am always suspicious when a Minister who has been asked a clear question refers the questioner to statements made by colleagues. A simple yes would prevent a great deal of anxiety. In this instance, the yes was not forthcoming, and I remain fairly suspicious.

I know that many provisions must be dealt with in regulations. I might have swallowed that argument but for the sheer prescriptive detail of clause 97. I wonder why one simple reassuring extra detail cannot be included, and why it is so important not to give that detail statutory force.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it that the right hon. Lady is referring to amendment No. 162. At the appropriate time, she can move it formally for the purposes of a vote. Does the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) wish to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. Dafis: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 24

ADJUDICATORS

Mr. Dorrell: I beg to move amendment No. 89, in page 22, line 21, at end insert—

'(1A) Any vacancy for a post of adjudicator shall be advertised publicly;

(1B) Any advertisement issued under the terms of subsection (1A) of this section shall set out the qualifications sought in successful candidates for appointment as adjudicators and shall state the process by which decisions will be made about which applicants are appointed as adjudicators.'.

The amendment seeks to throw open what will otherwise be the almost completely closed world of the adjudicator. The Bill attributes huge power to adjudicators in the schools system; the amendment would increase their accountability.

The amendment is relevant to the previous debate on the role of the school organisation committee in designing an area's schools system. The Bill states that whenever the school organisation committee cannot reach agreement—assuming that the Government's assurances on the unanimity principle are given effect—the decision would fall, in the circumstances envisaged by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), to the adjudicator.

Similarly, terms elsewhere in the Bill provide that adjudicators will decide when there are local disputes about arrangements for admission to schools. Those are huge issues that impact directly on the choices parents make about which school their children will attend. They impact on the performance and development of popular and unpopular schools. They impact directly on the debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning)—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can have less background noise in the Chamber.

Mr. Dorrell: I was referring to new clause 13, which sought to give effect to the pledge made by the Minister for School Standards on the day before the countryside march: no rural school would close without a specific decision of the Secretary of State. It became clear in the debate on new clause 13 that the Minister's words meant nothing, because beyond September 1999—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will not allow the right hon. Gentleman to go over past business. We are debating amendment No. 89.

Mr. Dorrell: Both the new clause and the amendment are relevant to the adjudicator being accorded power. The amendment would increase public accountability of the person who will make the decision that the Minister said on television would be made by the Secretary of State. The Minister made it clear at the Dispatch Box this afternoon that, beyond September 1999, when the principle of unanimity, mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald, on the school organisation committee, which the Government accepted, leads to the decision not being made locally, the decision will be made by a public official—the adjudicator. The adjudicator will make decisions about the structure of school provision in an area when local forces cannot agree.

I agree with the Under-Secretary that it is better that local people agree, but when they cannot, who will decide whether a Catholic school expands or contracts? Who will decide whether a Church of England school expands or contracts? Who will decide whether a rural school closes? The answer to every question is, the adjudicator.

Then we come to the question: who are these adjudicators? To whom will my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald look when her unanimity principle is observed and local people cannot decide? Who will deal with the question that the public believe—the Minister for School Standards has assured them—will be made by the Secretary of State? Who will make such a decision on behalf of the Secretary of State and of the public?

[Mr. Dorrell]

When we raised these issues in Committee, the Under-Secretary gave what can only be described, charitably, as a rather incomplete answer. She suggested that adjudicators would be part time; possibly, she suggested helpfully—at least to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis)—they would be retired head teachers. We were led to believe that the Government would be going on patrol, looking for retired head teachers who wanted to spend two days a week making decisions on which rural schools should close, and the availability of denominational education on behalf of the constituents of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald and the interest groups about which is concerned—against the background of an assurance that the Secretary of State would make such decisions.

The same story runs through the Government. One of the first announcements after the general election was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would no longer decide monetary policy and would pass such decisions to Eddie George. Now we hear that key decisions on provision of the schools system will no longer be made by the Secretary of State for Education and Employment. They are to be passed to faceless people called adjudicators.

Under the amendment, there would at the very least be a public, open and accountable appointments system for public officials who will be making sensitive local decisions. We would be able to see who makes decisions that the public think will be made by the Secretary of State. The amendment would require any vacancy for such a powerful post to be advertised, so that we can see what type of official the Government envisage appointing to discharge such important functions. We should be able to see the Government's job description for an adjudicator. There is certainly no hint of that in the Bill. The Bill merely describes in broad terms the powers of the adjudicator; it tells us virtually nothing about the way in which the adjudicator is supposed to work.

In opposition, Labour Members made huge play of the need for open government. The amendment would ensure that the Government have to advertise adjudicator vacancies and state what qualifications they require. They would have to state how people will be appointed, to whom they will be accountable, how they will be called to account if a series of decisions lead to criticism of an adjudicator's role, and how, ultimately, they will be fired if they make decisions for which there is no basis of public support. The Bill answers none of those questions.

The Government are taking away powers to make key decisions on a locality's schools system from the Secretary of State, who is accountable to the House, and from junior Ministers, who respond to local concerns expressed by hon. Members, and according them to an appointed official. The amendment would begin a path to open up what will otherwise be a completely closed system.

Ms Estelle Morris: That was the most amazing eight minutes of hot air that I have heard in Committee or on Report. The answers are simple. The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) has received in writing the assurances for which he has just asked. He asked for the vacancy of the post of adjudicator to be advertised publicly. In a letter of 18 February, I wrote to him saying:

"We shall advertise the posts widely".

What more does he want?

Mr. Dorrell: I want it to be in the Bill.

Ms Morris: Ah, it is different now; it is not that he does not know what it entails, but that it should be in the Bill. The argument changes as the minutes go by. The right hon. Gentleman is trying to make a big issue of something on which he knows he has received assurances. Proposed subsections (1A) and (1B) describe proper procedures when appointing a person to fulfil the role of adjudicator. I again give the right hon. Gentleman the assurances that I gave him in Committee—at column 380 of the 11th sitting—and that I wrote to him about on 18 February. Both the things he asks for in the amendment have already been given.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Does my hon. Friend agree that the right hon. Gentleman's remarks are a bit rich, given that the Conservatives set up next steps agencies and appointed bodies that took responsibility from Ministers? I could probably give him a thick sheaf of replies to parliamentary questions in which he said that he was not responsible for a particular issue because it was the responsibility of a next steps agency. His argument smacks of hypocrisy.

7 pm

Ms Morris: My hon. Friend is right. The right hon. Gentleman is a late convert to accountability.

The amendment should be withdrawn. I do not disagree with anything that the right hon. Gentleman has said, but he has already had the assurances that he seeks. I am prepared to give them again on the Floor of the House. The posts will be advertised, and the advertisements will make it clear that the successful candidates will have to have a range of qualities that we shall decide on when we draw up the advertisements. We have wasted 10 minutes that could have been better spent. There are other issues on which we disagree, but we agree on this.

Mr. Dorrell rose—

Ms Morris: No, I shall not give way again.

We disagree only on whether the provision should be included in the Bill. I have given the right hon. Gentleman verbal and written assurances. There is no need to press the amendment. If he does so, I urge hon. Members to vote against it.

Mr. Dorrell: I had not intended to push the amendment to a vote, not because the issue is unimportant but because I want to get on to other issues, but not only did the Minister not answer my questions: she resisted my attempt to intervene to remind her of them. The Bill accords substantial powers to the new adjudicators. The Minister has given us an assurance that the posts will be advertised; she has not told us to whom the adjudicators will be responsible or what checks and balances there will be on their work.

I do not intend to push my amendment to a vote, but I give notice that I expect my noble Friends in another place to return to this important issue of accountability. If the school system is to be accountable to local people, it must be clear who makes the decisions, how those people are appointed and how they are held to account. The Minister did not explain that. We shall continue in another place to pursue the accountability of adjudicators. Against that background, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 162, in page 23, line 9, at end insert—

'(bb) requiring that agreement of the draft plan by the school organisation committee in respect of denominational school provision shall be by unanimity.'.—[Miss Widdecombe.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 118, Noes 308.

Division No. 222] [7.3 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baldry, Tony
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Burns, Simon
Butterfill, John
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James
Clark, Dr Michael (Rayleigh)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davies, Quentin (Grantham)
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Day, Stephen
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fox, Dr Liam
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hawkins, Nick
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Key, Robert
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Nicholls, Patrick
Norman, Archie
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Randall, John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
St Aubyn, Nick
Shephard, Rt Hon Mrs Gillian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher & Walton)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Townend, John
Tredinnick, David
Tyrie, Andrew
Walter, Robert
Wardle, Charles
Waterson, Nigel
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Sir David Madel and
Mr. James Cran.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashton, Joe
Baker, Norman
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnett, John
Byers, Stephen
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Corbett, Robin
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Crausby, David
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)

Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hancock, Mike
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Dr Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kirkwood, Archy
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Livsey, Richard
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall–Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Michie, Bill (Sheff'ld Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Oaten, Mark
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Rendel, David
Robinson, Geoffrey (Cov'try NW)
Rogers, Allan
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Sarwar, Mohammad
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shipley, Ms Debra
Short, Rt Hon Clare
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stinchcombe, Paul
Stoate, Dr Howard
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Straw, Rt Hon Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Vaz, Keith
Wallace, James
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. David Clelland and
Mr. Jim Dowd.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 27

PROPOSALS FOR ESTABLISHMENT OR ALTERATION OF COMMUNITY, FOUNDATION OR VOLUNTARY SCHOOL

7.15 pm

Mr. Dafis: I beg to move amendment No. 164, in page 24, line 35, leave out 'contain such information' and insert

'be required to seek approval against the following criteria;

(i) open to all irrespective of colour, creed, intellectual ability, social class or economic status;

(ii) offering a broad and balanced curriculum;

(iii) agreement to inspection and/or submission to SATs or other relevant evaluation procedures;

(iv) equal opportunities for girls and boys;

(v) no corporal punishment;

(vi) establishment of a mission statement of the ethos, beliefs, values and admissions basis of the school;

(vii) minimum requirement for the number of teachers with QTS and a qualified head;

(viii) premises or potential premises that comply with health and safety standards;

(ix) a minimum number of children and statements of intent from parents.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 166, in schedule 6, page 114, line 12, at end insert—

'(8) In the event of the proposals being rejected by the relevant committee, the governing body or promoters may appeal to the adjudicator for the decision to be reviewed, who may—

(a) reject the proposals;

(b) approve them without modification; or

(c) approve them with such modifications as he thinks desirable after consulting such persons or bodies as may be prescribed.

(9) In the event of the proposals being rejected by the relevant committee, the governing body or promoters may appeal to the Secretary of State for the decision to be reviewed, who may—

(a) reject the proposals;

(b) approve them without modification; or

(c) approve them with such modifications as he thinks desirable after consulting such persons or bodies as may be prescribed.'.

No. 167, in schedule 7, page 123, line 36, after 'insufficient', insert

'in the number and character of schools necessary to meet the needs of the area.'.

No. 168, in page 123, line 44, at end insert—

'(c) consult potential promoters of new schools, inviting them to make a proposal to establish a new foundation or voluntary school'.

No. 169, in page 123, line 46, after 'pupils', insert

'and for the requirement for schools of different character'.

Mr. Dafis: I now come to the substance of the argument that I mentioned briefly when we were discussing amendments Nos. 161 and 163. I reiterate that it was established in 1993 that the Labour party would look positively and sympathetically on the idea—indeed, would agree to the principle—that schools with alternative curricula might be accepted into the state sector as an alternative means of delivering a valid pattern of education.

There is a strong case for the provisions in the amendments. I am also bearing in mind the fact that the inclusion in the Education Act 1994 of the principle that parents should have a degree of choice over the type of education that their children received not only enabled some Church of England, Methodist, Roman Catholic and Jewish schools to obtain state funding but allowed the growth of Welsh-medium schools in primarily English-speaking parts of Wales.

Those schools started very small, but they are now making an outstanding contribution to education in Wales and have laid the basis for the revival of the Welsh language. One of the Government's education advisers, Professor David Reynolds, described those schools as the jewel in the crown of Welsh education. They were started through the kind of provision that I am arguing should be applied also to other categories of school.

The Third Sector Schools Alliance wishes that privilege to be extended to a wider range of schools so that they can be allowed to enter the state sector, probably as voluntary aided or community schools. It wishes to present its case to the Minister, and I hope that she and her colleagues will agree to meet its representatives. The principle is important; I know that many hon. Members, including Labour Members, are keen for the Government to allow such a meeting to occur, and that some of them would like to participate in it.

The schools that I am talking about find it difficult—in some cases, impossible—to enter the state sector. Some are Christian schools, some Muslim and some Buddhist, while some, such as the Steiner-Waldorf schools and the small schools of the Human Scale Education Movement, could be described as having a philosophical foundation. The amendments would facilitate such schools' entry into the state system.

It is accepted that schools should meet a set of criteria to obtain state funding, and proposals for some of the criteria are set out in the amendment. The amendment would amend clause 27, which deals with the establishment of new schools—community, foundation or voluntary. I wish to draw attention to some of the criteria. For example, schools entering the state system should be "open to all irrespective of colour, creed, intellectual ability, social class or economic status."

We are not talking about schools that are closed to a particular category of pupil.

Under the amendment, such schools would have to establish a mission statement of their ethos, beliefs, values and admission basis so that parents knew what they were buying for their children. They would have to offer a broad and balanced curriculum, agree to inspection and submit to standard assessment tests. They would have to meet a minimum requirement for the number of teachers with qualified teacher status. We are not talking about schools that wish to escape from the rigorous expectations that one would have for schools receiving public funding.

The Third Sector Schools Alliance says that we might accept other stringent conditions before a school was accepted: the group proposing to enter the state system must first have started a school; the school would receive state funding only after the first or second year, and on a three-year trial basis; the funding would be for revenue and not capital costs. Some may fear that the system will be inundated with applications for additional schools in the state sector, but there is no danger of that. Only schools that met the criteria in terms of provision, framework and conditions of entry could apply.

The alliance wants applications to be judged with consistency, transparency and fairness, and feels strongly that that is not the case at present, finding that there is no consistency, and often no transparency, in relation to the reasons offered for rejection. It wants the ground rules for decisions on applications to be well understood.

Amendment No. 166 proposes an appeals process for cases where there is disagreement on the outcome of considered proposals, which is reasonable. Amendments Nos. 167, 168 and 169 would broaden the definition of insufficiency of provision, which, as it stands, refers to numbers. The alliance wants the definition to include variety of provision.

There is a powerful case for the Government to accept the amendments. First, the principle that different value systems should be expressed in educational provision was established in the Education Act 1944, which enabled denominational schools to be accepted into the state system. There can be no justification for refusing the same privilege to other faiths.

Secondly, few would challenge the idea that diversity of approach and innovation within a rigorous framework are valuable and that we have much to learn from, for example, the Steiner-Waldorf tradition. How can we justify forcing such schools to remain in the private sector when they want to be part of the maintained system? What justification can we give to those pupils who wish to receive that provision—which we recognise as valuable and which could make an important contribution—for obliging them to go to the private sector?

The amendments do not challenge the idea of a national curriculum: they allow departures from it within a proven alternative. Flexibility was the reason for the inclusion of sections 16 and 17 of the Education Reform Act 1988, which established the national curriculum. Those sections were drafted to allow the national curriculum not to apply in certain circumstances, or to apply with modification. The provisions had strong cross-party support at the time, and prestigious people argued that it was important to provide space for innovation and alternative approaches.

[Mr. Dafis]

Numerous countries provide state funding for new community schools, and the United Kingdom is unusual in not making such provision. Denmark provides 85 per cent. of the running costs for such schools, and Holland 100 per cent. Similar arrangements exist in Sweden, Finland, the Czech Republic, Hungary and Germany. The principle is well established, and the principle of choice in these matters is enshrined in decisions at UN level and in the European Parliament.

I emphasise that the schools that we are discussing are not elitist and do not select on the grounds of ability. I hope that the Government regard that as a recommendation. Many have a good track record in providing for disadvantaged pupils and underprivileged localities. I can think of one such school which makes wonderful provision for children with learning difficulties. Such schools can make an important contribution.

I do not expect the Government to accept the amendments, but I hope and trust that they are receptive to the principles behind them and that Ministers will wish to conduct a serious dialogue with the interested parties. I hope that Ministers will agree to meet the Third Sector Schools Alliance, which has fought this issue thoroughly.

Earlier, the Minister spoke about the long discussions with the Churches and emphasised the value of the dialogue. We live in a more pluralistic society than that which generated the 1944 Act, with its provisions for denominational schools. Other religious organisations should be given their chance, and other providers working on a coherent philosophical basis need to be included. It would be wrong to exclude such schools when so much emphasis has been placed tonight on dialogue with the denominational sector.

Ms Estelle Morris: I thank the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) for his contribution. As a former teacher, I have often felt that we can learn much from schools outside the mainstream framework. I do not want any of my comments to be construed as disrespectful to the schools to which he has referred, which do a good job, often with children who have found it less appropriate to learn in other situations.

The hon. Gentleman tabled the amendment on behalf of the Third Sector Schools Alliance, and I understand something about what that group represents. I hope that he will accept that it is not appropriate to set out in primary legislation such detailed information as appears in the amendment, but I assure him that we shall publish guidance for school organisation committees and adjudicators on what they must take into account in making decisions.

The hon. Gentleman rightly talked about the need for obvious consistency, transparency and fairness when decisions are made about whether schools should enter the maintained sector. I agree that our actions should be guided by those qualities. He may not know that, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently announced that some Muslim schools would receive state funding, we issued for the first time criteria under which such decisions were to be made. We set out five criteria—if the hon. Gentleman has not had the opportunity to read them, I shall ensure that he receives a copy.

Previously, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, those criteria had not been in the public domain, although I do not suggest that previous Governments acted unfairly or inconsistently. In fact, I do not know whether they did or did not, because I did not see the criteria. When the criteria are not made public, that can give rise to suspicion, which is not a good way in which to do business.

7.30 pm

I do not want to give undue cause for hope, so I should say that existing legal requirements go beyond the criteria that the hon. Gentleman has included in the amendment. We are not yet issuing guidance to school organisation committees and adjudicators, but let me pick out three criteria from the amendment with which we would have difficulty and which I do not expect to see in the guidance.

First, we believe that all teachers should have qualified teacher status, except in rare cases—for example, graduates who are teaching as part of their training to acquire that status. Secondly, we believe that all schools should teach the national curriculum. Thirdly, religious schools will always be able to select on the basis of creed, so the first criterion in the amendment, which seems to be one that we should all applaud, would in fact cause difficulty for Church schools.

It is important that all the criteria can be defended. Parents need to know that there is a bottom line for children who are educated in a school that is maintained by the state. There will be diversity—all schools are different; they have an individual ethos and approach—but that must be in a framework of expectations for children about which parents can be sure.

I can give an assurance that the framework for decision making that we shall bring forward will state that the national curriculum should be taught, that teachers should be qualified, and that religious schools should be able to recruit children on the basis of their creed and their parents' creed. Above and beyond that, there will be for the first time—I think that the hon. Gentleman will welcome this—a set of guidelines against which decisions are made, so that those who want to enter the maintained sector will at least know how they will be judged.

I suspect that some of the schools to which the hon. Gentleman referred—I cannot speak for them—will find it difficult, and will not be willing, to meet some of the criteria. That is their decision. We were able to grant funding to some Muslim schools because they met the criteria; other Muslim schools will not meet them. We are not talking about excluding one group and including another; as the hon. Gentleman said, we are talking about consistency, transparency and fairness. As he rightly predicted, we shall not accept the amendment, but I hope that he will take some comfort from the fact that that fairness will exist.

Mr. Dafis: Will the Minister undertake to meet representatives of the Third Sector Schools Alliance to discuss its concerns and what she has said?

Ms Morris: The hon. Gentleman knows that we meet a wide range of educators all the time. It is difficult to know the diary commitments of my ministerial colleagues, but I should certainly respond positively to a request for a meeting. I hope that, having been given assurances about fairness, consistency and transparency, the hon. Gentleman will see fit to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Dafis: I thank the Minister for at least agreeing to a meeting, during which I hope that she can discuss some of the issues that she has raised, which deserve further consideration.

I am disappointed by the total inflexibility that I detect on the curriculum. Despite its over-prescriptiveness, the national curriculum undoubtedly provides a useful framework for teachers, but I find it worrying that it should be used as a straitjacket, making it is impossible for schools with a valid and proven approach to education, but with an alternative curriculum, to enter the public sector. If such schools prove beyond doubt through outcome their effectiveness, and if others can recognise and learn from that success, I cannot see why such schools should not, in any circumstances, be let into the maintained sector.

The previous Government had a particular approach to prescription from the centre—that approach gave rise to the legislation behind the national curriculum in 1988—but the Labour Government should be prepared to think afresh. I hope that they will take a more—dare I say—liberal approach to education, which is essentially a liberal and liberating activity. There must surely be scope for flexibility, and I argue strongly that that door should not be closed. However, having been assured that there will be a meeting at which these matters can be carefully discussed, and that there will be a continuing dialogue, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 29

NOTICE BY GOVERNING BODY TO DISCONTINUE FOUNDATION OR VOLUNTARY SCHOOL

Ms Estelle Morris: I beg to move amendment No. 98, in page 27, line 7, at end insert—

'(aa) by the Funding Agency for Schools;'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 99 to 112.

Ms Morris: The amendments are technical. They are designed to secure proper protection for public investment in maintained schools, and will close a recently discovered loophole. I am sure that the whole House will agree that public investment in schools must be protected wherever possible—the amendments will do exactly that, so I trust that they will receive the support of the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 99, in page 27, line 18, leave out 'this section' and insert 'subsection (1)'.

No. 100, in page 27, line 36, leave out 'this section' and insert 'subsection (1)'.

No. 101, in page 27, line 38, leave out from beginning to end of line 40.

No. 102, in page 27, line 45, at end insert—

'(11) Where—

(a) land occupied by a foundation or voluntary school is held by any trustees for the purposes of the school, and

(b) the termination of the school's occupation of that land would have the result that it was not reasonably practicable for the school to continue to be conducted at its existing site, then if the trustees (being entitled to do so) give any notice to the governing body which purports to terminate the school's occupation of the land, any such notice shall not be effective to terminate its occupation of the land unless the requirements of subsection (12) are complied with in relation to the notice (without prejudice to any other statutory or other requirements falling to be so complied with).

(12) The requirements of this subsection are—

(a) that the period of notice must—

(i) be reasonable having regard to the length of time that would be required to discontinue the school (if the governing body chose to do so), and

(ii) in any event must not be less than two years; and

(b) that a copy of the notice must be given to the Secretary of State and the local education authority at the time when the notice is given to the governing body.

(13) Where trustees give, at the same (or substantially the same) time, notices purporting to terminate a foundation or voluntary school's occupation of two or more pieces of land held by the trustees for the purposes of the school, then for the purpose of determining whether subsection (11)(b) applies in relation to any of those pieces of land, regard may be had to the combined effect of terminating the school's occupation of both or all of them.

(14) If a question arises as to whether the termination of a school's occupation of any land would have the result mentioned in subsection (11)(b) (including a question as to whether subsection (13) applies in any particular circumstances), it shall be determined by the Secretary of State.

(15) In subsections (11) and (13) "the purposes of the school" includes purposes which (whether the trust deed expressly so provides or not) include the purposes of the school.'.—[Ms Estelle Morris.]

Clause 43

MAINTAINED SCHOOLS TO HAVE BUDGET SHARES

Amendments made: No. 4, in page 34, line 10, after 'shall' insert 'accordingly'.

No. 5, in page 34, line 11, at end insert 'falling within paragraph (b)'.

No. 9, in page 34, line 11, at end insert—

'(4) In this Chapter "new school" (without more) has the meaning given by section 68(2).'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Clause 47

MAINTAINED SCHOOLS TO HAVE DELEGATED BUDGETS

Amendment made: No. 1, in page 37, line 32, leave out from '1996' to end of line 34.—[Mr. Byers.]

Clause 48

EFFECT OF FINANCIAL DELEGATION

Amendment made: No. 81, in page 38, line 22, at end insert

'(or, in the case of temporary governors of a new school, regulations under section (Arrangements for government of new schools)(5))'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Clause 50

FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Mr. Byers: I beg to move amendment No. 56, in page 39, line 4, leave out from beginning to 'as' and insert

'their planned expenditure in that year'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 57 to 62, 82, 63 and 64.

Mr. Byers: The amendments will achieve two objectives. First, they will ensure that, for the first time, we will have full information about local authority expenditure on a single return. That is not the case at present, and difficulties can arise. We debated in Committee the difficulty in identifying exactly where LEAs are spending their money. We all want as much money as possible to go to schools, and the returns that we will require the authorities to make will ensure that we can do that.

Secondly, amendments Nos. 63 and 64 are technical amendments reflecting the fact that an Audit Commission Bill is currently before Parliament. They will amend the Bill to reflect the fact that, in due course, the Audit Commission Bill, rather than the Local Government Finance Act 1982, will have effect on certain parts of the legislation. I commend the amendments to the House.

7.45 pm

Mrs. Browning: I seek some clarification. We welcome more transparency in identifying how the education budget has been spent and apportioned by the LEA, but within some LEAs the accounting practices for certain fixed costs—mainly the salaries not so much of teachers as of the chief education officer and other staff—mean that they are almost invisible, because they are included in the rounded figure for management and administrative charges in the county as a whole.

It is often difficult to identify exactly how much of the education budget has been transferred to other internal budgets for such purposes. In the return that the LEA will make to the Government, will there be an opportunity to identify clearly where the money has gone? Until one can do that, it is difficult to identify where the LEA has top-sliced certain tranches before apportioning the schools budgets. Can we have some clarification?

Mr. Byers: The amendments will require the LEA to make returns on non-general schools budget aspects, which may well cover the specific spending areas to which the hon. Lady refers. Perhaps more important, we will have the support of the Audit Commission, working alongside the independent inspectorate Ofsted, as a result of the new inspection regime. I am sure that the Audit Commission will carefully consider the additional areas of expenditure that are all too often subsidised by schools at the expense of the education that our children receive.

The combination of the information that we will receive as a result of the amendments and the Audit Commission's new inspection role will enable us to take action when we feel that the schools system is subsidising expenditure elsewhere, not only within the local education authority but in the local authority generally.

I hope that, with those words of reassurance, the House will agree to the amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 57, in page 39, line 9, leave out 'financial provision' and insert 'expenditure'.

No. 58, in page 39, line 11, after 'incurred' insert

', or treated by the authority as having been incurred, by them'.

No. 59, in page 39, line 11, leave out from 'year' to ', and' in line 12.

No. 60, in page 39, leave out lines 13 to 17 and insert—

'(c) any other resources allocated by the authority in the year to schools maintained by them during any part of the year.'.

No. 61, in page 39, line 24, leave out

'in such circumstances as may be prescribed'

and insert 'if regulations so provide'.

No. 62, in page 39, line 26, leave out 'a statement' and insert 'such a copy'.

No. 82, in page 39, line 30, at end insert

'at any time before the school opening date'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Clause 51

CERTIFICATION OF STATEMENTS BY AUDIT COMMISSION

Amendments made: No. 63, in page 39, line 34, leave out

'29(1)(d) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982'

and insert

'28(1)(d) of the Audit Commission Act 1998'.

No. 64, in page 39, line 39, leave out '29(1)(d)' and insert '28(1)(d)'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Clause 68

PROVISION FOR NEW SCHOOLS

Amendments made: No. 6, in page 51, leave out lines 7 to 10 and insert—

'(a) the staffing and conduct of a new school in advance of the school opening date;

(b) the determination of matters in connection with a new school in advance of that date;

(c) the taking of decisions by a temporary governing body, or (where power to do so is delegated to him) by the head teacher, as to expenditure in connection with a new school at a time when it does not have a delegated budget;'.

No. 7, in page 51, line 12, at end insert—

'(1A) Regulations under subsection (1) may, in connection with any matters falling within that subsection, apply any provision of the Education Acts with or without modification.'.

No. 8, in page 51, leave out lines 13 to 15 and insert—

'(2) In this section "new school" means a school or proposed school—

(a) for which there is a temporary governing body constituted under section (Arrangements for government of new schools), or

(b) for which there is no such body but for which such a body—

(i) are required to be so constituted by virtue of subsection (1) of that section, or

(ii) may be so constituted in accordance with such anticipatory arrangements as are mentioned in subsection (5)(a) of that section.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Clause 76

CODE OF PRACTICE

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): I beg to move amendment No. 150, in page 54, line 40, at end add—

'(bb) the governing bodies of city technology colleges.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 114, in clause 78, page 56, line 40, at end insert—

'(d) if compliance with the preferences would prejudice the ability of any child living within the locality to gain admission to the school of his choice.'.

No. 140, in clause 84, page 63, line 5, at end insert:—

'(ca) the arrangements made by the authority for ensuring that admission procedures are non-discriminatory by ethnicity or gender'.

No. 157, in clause 86, page 65, line 7, after 'school', insert 'or city technology college.'

New clause 22—Establishment of entry clearance systems—

'Every local education authority shall, for each school year, set up or ensure the setting up of an admissions clearance organisation for its area through which all applications for and on behalf of residents of its area to community, foundation, voluntary or maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools, and city technology colleges, shall be made.'.

Mr. Hughes: I declare an interest, in that I speak in the light of my experience as a trustee of Bacon's Church of England city technology college and the chair of governors of St. James's Church of England primary school. I hope that the amendments and the new clause will find favour with the Government, because they are designed to correct two perceived, and real, injustices in our state-funded schools' admission procedures.

On Second Reading, the Secretary of State responded positively to a general proposition that I put to him on this subject. I was grateful for that, and I hope for a specific positive response from him tonight.

The previous Government set up city technology colleges, and, because of the way in which they were constituted, they were from the beginning—technically, they still are—outside both the local authority and the Church systems. The city technology college of which I speak happens to be a Church of England CTC, but many are not.

Pupils apply to such colleges in the same way as others apply to other secondary schools. They are funded in large measure by the taxpayer and the local authority, as other schools are, topped up by money and obligations from the local diocese and the diocesan board of education. Selection is on an even, non-selective basis, banded in the normal way, and they are mixed schools to which youngsters can apply just as they would to any other Church of England secondary school.

I give full credit to the Secretary of State, who came to speak at Bacon's the other day and acknowledged that CTCs are very popular, for one reason or another. Bacon's is the most popular secondary school in my constituency, and the number of applicants considerably exceeds the number of places.

It is completely unjust that there is no independent appeals system for the pupils and parents who are rejected. If a pupil is turned down by a local primary school, there is an independent appeals system; when someone is turned down for a place at a local secondary school—be it a Southwark-run school or a Roman Catholic or Church of England diocese secondary school—there is an independent appeals system; yet, when the same families apply to another school that is to all intents and purposes of the same type, they discover that they cannot appeal.

I am asking the Secretary of State to make a correction that an earlier Secretary of State, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), very nearly agreed to but then backed away from. We need a mechanism to assess independently the proper running of the admissions policy.

That is important also because of the inevitable subjectivity in any decision. Selecting pupils for a city technology college on the basis that it is a particular type of school builds in subjectivity. Someone independent of the school must be able to give a second opinion and adjudicate. I speak as a school trustee who is hugely concerned about a system that I find it impossible to defend.

Amendments Nos. 157 and 150 would introduce arrangements to achieve those aims. Amendment No. 150 would include city technology colleges' governing bodies in the list of those who will be governed by codes of practice on admission arrangements to be drawn up by the Secretary of State. So it is a light touch approach. I simply want to ensure that the provisions of the Secretary of State's codes of guidance include CTC governing bodies.

The amendment to clause 86 would ensure that an appeal arrangement was set up. On reflection, it is probably not felicitously drafted, and if I were redrafting it, I would include a separate clause or subsection to provide for admissions appeals provisions for local education authorities, the community or voluntary controlled schools maintained by them and for foundation, or voluntary aided schools under the Government's proposals as well as city technology colleges.

Therefore, I do not seek to die in the ditch for that amendment to that clause, but the proposition is clear, and I hope that the Government will concede that admissions appeals systems for CTCs ought to be set up by the time that the Bill reaches the statute book.

My final point on new clause 22 is equally important—in fact, it is more important to more people than the CTC amendment. We propose a co-ordination system for school applications. I wish to make a suggestion to the Secretary of State, and I hope that he will be warmly disposed towards it. At the moment, the parent of a five-year-old who wants to come to my primary school or of a 10-year-old who is rising 11 and has to go to secondary school makes an application. The parent may apply to one school, or to two or more.

The bright, forceful, vocal, pushy and well-prepared parents know how to work the system. Less able parents sometimes apply only to one school, saying that that is the school they want their youngster to go to. They do not think it through, or imagine that the youngster may be turned down. Once he or she is turned down and the parents have appealed, and perhaps not succeeded, they are too late for any more applications. Even if they are not too late, the child may not get in.

[Mr. Hughes]

People of my generation had six choices available on the then Universities Central Council on Admissions form. Since then, it has been amended, and there is a five-option choice for the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service and for UCAS. None the less, it is still a multiple choice for applications to colleges and universities. We would serve the cause of equal opportunity and equal access for the pupil if local education authorities or someone else—I am not sold on them, but they are the logical starting point—had a duty to set up what I have called an admissions clearance organisation. The authorities would not have to run it, and in some ways I would rather that they did not.

I shall give an example. Parents living two doors away from me just off the Old Kent road with a child who is 10 this year would then have to deal with the fact that they have to make more than one choice and that it could cover Roman Catholic, Anglican and non-denominational schools. They could be required to think through the order of priority, but someone else would then do the administration.

I can say from bitter experience that a very deserving youngster is often not as well served as his or her peers because he or she does not have bright, active and pushy parents who work the system to their advantage. Also, parents applying for their first child do not know the ropes nearly as well as they will when they have to do it for the second.

I ask the Minister to allow us to have a common admissions clearance system. I ask him to think about it positively. I entirely concede that the wording of my amendment is not perfect, but the proposition is clear. The system should apply for state-funded nursery schools, primary schools and secondary schools. The same principle should apply everywhere, because the same issues apply. If we are to provide equality of access, there must be an objectively run system that will allow people to make their choice.

Finally, many youngsters and their families believe that they have the right to the school of their choice, but that is not the case in many parts of Britain—it is normally not the case in rural areas, and often it is not in urban areas. If we are to help people to understand that we may not give people the choice of the school they want but we hope to give them a choice of school, we must from the beginning provide a system that makes it clear that it is not a simple case of saying that one wants one's child to go to this primary school, and, because it is a feeder for that secondary school, they will automatically go there.

We must get them to face up to the fact that choices may be unsuccessful. This system is a way of doing it. If it works for post-16 applications for state-funded institutions, there is no reason why it should not work for under-16 applications to similarly state-funded institutions.

Mr. Dafis: I want to speak to amendment No. 114, which is tabled in my name and that of my hon. Friends. The amendment has to be seen in the context of amendments in the next group, including my amendment No. 115. We will debate selection when we get to that list.

Amendment No. 114 has been tabled because of the effect of selection on parental choice. It would add an additional condition to those listed in clause 78(3) on parents' rights to choose schools. It would simply mean that authorities would not be required to comply with parental preference among other things

"if compliance with the preferences would prejudice the ability of any child living within the locality to gain admission to the school of his choice".

I had to use the word "locality", because I understand that the term "catchment area" is no longer de rigueur.

This amendment should not be controversial, and I anticipate that the Secretary of State might accept it because, on Second Reading, he said:

"I am able to confirm that the Bill and the criteria I will lay down as part of our admissions policy will remove partial selection where it currently exists . . . we are not against the exercise of a parental preference; we are against situations in which, for no other reason than the partial selection system and because parents are exercising their preference from a distance, local parents living in close proximity to a school in, for example, Bromley, find it impossible to get their children into it."—[Official Report, 22 December 1997; Vol. 303, c. 664.]

However, not everyone has been convinced by the right hon. Gentleman's assurances. Specifically, the Campaign for State Education has not been convinced. The situation in Wandsworth, as described at an impressive meeting that CASE and the National Union of Teachers held not long ago, is well known to the House, so I do not need to give the details.

John Valentine of the Campaign for Local Education described the situation in a letter to members of the Standing Committee thus:

"All the secondary schools have an entrance test. All the tests are different. Each test takes three hours and takes place in the secondary school under exam conditions. As far as the 50 per cent. selective schools are concerned, siblings account for the entire remaining intake. There are no places on proximity at all. Local children who fail the test or who have no older sibling are not in the catchment area for any other school and must travel five or six miles to go to school."

He then gives an example, saying:

"My daughter's junior school shares a campus with Graveney school which selects 50 per cent. on general ability. This year, 17 pupils from that school took the test for Graveney school and six got places. There are certainly four children living within 200 metres of the gates of Graveney school who have no place. Seven children have no offer of a place anywhere at the moment."

That was in February.

I am not against parental choice. Indeed, I have already spoken in favour of it this evening, when I presented amendments on behalf of the Third Sector Schools Alliance. Choice is important, in that it can provide for the needs of parents who have preferences regarding type of education, which sometimes cannot be catered for in schools close by. The choice of parents in those circumstances should never prevent other pupils from having the choice of going to their local school. Our amendment would safeguard that fundamental right.

8 pm

Mr. Willis: I wish to speak to amendment No. 140. I thank the Under-Secretary for her comments on the need to monitor the performance of children from ethnic backgrounds in respect of determining standards in schools. We are grateful for her comments as reported in column 804 of the Official Report of the Standing Committee on Tuesday 3 March 1998.

Discrimination on the grounds of gender or race is very real, even though it often happens inadvertently. At first sight, and even after close examination, admissions procedures often do not suggest problems of discrimination, but those are exactly what they can create. Take the Education Act 1980. Most hon. Members would accept that the policy of open enrolment has generally been a good thing, and that many advantages have been gained from it. However, the removal of some of the access arrangements has given rise to discrimination on the basis of race, culture and ethnicity.

A school may give precedence to pupils who have family connections with it. Older siblings are reasonable, but if the school's criteria include parents or even grandparents, it will almost certainly disadvantage students from ethnic minorities. Departmental circular 6/93 drew attention to the potential discriminatory affects of that criterion. Subsequent circulars omitted that reference. It is especially important that local education authorities be required to ensure that all procedures and criteria should be non-discriminatory.

Giving preference to applicants in certain neighbourhoods may have the effect of discriminating on grounds of race or ethnicity. The neighbourhoods given preference may be mainly white, while others equally near or equally convenient in terms of public transport may contain a high proportion of people from ethnic minorities.

If primary schools give preference to pupils who attended attached nursery classes, it may discriminate against families where the parents are in full-time employment and cannot send their children to part-time nurseries. Afro-Caribbean mothers are known to work full time more than white mothers, so it can discriminate against them.

Selection tests and examinations are discriminatory if they are culturally biased, or if tests for cognitive ability, potential or aptitude require levels of competence in English that pupils who have recently arrived in the United Kingdom cannot possibly be expected to have achieved. If musical talent is a criterion for admission, it would be discriminatory if the school insisted on talent in western classical music rather than, say, south Asian music.

There is a widespread suspicion that prestigious schools do not admit children from groups whose members are disproportionately likely to experience exclusion or to have low achievement. Any instance of treating a prospective pupil as a member of a group rather than an individual would be unjustifiably discriminatory.

The purpose of the amendment is to put in the Bill a requirement for local education authorities and schools to make their admissions policies clear, so that there will be no discrimination on the basis of race or gender.

Mr. Blunkett: I will come in a moment to the amendments of the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) and of the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). First, let me say that I was sympathetic when the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) started. By the time he had finished, I realised what a dog's dinner would result if we agreed to amendment No. 140.

The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Act 1976 must be adhered to. If there is a real difficulty in implementing them through the code that we shall issue, I would be disposed to consider the matter again. The longer the hon. Gentleman went on, and the more we delved into the esoteric depths of full or part-time workers with full and part-time nursery children, the more I realised that, on reflection, he could not expect such a provision to be put into a Bill by any party. I ask him to reflect on that, given that I acknowledge, in a spirit of non-partisan politics, that acting against discrimination is crucial.

The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey was good enough to say that I had been to Bacon's city technology college. I am impressed by what it is doing. I appreciate that many parents will want to get children into it.

There are only 15 CTCs, which are unique in the sense that their structure, establishment and raison d'etre are different from those of other schools. They are, in essence, independent, but substantially funded from state funds. They are prepared to co-operate with the new framework that we are laying down. They will be part of the overall code that we will issue. They have an obligation to adhere to the wider policies laid out in the Bill.

I am prepared to talk to CTCs further about how to meet particular problems where procedures have not been followed and where an appeal might be appropriate. The present admissions criteria are unique—though some boroughs wish to band their pupils—and there is a difficulty in terms of opening up the procedure in the manner of the admissions policy as a whole. We are establishing the adjudicator not only in relation to the nature and procedure of the policies but in relation to independent appeals in respect of individual children.

The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey is right to draw the issue to the attention of the House, but I do not think that it can be addressed in precisely the way that the amendments seek. The consultation with the 15 CTCs could make some useful progress. I and Ministers are prepared to do that. In the spirit of the fact that CTCs want to be part of the system, and want to collaborate with us in ensuring that their systems are seen to be fair and transparent, I think that that is reasonable.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I have listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman, and I am reassured. Does he accept the fundamental point that the system for independent adjudication or appeal for CTCs should be similar to, and be seen to be similar to, those of other schools? If he accepts that that is the starting point, I am sure that there will be a way of accommodating them in the general structure that he has described.

Mr. Blunkett: I accept that the transparency we seek should be part of the total process. Because of the different admissions criteria and policy of CTCs, it is the fairness of those procedures, and whether they have been adhered to, that I am most concerned to ensure is open to scrutiny. We need to discuss with them the way in which appeals on such grounds could be dealt with.

The hon. Gentleman lives with the issue as a constituency Member. Hon. Members with CTCs in their areas know that the competition for places may make the situation more heated than it is elsewhere. That is part of the wider issue that amendment No. 114 seeks to address, which is the difficulty of getting an admissions policy that balances parental preference and sensible planning and organisation, and is fair to those who put their neighbourhood school down as their first preference, and to those who exercise a preference from outside the area. For instance, I do not retract one jot of the words that have been quoted from the Second Reading debate on the Monday before Christmas. We need to try to find a way through what is undoubtedly a jungle in terms of admissions policy. I know a lot about the Rotherham judgment, because the parents lobbied me heavily about their case before they went to the High Court.

[Mr. Blunkett]

I believe that there is a way forward, but it will require a great deal more collaboration and co-operation than has been apparent and has been fostered in recent years. The market has assumed that supply and demand will balance themselves, but of course they do not. That answers the case put in new clause 22. I am sympathetic to clearance. Through the code, as part of the new collaborative arrangements, we should encourage authorities and schools to work together to achieve that.

Schools cannot expect someone else to pick up the problem if they discard children. I do not want schools to feel that they do not need to own the problem—that they can pass it over and that someone else will sort it out. I am mindful of real cases such as that of a little girl called Rebecca—I shall not give her full name—from St. Albans, who has shortened tendons. She does not have a place at any of the three schools to which she and her parents applied for the coming September. She cannot walk to the school that has been suggested for her, whereas the three that she opted for are in easy reach. These are real, human problems, not ideological ones in the sense that divides us politically. We need to find a way forward. The guidance that we shall issue shortly for the interim period and the code, on which we shall consult, will seek that way forward.

The discussion tonight shows that there is a genuine issue here that we all need to tackle together. I ask the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey to allow us to do that, and not to press the amendment. I ask him to recognise that we genuinely want to overcome the legacy of recent history and move forward by achieving a balance between the choice we seek to achieve and the genuine heartache that is pressed on youngsters who discover that, through no fault of their own, they cannot get into a school anywhere near them, never mind the one that their parents thought that they were exercising their right to prefer.

Mr. Simon Hughes: With the leave of the House, I rise again. I am grateful for the Secretary of State's considered and positive response. I am happy to collaborate with my hon. Friends the Members for Bath (Mr. Foster) and for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), the Secretary of State and his ministerial and civil service colleagues, and with the schools in question to find a way forward on both issues where I believe that a way forward exists.

I wish to end the debate by, in a sentence, painting a picture that the Secretary of State has also seen as a constituency Member, as a shadow Minister and as a Minister. At the end of this exercise, I should like never again to have the experience that I have every year when I go to present the prizes at the local authority primary school every July. When I talk to the youngsters, I discover every year that several, as they leave primary school, still do not know where they will go to secondary school two months later.

Few things undermine youthful self-confidence more than that. It makes the children feel less wanted, just at the moment when they are meant to feel that they are going on to greater things. If we can end that lottery of opportunity, we shall be doing them a good service. In that spirit, I am happy to withdraw the amendment, and to continue the conversation elsewhere at an early opportunity. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

8.15 pm

Mr. Don Foster: I beg to move amendment No. 147, in page 67, line 40, leave out from 'ability' to 'any' in line 43.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 145, in clause 92, page 68, line 24, after '(1)', insert

'Subject to subsections (5) to (9).'.

No. 148, in page 68, line 25, leave out 'by ability or'.

No. 149, in page 68, line 27, after 'continue', insert

'until the appropriate local education authority has, within three years of the coming into force of this Act, and after consultation with relevant persons and bodies, determined the future or otherwise of such a school.'.

No. 146, in page 68, line 43, at end add—

'(5) This section shall cease to apply at such date as may be determined in accordance with sub-clause (7) in relation to any school in respect of which the adjudicator, or the Secretary of State, as the case may be, has decided to uphold an objection made under subsection 5.

(6) The Local Education Authority or the admissions authority for any maintained school in the area of the Local Education Authority in which a school to which sub-section (1) for the time being applies is situated, may at any time make objection to the adjudicator about the continuation at that school of the provision for selection by ability or by aptitude to which this section refers.

(7) Upon receipt of an objection such as is mentioned in subsection (4) the adjudicator shall either

(a) decide whether and (if so) to what extent the objection should be upheld, or

(b) in such cases as may be prescribed, refer the objection to the Secretary of State for that question to be decided by him.

(8) The decision of the adjudicator or the Secretary of State on the objection shall be binding on the admission authority for the school to which subsection 1 applies and shall have effect on such date as may be specified by the adjudicator or the Secretary of State as the case may be.

(9) For the purposes of this section "the admission authority" shall have the same meaning as Chapter 1 of this Part.'.

No. 115, in clause 94, page 69, line 28, leave out from the beginning to the end of line 6 on page 70.

No. 90, in page 69, line 28, leave out 'Subject to subsection (2)'.

No. 91, in page 69, leave out lines 36 to 39.

Mr. Foster: I am delighted to see the Secretary of State in his place for this important debate. I have enormous respect for him. He has done a great deal to improve the quality of education in the short time since the new Government took office. He has given new heart to many of the people who work in education. However, the Secretary of State will have disappointed many people working in our schools as well as many of his Back Benchers on the issue of partial selection, with which amendment No. 147 deals. He has failed to deliver commitments that he offered to his party and to the nation before the general election. I shall argue that he has even failed to deliver commitments that he made since the general election and since he took office as Secretary of State.

A number of amendments in this group are tabled in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis). I do not intend to detain the House on any of them other than amendment No. 147, save to say that I hope that the Government will be prepared to consider carefully the proposal in amendment No. 146 to give LEAs the right of appeal to the adjudicator against partial selection. I hope that the Minister will say that it is the Government's intention to allow the LEA to be one of those that can make such an appeal.

I certainly do not intend to become embroiled in the debate on selection by aptitude which I suspect is to follow shortly. Suffice it to say that, in our deliberations in Committee, we, like the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), were unconvinced by the Government's arguments about the possibility of selection by aptitude. We argue that, except perhaps in the case of music and art, any attempt to discuss selection by aptitude is merely a covert way of talking about selection by ability.

Amendment No. 147 would end partial selection where it exists and ensure that there is no opportunity for further extension of partial selection in our schools. The whole House will remember the ringing words of the Secretary of State at a recent Labour party conference:

"Watch my lips: no selection by exams or interviews under Labour".

Unfortunately, if the amendment is not accepted and the Bill remains as written, there will continue to be selection under Labour.

It is worth bearing it in mind that even the White Paper from which the Bill was drawn said clearly in chapter 7, paragraph 33:

"The use of partial selection, though limited, has led to controversy and caused parents concern in areas such as Bromley and Hertfordshire."

Even at the time of the drafting of the White Paper, after the election, it was clear that the Government were concerned about the problems created by partial selection. They knew, and they still know today, that selection does not give choice to most parents; it gives choice only to a few whose children pass the various selection tests. The Government know only too well that, with selection, it is the school that selects the pupil, not the parents who select the school.

The Government will be aware of opinion polling on selection. The Gallup opinion poll in 1996 showed that only 19 per cent. of the public thought that selection should be encouraged, while 77 per cent. were opposed to it. The Government will be well aware of what the Audit Commission has had to say on selection. In its report "Trading Places", the Audit Commission spoke of the real problems of "planning gridlock" in many of our local education authority areas. It went on to note that, once individual schools were able to set their own admission policies independent of each other,

"a situation could arise in which all schools in an area opt to select a proportion of their pupils on academic ability—which may not be in the best interest of the local children who fail to selected for any school."

That real problem is not one that the Audit Commission fantasised might happen; it is, as I explained in Committee, already happening in various parts of the country.

In Wandsworth, for example, there are 10 secondary schools: two are Roman Catholic and select by interview, which is something to which the Secretary of State said he would be opposed; two select 50 per cent. of their pupils by ability; one selects 50 per cent. of its pupils on a specialism; one is a specialist technology college, which selects 100 per cent. of its pupils; one selects 25 per cent. of its pupils on ability; and the remaining three use a banding system, taking 20 per cent. of pupils in each of five bands.

Because of those selection arrangements in every one of Wandsworth's secondary schools, many parents in the area are very concerned—to the point where, at forthcoming local elections, some of those parents intend to put up anti-selection candidates. I received a letter from one of those concerned Wandsworth parents. She wrote:

"Our local school is 50 per cent. selective and has been for three years. This year there are no places on geography at all. My son's primary school is on the same site—17 children took the test and six got places. Seven children have no place at any school at present. At least four of the children who didn't get a place live within 200 metres of the school gate. One child refused to go to school the day after the results; one told their mother they felt humiliated . . . The last few months have been hell for everyone and continue to be so for some. My own son has got a place but I have seen him lose confidence and self esteem in the process. His teacher reports that the whole of year 6 is very difficult because of the stress the children are under. The least able are given a very clear message that they are failures."

That is what is happening in one part of the country because of the continuation of partial selection in local schools. That is something that the Government said would not continue, yet, if the Bill is not amended as proposed in amendment No. 147, those problems will continue. In his helpful comments on earlier amendments, the Secretary of State spoke of real human problems, described the plight of Rebecca of St. Albans, and pointed out that that was the sort of issue about which we should all be concerned—how right he was. I hope that he will understand that there are real human problems in Wandsworth, Bromley, Hertfordshire and many other parts of the country where partial selection is used.

We are aware that many members of the Labour party are concerned, as are all Liberal Democrats, about partial selection. In Committee, I referred to the views on partial selection of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), now the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, who said in January 1997:

"The arguments against selection are well known and well made: it weakens parental choice and preference; it institutionalises low expectations of children; and it labels too many of young children as failures."—[Official Report, 27 January 1997; Vol. 289, c. 92.]

[Mr. Foster]

In a speech in November 1996, the then hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), now the Secretary of State, said:

"There are only two ways in which to deal with the problem of parents not being offered choice by their neighbourhood school: first, to lift the standards in those schools dramatically and, secondly, to have a comprehensive and sensible admissions policy that covers the entire area."—[Official Report, 11 November 1996; Vol. 285, c. 51.]

It is clear that the vast majority of members of the Labour party had anticipated the ending of partial selection in the Bill. They will have been disappointed, and I suspect that some are still somewhat confused by it.

Mr. Blunkett: I should like to put it on record that I agree with myself; I agree entirely with my remarks that the hon. Gentleman has quoted. I should like to make it clear to the hon. Gentleman and to the House that, although they may be discrete, the mechanisms which we have put in place and which are present in the Bill actually achieve the goal which he is setting out this evening. If there is any confusion, it is not on the Treasury Bench, but on the Liberal Democrat Benches.

Mr. Foster: If the Secretary of State agrees with himself, I hope that he will listen carefully to the quotation which I shall give shortly. I hope that he will be willing to intervene a second time and tell me whether he still agrees with that comment.

Some Labour Members continued to be confused, even during our detailed debates in Committee. On 24 February, the hon. Member for North–West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) said:

"The hon. Member for Bath said correctly that the Labour party has not believed in the principle of selection by ability for many years, and he rightly grasps what unites us".

The hon. Gentleman is clearly very confused indeed, because it is the Labour party that now wants selection to continue in some of our schools. He went on to say:

"partial selection was an unfortunate consequence of the competitive GM experiment introduced by the previous Government".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 24 February 1998; c. 589-90.]

From those remarks, it is clear that the hon. Gentleman was keen to see the end of partial selection.

I hope that I have clearly established that the Liberal Democrats have long opposed selection in our schools and that we are opposed to the continuation of partial selection, which the Bill will allow if the amendment is not passed. I shall end by asking the Secretary of State whether he still agrees with one of his own comments, made when he introduced the Bill on Second Reading. He said:

"I am able to confirm that the Bill and the criteria I will lay down as part of our admissions policy will remove partial selection where it currently exists."—[Official Report, 22 December 1997; Vol. 303, c. 664.]

I hope that, if the right hon. Gentleman rises to say that he still agrees with that, he will add that he will support amendment No. 147, which would give effect to that clear commitment given on Second Reading.

Mr. Dorrell: Conservative Members will certainly not support the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). As his speech made clear, his amendments serve the Liberal Democrat purpose, which is to eliminate selection, whether by ability or aptitude, in all our schools, whether or not it has been shown to be supported by local parents or local teachers, or, most important, to deliver high-quality education in the round to local children. I do not believe that the Liberal Democrats are right to continue a policy of blanket opposition to selection in all circumstances.

I hope that, when he responds to the debate, the Minister for School Standards will, on behalf of the Secretary of State, disavow the words he uttered on 22 December. I hope that the Minister will be able to confirm, on behalf of the Secretary of State, that it is not true that the Bill

"will remove partial selection where it currently exists."—[Official Report, 22 December 1997; Vol. 303, c. 664.]

That certainly is not my understanding of the Bill's effect, which is why I regard as a welcome step in the right direction those aspects of clauses 91 to 95 that provide recognition and some entrenchment for existing provision for selection by ability and the prospect of selection by aptitude, on which subject I shall have more to say shortly. Therefore, I shall certainly invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to oppose amendments Nos. 147, 145, 148, 149 and 146.

I do not believe that selection is the right answer in every school and in all circumstances. The last thing we need in our school system is a return to an extremely sterile argument about 11-plus, grammar school or secondary modern school in all circumstances. When we discuss the next group of amendments, we shall talk about the arrangements for existing grammar schools and debate whether there should be arrangements to allow, in some areas, grammar schools to be introduced where they do not currently exist, but it is not my case that we should return to a single, blanket model, applicable in all circumstances.

I seek to argue that admission arrangements should be allowed to vary in different schools, reflecting the different views of the teaching profession working in different parts of the country, and reflecting too the different views of parents in the communities that the schools exist to serve. I do not believe that the arguments for and against a specific form of selection can be shown to be so conclusive that they are right in all circumstances and in all localities.

Against that background, I am pleased that the Government's Bill—I suspect, to the surprise of some Labour Back Benchers—recognises existing selection arrangements and, to a limited degree, entrenches the current selection arrangements. I have a different question for the Government: why do Ministers, who are apparently prepared to accept the principle of selection by ability, believe that the position that they inherited from the outgoing Conservative Government on 1 May 1997 represents the best conceivable balance of those different interests that can be achieved?

I say that because the Government's Bill establishes the principle that the selection arrangements that they inherited should be safeguarded. A ring fence should be built around them. They should not be allowed to develop. Presumably the ideas are right, because the Government have the opportunity to change the ideas, and they are not doing so. Why should we accept that the arrangements that the Secretary of State inherited from his predecessor on 2 May 1997 are so perfect that they are incapable of improvement?

8.30 pm

Mr. Blunkett: Once again, I want to place on the record the fact that we do not accept the principle of selection by ability. That is absolutely clear, and I have made it clear ever since I took the job of shadow Secretary of State. However, we accept that the removal of selection by ability in whatever form should be undertaken with the maximum consensus and with the legitimacy that comes from the involvement of those most directly concerned. Our policies and the Bill seek to achieve those goals in exactly that way.

Mr. Dorrell: With all respect to the Secretary of State, he is getting into trouble, because he is promoting a Bill in which clause 92(1) says:

"Where at the beginning of the 1997-98 school year the admission arrangements for a maintained school made provision for selection by ability or by aptitude . . . the admission arrangements for the school may continue to make such provision"

for as long as

"there is"—

and indefinitely is the practical effect—[Interruption.] All right; I shall read it in full:

"the admission arrangements for the school may continue to make such provision"

for as long as

"there is, as compared with the arrangements in force at the beginning of that year—

(a) no increase in the proportion of selective admissions in any relevant age group, and

(b) no significant change in the basis of selection."

Clause 92(1) envisages no end date. The Secretary of State is promoting a Bill that explicitly allows existing selection by ability to continue. It is a pity if the Secretary of State is promoting a Bill a key element of which he is not prepared to defend.

I believe that the terms of the Secretary of State's Bill are right, not because I consider that selection by ability is right in all circumstances, but because—the Secretary of State will recognise this—professional teachers, parents and supporters in the local community around existing schools that operate partial selection wish to continue to operate that system because they believe that it is in the best interests of the children of their area.

If the Secretary of State disagrees with that, he has the opportunity to say that partial selection is wrong in all circumstances. I am pleased that he is not taking that opportunity; I only regret the fact that he is not prepared to defend partial selection.

That is only part of the case that the Government are making to the House in the clauses on selection. The Government are saying that there can be no further development of selection by ability, but they are opening up the possibility of new selective arrangements, provided that we undertake to draw a distinction between selection by ability and selection by aptitude.

I regret the fact that the Secretary of State is not responding to the debate, because that would have provided him with the opportunity to adjudicate—if we may use that word in the context of the Bill—between the Minister for School Standards, sitting on his right, and the Under-Secretary, sitting on his left. I suspect that that is literally true in the context of this argument.

We analysed the issue of ability and aptitude in Committee. We sought to draw out the Under-Secretary on what she understood by the concept of selection by aptitude. Her answer was to avoid the subject and say, "Don't worry; the Minister of State will answer this debate later in the day and I am looking forward to hearing what he has to say." I believe that the Under-Secretary was no more persuaded by the words of the Minister for School Standards in seeking to distinguish between selection by aptitude and selection by ability, than any other member of the Committee. It is not entirely surprising.

The purpose of amendments Nos. 90 and 91 is to seek—if it makes it easier for the Government—to build on the fiction of the distinction between selection by aptitude and selection by ability. The purpose of those amendments is simply to eliminate from clause 94 the effect of subsection (2)—in other words, to allow selection by aptitude without the bar on selection for general aptitude; to allow the Government to preside over the continued slow development, with safeguards, by schools that wish to apply the principles of selection, and to allow that continued development, under the heading of "selection by aptitude", without seeking to obstruct it in the way that clause 94(2) would do.

The reason I say that the distinction between aptitude and ability is total nonsense is emphasised by a look at the dictionary. The Minister for School Standards seeks to persuade us that there is a difference of principle between assessing the natural ability of a child being considered for entry to a school and assessing the aptitude of that child for a range of subjects. In the "Oxford English Dictionary", the word "aptitude" is defined as "natural ability". The Minister is suggesting that we should not be prepared to allow ourselves to select by ability, but that we should be prepared to select children by aptitude, the dictionary definition of which is "natural ability". He has gone a long way around the houses to return to where he started. In my view, the distinction that the Minister seeks to draw is nonsense squared.

The Minister believes in allowing the slow development—where schools want it—of selection by aptitude. In Committee, and now in the House, he has tried to persuade us that selection by aptitude is different from selection by ability. The Labour party and, indeed, the whole House know that it is nonsense to draw a distinction between selection by aptitude and selection by ability.

I am sure that the Secretary of State is speculating about an alliance between the Stephens. We are both in favour of the small-scale continued development of selection, where that is supported by the school and its teachers. I am happy to extend the hand of friendship to the other Stephen in establishing selection—whether by ability or by aptitude—where it is shown to have the support of the teaching profession, the governing body, the admissions authority and the parents. I look forward to my colleague Stephen linking arms with me in that aim.

I am happy to continue the fiction of the distinction between aptitude and ability—it is fiction—if it serves the cause. It allows the Minister to part company with most of the Labour Members who have come into the Chamber to listen to the debate and, with the courage of his convictions, to pursue the development of selection by aptitude where that is shown to be in the interests of the children. I hope that he will recognise the opportunity that we are offering him, and will not argue that the state of affairs which he inherited on 1 May 1997 is incapable of further improvement.

[Mr. Dorrell]

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): The debate on this group of amendments is of interest both to me and to my constituents. I am one of the Members of Parliament who represent constituencies in the London borough of Wandsworth. Over a long period, the Conservative local authority has deliberately set out to lose as many of its education responsibilities as possible. It has encouraged schools, especially in my constituency, to opt out of the local education system. It then claims that it has nothing to do with the schools and has no authority over them. Because of that, the practice of selection has increased throughout the borough.

The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) should come to my constituency before he pays such glowing tributes to selection. He said that parents' views should be taken into account, but he should come to my constituency and hear what parents there are saying. They are angry and bitter about the system that has been in place in the borough for a number of years. It is no exaggeration to say that there are schools and head teachers in my constituency who make their own rules. They take no notice of the views of local parents.

The schools in my constituency that have adopted a selection procedure are: Graveney school, which selects 50 per. cent of its intake, as does Ernest Bevin; Burntwood, which selects 30 per cent.; and Chestnut Grove, which selects 40 per cent. on subject specialisation. In the borough generally, 10 schools have some form of selection or testing for entry. That system has been in place in Wandsworth for many years.

I have been involved in the issue for a long time, as it is the sort of issue that causes people to come to my advice surgery. I have taken up the matter with Wandsworth council, but it immediately says, "This is nothing to do with us; we have no control over those schools." I took up the matter with the previous Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard); her response was, "We have no responsibility for those schools; they decide their entrance procedures."

8.45 pm

There are youngsters in the borough who live close to their local schools, but cannot get places in them, yet youngsters who do not live within the borough—often not even in adjacent boroughs—get places in those schools. Parents complain that the system is unfair and unjust. It is an abuse of the rights of young children. They set their hearts on getting into their local schools, but then, because of selection or entry procedures, they cannot get places.

Mr. Don Foster: I agree with everything that the hon. Gentleman has said. He will have seen the document "Choose a Wandsworth School". Page 3 tells parents that they should expect their children to undergo seven different sets of tests, followed by admission interviews, for two particular schools. That must put an enormous strain on the pupils as well as the parents.

Mr. Cox: The hon. Gentleman has highlighted one of the criticisms about selection. I have to tell the Secretary of State and the Minister of State that I share the views of parents.

I was not a member of the Standing Committee. Had I been, I would have made many of the comments that I am making now. What my right hon. Friend said on Second Reading clearly suggested to parents and, indeed, to me, that there would definitely be a change in the selection procedures allowed in a number of authorities. My right hon. Friend said:

"I am able to confirm that the Bill and the criteria I will lay down as part of our admissions policy will remove partial selection where it currently exists . . . we are not against the exercise of a parental preference; we are against situations in which, for no other reason than the partial selection system and because parents are exercising their preference from a distance, local parents living in close proximity to a school . . . find it impossible to get their children into it."—[Official Report, 22 December 1997; Vol. 303, c. 664.]

That was a clear statement, which I welcomed—but it is not how I interpret the Bill, especially clause 92.

Clause 92 states:

"Where at the beginning of the 1997-98 school year the admissions arrangements for a maintained school made provision for selection by ability or by aptitude",

there will be

"(a) no increase in the proportion of selective admissions in any relevant age group, and

(b) no significant change in the basis of selection."

I must say to my right hon. Friend that, unless those matters are cleared up this evening, there will be continuing concern among parents in my constituency about their right to seek entry for their youngsters to a local school. I do not intend to read loads of quotations, although it would be easy to do so—I am not exaggerating when I say that I have received hundreds of letters over the years from parents in my constituency. A local lady involved in local education was reported to have said:

"Parental choice is a myth in Wandsworth. It is only the academic elite or children of parents who can afford coaching for their school entrance tests."

That sums up the position in the borough of Wandsworth.

We know that there are to be adjudicators who will decide disputes. This is the appropriate time to ask my hon. Friend the Minister to comment on this aspect of policy. Like my constituents, I want to know how adjudicators will approach such disputes. Unless changes are made, the disputes will continue. Can my hon. Friend tell us what the adjudicators' terms of reference will be? What will be their code of practice? There are head teachers in my constituency who have no intention of changing their entry policies unless legislation is introduced that obliges them to do so.

How will parents express their wishes to an adjudicator? Will a parent go to an adjudicator to complain about the non-entry of their child to a local school? Assuming that the parent wins the case, must the head of the school accept the decision, or can the head reject a decision that goes against him or her?

There are other questions on which I should like my hon. Friend to comment. Will there be a test case for a school, or will there be a succession of appeals to the adjudicator by disgruntled parents who feel that their children have not been given the opportunity to get a place in the school of their choice because of the head teacher's attitude and the school's entrance policy? If the adjudicator finds in favour of the parents and allows the child to enter one of the schools that I mentioned, will that become a requirement of that school for all youngsters who seek entry into it? Those issues are repeatedly referred to me by local parents.

I close my remarks with one or two further points. Can my hon. Friend tell us how the adjudicator will be appointed? To whom will he or she report decisions? Will it be to the Secretary of State, and if so, what action could the Secretary of State take on the adjudicator's decision? Would the decision be binding on the Secretary of State, as well as on the school?

This is an extremely important local issue in my constituency. We have an opportunity in the debate this evening to clear up some of the doubts and confusion that, sadly, exist.

Mr. Dafis: I shall speak to amendment No. 115, which would in effect delete clause 94 and remove the provision for the extension of selection by aptitude in one or more subjects. My amendment would have a similar effect to that tabled by the Liberal Democrats, and the opposite effect to amendments Nos. 90 and 91 tabled by the Conservatives.

I look forward to a Division on the amendments, which will unquestionably be a Division on the principle of selection. It will be a matter of whether we approve, to some degree, of selection, and whether we want an enhancement and strengthening of the selection principle in our education system.

The Secretary of State said that there was confusion on these Benches, and that the provisions of the Bill would phase out selection. I must tell him that the confusion is far more widespread than these Benches. Many people from all sectors of education have studied the Bill and come to the conclusion that it will extend selection, rather than reduce it.

The question is not why I and my hon. Friends tabled amendment No. 115, nor why the Liberal Democrats tabled a similar amendment in Committee and have tabled other amendments before us tonight. The issue is why the Government devised clause 94 in the first place. On top of the fact that they are allowing pre-existing arrangements to continue, they have devised a clause that extends the provision.

Might the Government have done that out of conviction? Are they enthusiastic about the idea of specialisation? Do they believe that certain schools with a specialism might offer high-quality provision, which would be available to pupils from other schools as well?

I know that that is being said, but I am highly sceptical about building specialisation formally into the school structure. I am certainly in favour of allowing schools to develop as centres of expertise and excellence in particular subjects, as the opportunities arise and as the talents of teachers at a particular time allow. Schools have always done that, and other schools have benefited from that example. If the intention was to extend that, one might see some merit in it, but why associate it with selection?

That brings me to my second hypothesis. Might the reason be that the Government have swallowed the George Walden line? The concern, which I believe is sincerely felt, is that the public-private divide is a fundamental flaw in the English school system, and that the only way to entice the private sector into the public sector parlour is by conceding to some degree on the issue of selection—allowing an element of selection as a way of trying to close the divide between the public and the private sector. If that is the case, the Government are conceding on a principle that is fundamental to a united, inclusive society. As far as Wales is concerned, they are addressing a problem that does not exist. We do not have that divide in Wales.

As a third possibility, do the Government feel that they must mollify sectors of the electorate whose loyalty they regard as necessary for electoral victory? They might be wrong about that, as some public opinion polls—which have already been mentioned in the debate—show. However, if such mollification was the Government's reason for compromising on a matter of fundamental principle, it was an even worse reason.

Margaret Tulloch, the spokesperson for the Campaign for State Education, CASE, said in a press release:

"CASE is amazed that a Labour Government seems to be happy to allow more selection to be introduced especially when it claims it wants schools to be inclusive and is concerned about social exclusion.

Rather than encouraging selection this Government should be unpicking the school pecking order which has reduced choice for most parents and damaged our children for so long."

I do not think that the Bill will unpick anything. Ministers claim that that is not true, and that the Bill will gradually achieve an unpicking of our current selective system. If that is true, they were being fiendishly clever in their design of the legislation.

9 pm

As I said, the Bill will strengthen selection on the basis of ability. Let us be clear about the word "ability", as the Government seek to distinguish between aptitude and ability. As the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said, the distinction is completely spurious. The right hon. Gentleman quoted the "Oxford English Dictionary" in making his point. I should like to quote Wordsworth, who described Michael—in that very great poem of the same name—as being "apt for all affairs". In other words—using a different word for the same thing—Michael was able to perform his tasks well. He had the aptitude, skills and ability to do well all the tasks needed for his calling. There is no substance in the distinction between aptitude and ability.

The Government would say that selection will be practised in only a small minority of subjects. It is worth asking: how many is "one or more" subjects? How large a minority is it: one, two or possibly even more? Three or more subjects would be a substantial minority. Moreover, I am not convinced that the Government are considering including only subjects such as music and art. I dare say that they are considering subjects such as science. If so, subjects will be included that are pretty close to the core curriculum.

Ministers would also say that only 10 per cent. of pupils will be selected on the basis of ability. I have two comments on that. First, in clause 94, the Government are giving credibility to the principle of selection on the basis of ability. Once that principle is established, it could be more enthusiastically applied later. I do not think that the Secretary of State has any enthusiasm for the principle: my regard for him is too high to believe that he does. However, a future—Labour, Conservative or any other—Administration might wish to apply the principle with much greater enthusiasm.

[Mr. Dafis]

Secondly, the provision and principle will be entrenched—as the right hon. Member for Charnwood said—in the statute book. The Bill will entrench the selection principle. If 10 per cent. selection is acceptable, why not 20 per cent. or more? The percentage might well be increased.

As I said in the debate on Second Reading, aptitude in two or more subjects—or even in one subject—is a good indicator of general ability. Although that is not always true, it is largely true. Someone with considerable aptitude in one subject will have good general abilities.

Clause 94 will therefore implement selection by ability and establish selection as a principle in school education in England and—unfortunately—in Wales. Moreover, it will do it so that selection may be expanded.

In some ways, the current situation is worse than in the old days of the 11-plus exams, certainly as I remember them. In those days, pupils were guaranteed a place in a local school—whether it was one of two or, at the most, three schools. Furthermore, the child had to sit only one exam, which decided the matter. Under the old system, there was also an opportunity to change schools at the 13-plus. Now, however, we have an extraordinary, complex mish-mash that imposes severe strain on children and has serious inherent inefficiencies. The Government seem to be intent on adding to that mish-mash, making it even more complex.

There is no wonder that there are strong feelings—not only among people such as myself—about selection. In a letter to me, CASE's representative says:

> "I do hope that there is a vote on the clauses allowing existing partial selection and the 10 per cent. selection on aptitude. Labour MPs should be ashamed to vote for them"— which is the same as saying that Labour Members should be ashamed to vote against this group of amendments.

There is no consensus in Wales on selection, but—as far as I can determine, because the matter will not be subject to regulation or secondary legislation—clause 94 will apply to Wales. The Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), said that Wales will be a selection-free zone. I do not know whether he said, "Read my lips," when he uttered that statement, but he said it. I am glad that I heard him say it, and am sure that it is the type of thing that he would wish were true. I should be interested to know—it is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman is not in the Chamber—how Wales can be excluded from the provisions of the clause, which will be primary legislation and cannot be varied in secondary legislation.

Groups of parents in Wandsworth say that, in local elections, they will run candidates against Labour candidates on a "no selection in education" ticket. There is a political message for Labour there. In Wales, however, such groups would not have to use those methods. At least one party—I am sure that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) would say at least two parties—is available to such groups as an alternative, as we remain totally committed to the comprehensive principle.

I hope also that, in a year or two, there will be an alternative approach in raising standards—which is undoubtedly necessary—and in ensuring rigour in the education system. We also need an alternative approach in developing the competitive market that has been introduced in the past 18 years and more. That matter is not being tackled, to put it rather mildly. I hope that an alternative approach will emerge from the deliberations of the National Assembly for Wales. The big question for me and for other people from Wales is whether the assembly will have the powers to provide that—it will certainly wish to.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I shall vote for the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), because I read it as the Labour party policy to which I personally have been committed throughout my years in the House. If there is one thing that has characterised the thinking of the Labour party it is that it has been in favour of comprehensive education—not just comprehensive schools but comprehensive education.

The Conservatives were arguing for the 11-plus. They have now modified that view for the simple reason that comprehensive education was much more popular among Conservative voters. For every winner there are losers, and Conservative voters who discovered that their little boy or girl had not got into a selective school were very angry. It is true that selection is a terrible tragedy. The Bill might talk about selection by aptitude or ability, but that could be transformed into rejection by aptitude or ability. The Bill provides that certain people can be rejected because they are thought to have inadequate ability or inadequate aptitude. That is no basis for education.

I am a great believer in choice in education. By that I mean that every child should have the opportunity to go to a school where the full range of knowledge is available. That is the basis of comprehensive education. The idea of giving teachers or heads the opportunity to keep people out is not about choice for pupils but about the determination of head teachers to control admission, even if it is not in the public interest.

The issue will not go away. I am very disappointed because I thought that the amendment would be endorsed by the Government, or that the principle would have been in the first draft of the Bill. That was not the case. Having stood for Parliament many times on the basis that I believed in comprehensive education, I have to say that amendment No. 147 corresponds to my deeply held conviction and the pledges that I have given in 15 or 16 general elections to the constituents who have elected me to the House.

Mrs. May: In no debate in Standing Committee was the difference between old and new Labour brought so sharply into focus as in the debate on selection, and especially on whether selection could be made on the basis of ability or aptitude and whether there was a distinction between the two. I venture to suggest that that difference between old and new Labour has been all too clearly exemplified by the speech just made by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). In Committee, the difference emerged in a number of ways.

The Minister for School Standards assured us that there was a clear distinction between aptitude and general ability. He said that he would give examples of how aptitude could be assessed. The hon. Member for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes) told us:

"I do not know of any reliable measures of aptitude".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 24 February 1998; c. 597.]

As the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) pointed out, the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) told us:

"the Labour party has not believed in the principle of selection by ability for many years".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 24 February 1998; c. 589.]

Indeed, that position was reinforced tonight by the Secretary of State, who said in an intervention that the Labour Government did not accept the principle of selection by ability.

I refer the Secretary of State and the Ministers here tonight to a speech made in Southwark cathedral by the Prime Minister back in January 1996 when he was Leader of the Opposition. Hon. Members may be aware that at the time it was regarded as seminal in defining what the stakeholder approach meant in various spheres.

In that speech, the right hon. Gentleman talked about the need to make good

"those things left undone at the time of the ending of the 11-plus. Comprehensive admission does not of itself make for good schooling."

He went on to talk about

"transcending old structures, refusing to go back to the 11-plus but refusing too to make do with uniformity."

He then referred to a previous speech in which he had talked about

"the need to recognise that children do have different abilities"— not aptitudes, but abilities. He also talked about how this could be recognised in primary schools, and continued:

"It is even more self-evident at the secondary school level. It is important that we break down the rigidity in our system that assumes all pupils learn at the same speed in different subjects".

Quite why the different abilities to which the right hon. Gentleman referred in that speech have been turned in the Bill into aptitude has not been explained by Ministers who, having promised in Committee to define the distinction between aptitude and ability, singularly failed to do so.

I venture to suggest that the interpretation by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis)—I see from his expression that I have badly mispronounced his constituency—is correct. His reading of the Bill is that the clauses that refer to selection by aptitude are nothing more than references to selection by ability, and that there is no distinction between them. That very point was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who gave us the dictionary definition of the words.

The reality is that the Government are trying to pull the wool over the eyes not only of the general public but of their own Back Benchers. By pretending that there is a difference between aptitude and ability, they are suggesting that they have not left behind the solid Labour party principle, enunciated in the Chamber tonight and previously in Committee, that there should be no such thing as selection by ability. The Bill will allow selection to continue; indeed, it will allow its extension.

We must ensure that the education provided for each child is appropriate to particular needs and circumstances, and that may be achieved by providing for different forms of selection, for particular schools that select on ability or aptitude and for setting or streaming in a school. In my constituency, there are some first-class comprehensives, but no selective schools; however, some first-class junior schools find that setting in English and in maths works extremely well. In some circumstances, it is better to teach children of certain abilities together rather than to teach a class of children who cross the whole range of abilities.

I support amendments Nos. 90 and 91. Although the Government pretend that they have not, they have accepted selection and selection by ability. They have also accepted the extension of selection. The amendments would help the Government to achieve their apparent objective of allowing schools to provide the right education for children by permitting a degree of selection.

In Committee, the Under-Secretary spoke in support of schools being able to select by ability. In a debate about banding, she said:

"Some people think that for a school to be effectively comprehensive it should have a cross-section of ability. That is debatable, and I do not feel strongly about it. I certainly do not feel that a school cannot be comprehensive unless it has a cross-section of ability."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 24 February 1998; c. 642.]

The Government should accept the Bill's effects, and they should also accept the amendments.

9.15 pm

Mr. St. Aubyn: I support amendments Nos. 90 and 91 for the simple reason that I believe in freedom of choice. We have heard many comments about the London borough of Wandsworth, but we did not hear an explanation why, despite the criticisms, the people of Wandsworth have voted time and again for a local council that continues with policies of selection.

I respect the wishes of my constituents and endorse whole-heartedly the fact that they vote for a non-selective system, despite being only a short distance down the A3 from Wandsworth. The system works in the area I represent, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said, words have been used selectively in our debate about a non-selective system.

There is selection at 18 and at 16; indeed, many people in the education world are reaching a consensus that there should be an element of selection at 14, and in schools an element of setting—and therefore of selection—is increasingly being found to deliver better results, not only for the ablest pupils, but for pupils at every stage of ability.

A self-selective system exists alongside my area's non-selective system. The parents of nearly one in five children in Surrey have chosen of their own volition to put their children through an independent education, which may involve an element of selection. It is deeply dispiriting that Ministers who claim to have endorsed the spirit of the enterprise economy, and who claim to want the private sector to become more involved in education, are turning against the principles that underpin the success of independent schools despite being aware of the evidence of their success. That contradiction is at the heart of the Minister's policies.

[Mr. St. Aubyn]

Ministers should understand that the ideal is cohabitation between independent and state schools. Indeed, in parts of the country that objective is already being achieved. It is not socially divisive if one family chooses to spend its money on independent education while another family in the same street chooses to spend its money on a holiday—or a second or third holiday—overseas. The choice is there, and it is in that spirit that we should all defend the principle of parents' right to ask for a selective system. Some hon. Members may not believe that such a system is right for their own children, or for other children; let them persuade parents of that.

I am left with a nagging worry. Perhaps the fact that there is a consensus in favour of selection among adolescents is due to the fact that there is a consensus about the means by which academic achievements are measured by the time children reach that age. What if we find that we can adopt new methods of assessment enabling us to assess more fairly the different academic abilities of those at lower school ages?

In such circumstances, we can imagine the determination to stamp out selection in that age group being seen for what it is—a dogmatic throwback to the era of education that failed us in so many ways, and would fail us again if it ever got a grip on the Department. What worries many Conservative Members is what lies behind the warm words and tokenism that are a hallmark of the Bill.

There is no better example of such tokenism than the distinction drawn by the clauses that we seek to amend between aptitude and ability. If we read those clauses literally, we must deduce that a school that wishes to encourage children with musical ability will be allowed to ask those children to sing "Twinkle, twinkle, little star" from memory, but will not be allowed to ask them to read it from a music sheet because that would be a test of their reading ability. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] It is true. As in many other contexts, the drafting of the Bill means that everything is down to interpretation and the leniency or otherwise of Ministers.

Like many other parts of the Bill, the clauses that we seek to amend are all about putting power and decisions into the hands of a few Labour Members and taking power and decisions away from the parents who should have them. In tabling our amendments, we asked the Government to respect our view.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): I sincerely apologise for missing the beginning of the debate—[Interruption.] I was at what I assure hon. Members was an important meeting. I will tell them all about it if they want me to.

I want to make three brief points. First, let me ask the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) to consider genuinely whether abolishing selection tests helped the working class. As hon. Members know, I come from Glasgow and was educated there. There used to be selection tests in Glasgow, and they gave people an opportunity to break through the class barriers.

A few weeks ago, I sent the Secretary of State figures showing what had happened to Glasgow education since we abolished selection tests. What we have now is blatant class segregation. Parents who want to help their children are trying to find the cash with which to buy a house in a nice area where there appears to be better education. The tragedy is that better education does not stem from buildings, teachers or anything apart from parental expectation. I can think of one school in which any child who gains any qualification is regarded as having done well, while a child living half a mile away who does not get to university is regarded as not having done well.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield will go to Glasgow, look at educational achievement since selection was abolished, and realise that abolishing tests does not help working-class people. It damages them and prevents them from breaking through rigid barriers in cities such as Glasgow, Manchester, Birmingham and many others. We do no service if we build walls over which people cannot jump.

What is the relevance of the 10 per cent. selective admissions figure? In Southend-on-Sea, where I now live, tests provide for 25 per cent. selection. I would like Ministers to appreciate that, although we happen to have a great deal more poverty, much more unemployment—I am afraid it is about 9.7 per cent. in my constituency, which is extremely high—much bed-and-breakfast accommodation, many broken homes and a great deal of social deprivation, in A-level results we are streets ahead of the rest of Essex, which I am sure has far more large houses, people with big salaries and the kind of financial situation which many in Southend would like. I got the figures from the Library earlier today.

I appeal to the Minister to consider the situation in Northern Ireland. We automatically think that Scotland has the best education in Britain. In fact, achievement in Northern Ireland, as in Southend, is streets ahead—not because people are cleverer but because a 25 per cent. selection system achieves better results overall. If any hon. Member or the Minister would like to see the figures from the Library, I would be only too glad to supply them. The average points score in Southend for achievement at A-level is 19.8, whereas in Essex as a whole it is 16.6—and Essex is supposed to be quite good.

I appreciate that the Secretary of State and the Government have moved on grammar schools and selection. I do not believe that that is in any way an attempt to win votes or to try to stop socialism; I am sure that the Secretary of State has realised that he would not be helping able people from good families and poor homes by abolishing selection tests or grammar schools.

I hope that, having made concessions that will allow selection and grammar schools to continue in some form, the Labour party will realise that, although in places such as Glasgow Labour councillors, for the best possible motives, abolished selection tests and grammar schools, genuinely believing that that would produce equality of opportunity and get rid of some privilege, all that such actions did was destroy opportunities for the working class, build class values and do no good for education. I am sure that the Secretary of State will have looked with care and attention at the list of Glasgow examination results that I sent him two weeks ago and realised that the steps that he is taking are helpful to education and not damaging to socialism, as some would suggest.

Mr. Byers: The amendments address two distinct issues: partial selection and of 10 per cent. selection on the basis of aptitude for a specialism. I shall deal with both.

It is worth reminding the House that clauses relating to partial selection will be subject to the code of practice on admissions, to which clause 76 refers. Hon. Members have, of course, made their comments without being aware of the contents of that code of practice. The House will have the opportunity, as clause 77 clearly states, to debate and vote on the detail of the code of practice at a later date.

That is particularly relevant to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) about parents in his constituency—and, indeed, in Wandsworth generally—being angry and bitter about the situation in which they find themselves. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will produce a code of practice, there will be consultation, and it will be presented to the House.

The Bill provides that the adjudicator will be responsible for determining issues when there is no local agreement. He will have to follow the code of practice, which will give him the power to end existing partial selection if he believes that it is not in the best interests of other local schools, children and their parents. Without giving away the likely details of the code of practice, I can tell the House that my right hon. Friend would not be prepared to have a code that allowed seven different tests to apply to children, as currently happens in Wandsworth.

9.30 pm

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) asked whether a local education authority could refer a matter to the adjudicator. That is an important issue. The local education authority will be an admissions authority, because it will have responsibility for community schools. It will have the power to refer matters to the adjudicator.

We want to go further than that. There may be situations in which a local education authority that contains partially selective schools is not the only interested body. Neighbouring authorities may also have a legitimate interest because of the impact that partial selection has on children in their area. It would be appropriate to give power to a neighbouring authority to refer a matter to the adjudicator in such circumstances. When my right hon. Friend brings regulations forward, he will be mindful of the problems of neighbouring authorities, such as Southwark and Wandsworth or Greenwich and Bromley. Those neighbouring authorities have a legitimate interest in the effects of partial selection.

To respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting, adjudicators will have to follow the guidelines laid down by the Secretary of State. If they fail to do so, their decisions can be subject to judicial review if anyone disagrees with them.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the Minister explain how the adjudicator will cope with the potential disappointment and bitterness of a child from a less well-off background who, under the proposed new non-selective system, finds that the distance from his home to the school that his academic ability demands is too great, denying him the education that his ability requires?

Mr. Byers: I shall try to make sense of what the hon. Gentleman has said because I have a generous spirit—that is part of my nature. I disagreed with many of the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), but I agreed with his comments about the basis of selection. The school selects; the parent does not choose. That is the nature of selection. By promising no extension of partial selection and producing a code of practice under clause 76, we shall ensure that the continuing of partial selection does not cause difficulty for local children. That has been a consistent Labour policy.

Mr. Dafis: Did I hear the Minister aright? I thought I heard him say that there would be no extension of partial selection. In that case, what is clause 94 about?

Mr. Byers: I shall move on shortly to talk briefly about the idea of 10 per cent. specialism by aptitude, but first I must conclude my comments on what has been said about partial selection. I know that it is creating difficulties in areas such as Bromley—

Mr. Brady: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byers: No, I want to make my point first.

Bromley, Hertfordshire and Wandsworth are probably the three local education authorities most adversely affected by partial selection. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State brings the code of practice before the House, hon. Members will see how we intend to deal with the problem.

We had a full debate in Committee on the distinction between aptitude and ability, and exchanged definitions from the dictionary and elsewhere. I had not had Wordsworth quoted to me on the subject before, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) for drawing the reference to our attention.

A clear distinction exists between aptitude and ability. The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said that that was a nonsensical distinction, so it may be worth drawing to his attention what the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) said on 20 May 1996 when, as Secretary of State for Education and Employment, she launched some research:

> "To help specialist schools which want to identify a pupil's aptitude for the specialist subject as opposed to ability, I am announcing today a government funded research project".

The right hon. Lady was clearly of the view that there was a distinction between ability and aptitude. The findings of that research project were interesting; that ability is an all-embracing factor that suggests whether a candidate will be able successfully to undertake a course of study, whereas aptitude is narrower, determining whether someone can take advantage of a particular course of study. A clear distinction was made, and the findings were made available by the former Secretary of State for Education and Employment.

The point of our proposals on selection according to aptitude is that, although we believe in the comprehensive principle, it has to be modernised—and that is what the proposals in the Bill will do. Modernising the comprehensive principle is part of the Government's commitment. We shall embrace concepts such as setting, where that is appropriate in the interests of individual pupils; we have no problem with that, and we shall have a range and diversity of provision, but within the comprehensive principle.

[Mr. Byers]

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Byers: No; I want to make progress.

The amendments are in many respects backward looking; they do not take the debate forward. Our proposals are pragmatic and realistic and put the interests of children first. They are modern and they are based on partnership. In that spirit, I ask the House to reject the amendments, and to support the Bill in its present form.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister was at his most generous when he told us that he accepted the fact that local education authorities need to be able to object to partial selection in their areas. His generosity went even further when he said that neighbouring authorities could also object, and I am grateful for that.

However, the hon. Gentleman was at his most enigmatic when he told us that much would depend on the code of practice to be announced by the Secretary of State—yet, although speaking from the Dispatch Box, he told us that he himself would not be giving away any details about what would be in that code of practice. I suspect that this is the one occasion when we would have welcomed the full monty from the Minister.

The Minister made an interesting slip of the tongue. He wanted to say that he had a generous "spirit", but he said something that sounded like "spin-it". In his attempts to explain to the House the difference between aptitude and ability, he was spinning around. He will know that the majority of researchers do not accept what he says, including Professor Peter Mortimore, who in today's The Guardian makes it clear that there is no evidence for making a distinction between the two.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) made clear his concern about the situation in Wandsworth. The Minister told him that he need have no worries because the Bill will introduce a system in which there will be an adjudicator. If a parent in Wandsworth objects to what is going on, he can appeal to the adjudicator. If the adjudicator decides to, he can get rid of partial selection. I hope that that does not reassure the hon. Gentleman. Even if partial selection by ability goes, there will be a continuation of partial selection by aptitude, and that can grow.

One of the most worrying things I have seen in the House since the general election is the way in which the Labour and Conservative parties have joined in the Lobbies to take away benefits from lone parents. Labour Members ought to be concerned when they hear an offer from the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) to stand together, arm in arm, with the Government on selection by aptitude and ability. I hope that that sets bells ringing for many Labour Members.

On Second Reading, the Secretary of State said that the Bill would get rid of partial selection. The Bill does nothing of the sort. Without our amendment, partial selection by ability and aptitude will continue. We are fundamentally opposed to that, and I hope that all other right hon. and hon. Members who are opposed to selection by ability or aptitude will join us in the Lobbies.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 44, Noes 284.

Division No. 223] [9.41 pm

AYES

Allan, Richard
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Beggs, Roy
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Burnett, John
Burstow, Paul
Cable, Dr Vincent
Chidgey, David
Corbyn, Jeremy
Davis, Cynog
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Fearn, Ronnie
Foster, Don (Bath)
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Hancock, Mike
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Kirkwood, Archy
Livsey, Richard
Maclennan, Rt Hon Robert
Oaten, Mark
Öpik, Lembit
Rendel, David
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Sanders, Adrian
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Webb, Steve
Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd
Willis, Phil

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Paul Keetch and
Mr. Andrew Stunell.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Byers, Stephen
Caborn, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John (Copeland)
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dewar, Rt Hon Donald
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank

Dowd, Jim
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Illsley, Eric
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Kemp, Fraser
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall–Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Michie, Bill (Sheff'ld Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Moran, Ms Margaret
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Robertson, Rt Hon George (Hamilton S)
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Short, Rt Hon Clare
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Stevenson, George
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Stringer, Graham
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Wills, Michael
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John McFall and Jane Kennedy.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 94

PERMITTED SELECTION: APTITUDE FOR PARTICULAR SUBJECTS

Amendment proposed: No. 90, in page 69, line 28, leave out 'Subject to subsection (2)'.—[Mrs. Browning.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 131, Noes 331.

Division No. 224] [9.54 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baldry, Tony
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Burns, Simon
Butterfill, John
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James
Clark, Rt Hon Alan (Kensington)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rayleigh)
Clarke, Rt Hon Kenneth (Rushcliffe)
Clifton–Brown, Geoffrey
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cran, James
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davies, Quentin (Grantham)
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fox, Dr Liam
Fraser, Christopher
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gray, James
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic

Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hawkins, Nick
Hayes, John
Heald, Oliver
Hogg, Rt Hon Douglas
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Key, Robert
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Nicholls, Patrick
Norman, Archie
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Randall, John
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
St Aubyn, Nick
Sayeed, Jonathan
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Soames, Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher & Walton)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Townend, John
Trend, Michael
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Wardle, Charles
Waterson, Nigel
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Wilkinson, John
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Sir David Madel and
Mr. Stephen Day.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnett, John
Burstow, Paul
Byers, Stephen
Cable, Dr Vincent
Caborn, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chidgey, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John (Copeland)
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dewar, Rt Hon Donald
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drown, Ms Julia
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Fearn, Ronnie
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hancock, Mike
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Illsley, Eric
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kirkwood, Archy
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Livsey, Richard
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
Maclennan, Rt Hon Robert
McNulty, Tony
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)

Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Moran, Ms Margaret
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
Oaten, Mark
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Pearson, Ian
Pendry, Tom
Perham, Ms Linda
Pickthall, Colin
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Powell, Sir Raymond
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Rendel, David
Robertson, Rt Hon George (Hamilton S)
Rogers, Allan
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Short, Rt Hon Clare
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Rt Hon Chris (Islington S)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John McFall and Jane Kennedy.

Question accordingly negatived.

It being after Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the School Standards and Framework Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Ms Bridget Prentice.]

Question agreed to.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Sir John Stanley: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order arising out of a different aspect of a letter to which I referred earlier in our proceedings. The letter in question is that sent by an official of the Department for Education and Employment dated 9 March to the Kent education authority. That letter included a schedule of 45 schools, primary and secondary, that were potential candidates for closure on the grounds of surplus places. It is extraordinary that among the secondary schools in the list is the Judd grammar school in Tonbridge in my constituency, where in 1997, 100 per cent. of the pupils gained five or more grade A to C GCSEs.

The letter in question is, I believe without doubt, legally highly prejudicial to the proper and fair conduct of a ballot in relation to the Judd school and any other grammar school that has been the subject of similar letters. That being the case, it is incumbent on the Minister to assure the House that, in proceedings on the amendments, a Law Officer will be summoned to the House to say whether, in his view, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has been responsible for misdirecting himself; whether the Bill will have to be amended to ensure that schools that have been treated in the same way as the Judd school are excluded from the provisions of the Bill; or that the letter will be formally be withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have listened carefully to what the right hon. Gentleman has said, but the more he has said, the clearer it has become that his point is a matter of argument, which he has put on the record. There are other ways in which the matter must be pursued. It is not a matter on which the occupant of the Chair can rule this evening.

Clause 96

DESIGNATION OF GRAMMAR SCHOOLS

Mr. Dorrell: I beg to move amendment No. 175, in page 70, line 23, leave out 'had' and insert 'has'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 176, in page 70, line 23, leave out

'at the beginning of the 1997–98 school year'.

No. 177, in page 70, line 32, at end insert—

'(3A) Regulations may make provision that where a maintained school is not a grammar school,—

(a) the admission authority for a school may submit an application to the Secretary of State to change the admission arrangements of the school so that the school will qualify for designation as a grammar school under this section;

(b) when the Secretary of State receives an application under this subsection he shall arrange for a ballot of parents who would qualify to vote in a ballot under section 97 and if a majority of those parents support the application of the admission authority, the admission authority shall secure that the admission arrangements of the school are revised in accordance with its proposal.'.

No. 178, in page 71, line 10, leave out from 'read,', to first 'as' in line 12.

No. 160, in clause 97, page 71, line 22, at end insert—

'(bb) to any grammar school or group of grammar schools of a denominational character.'.

No. 179, in page 71, line 27, after 'section', insert,

'provided that the parents of children who are for the time being pupils of the grammar school shall always be so eligible'.

No. 165, in page 72, line 40, after 'not', insert 'at public expense'.

Mr. Dorrell: The amendments deal with the Government's approach to the remaining grammar schools left in the maintained system—just over 160. I firmly believe that clause 96 and the way in which the Government have handled it are one of the worst aspects of the Bill. The Labour party's attitude to grammar schools goes back a long way. It would be improper of me to repeat the quote that is attributed to Anthony Crosland on grammar schools. His attitude was expressed in the late 1960s. As we saw in Committee, Labour Members' prejudices towards grammar schools have changed not one iota in the intervening 30 years. The Minister's attitude is slightly different, but that of his Back Benchers, as it was manifested in Committee, is not different in any important detail from that expressed all those years ago by the late Anthony Crosland.

We do not need to look at Labour Back Benchers' facial expressions to see contemporary evidence of the strength of that prejudice within the Labour party. The present Secretary of State, when interviewed by the Daily Mail in January 1996, made clear his approach to the question of grammar schools as of that moment. He was quoted as saying:

"It is 30 years since Crosland embarked on this. I don't think anyone should expect me to complete his work in the first three months of a Labour Government."

He made it clear that his instinct was the same as Anthony Crosland's; he simply asked for greater time than three months to deliver the objective that Anthony Crosland had set out. Later in the same interview, he said:

"We have made a clear pledge. There will be no more selection. I'm going to be as blunt about it as that."

In January 1996, the attitude adopted by the present Secretary of State was extremely straightforward: he was opposed to selection and he was opposed to grammar schools as the manifestation of selection. It was a continuation of the policy pursued by the Labour party, both in government and in opposition, for more than 30 years. In January 1996, the position was clear.

My hon. Friends will remember that, little more than a year later, there was a by-election in the Wirral, which was awkward from the Labour party's point of view.

Mr. David Jamieson (Plymouth, Devonport): Who won?

Mr. Dorrell: The Whip intervenes—although he should never intervene because he is unable to respond to the reply—to ask who won the Wirral by-election. That is a matter of history, as are the Labour party's pledges during the by-election, which certainly contributed to its result. During the Wirral campaign, it became clear to the Labour party that the attitude expressed by the present Secretary of State in that Daily Mail interview and on numerous other occasions in the preceding months was not saleable on the streets of the Wirral.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Where is he?

Mr. Dorrell: It is, indeed, a pity that the Secretary of State is not here.

During the Wirral by-election campaign, the attitude of the Labour party evolved to the extent that, by 7 February 1997, the Financial Times was not reporting firm opposition to the principle of selection in grammar schools; on the contrary, it was saying that, under a Labour Government, there would be

"no threat to their continuance, or to their ethos, or to their quality."

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): Does my right hon. Friend believe that that is one of the reasons why the Labour party is so keen on regional development agencies? With regional development agencies, there could be a different Labour party policy for each part of the country.

Mr. Dorrell: We are not trying to encourage the Labour party to have different policies in different parts of the country. We are attempting to give effect, in a Bill introduced after the general election, to the Labour party's pre-election policy commitments. During the Wirral by-election, the Labour party was at pains to say that there would be no threat to grammar schools if a Labour Member were elected in the Wirral or, come to that, if a Labour Government were elected. During that by-election, the Labour party started to promote the idea that the future of a grammar school or group of grammar schools should be decided by a ballot of local parents.

In answer to the question, "How do you trigger a ballot under the provisions of Labour's proposal?" a briefing given to The Times in February 1997 said that there could be a ballot

"only if a sufficient number of parents wanted a change".

The Times continued:

"Although Mr. Blunkett declined to give a figure, Labour sources said, 'it will be a very high threshold—i.e. it won't happen'".

Therefore, guidance issued by the Labour party before the general election was not consistent with the policy that the Secretary of State had espoused a year previously, and—more critically—that policy is not consistent with the policy that is embodied in the Bill.

We have before us a rushed series of proposals—so rushed that the Minister of State was unable to tell the Committee the details of the arrangements that will prevail for the conduct of ballots. He could not even answer the most basic question that must be asked about any ballot; he cannot tell us who will be able to vote in the balloting process.

10.15 pm

The Bill vests in the Secretary of State a power to introduce regulations establishing the terms on which a ballot will be held to determine either the future of selective arrangements in a whole local education authority area, or the selective arrangements that will apply to the continued existence of a grammar school in an area where there are both grammar schools and other forms of school.

I shall discuss whole-area ballots first. The Minister's guidance to the Committee says that, if a local education authority currently operates a full, traditional selective system, there will be a ballot for the whole local education authority area, to determine the future of grammar schools in that area.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) said, that policy does not deliver on the Government's commitment to allow the parents in an area to determine the continuance or otherwise of grammar school arrangements to meet the educational needs of their individual children. The area that my hon. Friend represents is large, and it is perfectly possible that parents looking to one grammar school might reach different conclusions from parents looking to a different grammar school; yet the Government led those people to believe that the matter would be determined by local parents.

The outline of the voting arrangements says that all my hon. Friend's constituents will be lumped into a single ballot, and that different groups of parents will have no opportunity to reach different conclusions—hence amendment No. 160, which my hon. Friend will seek to move later. That amendment would allow a group of parents who wanted a denomination-based grammar school for their children to hold a separate ballot, regarding a single grammar school or a group of grammar schools, to determine whether that school or those schools should have continued access to a selective system.

Our first argument against the grammar school provisions is that the arrangements for whole-area ballots do not deliver on the Government's pledge to allow parents of children at a school to determine whether that school continues to be selective.

The Government get into worse and worse trouble on the arrangements for ballots to determine the future of individual schools. According to my reading of the material that is currently available to us, the first and most obvious inequity is that the Government anticipate that parents of children at feeder schools will have a right to vote to determine the future of an existing grammar school whose future is not the subject of a whole-area ballot, but that parents whose children currently attend the school will have no vote to determine the future of the school in which their own children are being educated.

I look forward to hearing the argument that the Minister will use when confronted with parents who may have a child aged 11 in a school with 11-to-18 provision, and who have been told by this Government that the future of the school will be determined by a ballot of parents—not of the parents of that school, but of the parents of five-year-olds in feeder schools. The parents of that 11-year-old, who still has another seven years' education at the school, will not have the right to determine the future of the school in which their child is being educated.

What possible principle provides that the parents of a child who may never come anywhere near that school, because those parents may move away, have the right to vote in the ballot, but the parents of a child already in that school have no such right? That is nonsense.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): Does that principle means that an old boy of the school—

Mr. Tom Levitt (High Peak): Old boy?

Mr. Fallon: Or old girl. However, I am thinking of an old boy from the Judd school in Kent, who might well live in my constituency of Sevenoaks, who has a son aged two or three. That old boy may be a governor of the school and have already decided that he would like his son to follow him and attend that school. He will not be able to vote in the ballot.

Mr. Dorrell: It is worse than that. That old boy could have a child in the school and a younger child who is not yet in a feeder school, whom the father wants to attend his old school—which that child's sibling attends—yet he will have no right to vote in the ballot to determine that school's future. That is absurd—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is defending the Minister's proposal. I note that no other Labour Member has leapt up to do so. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to tell us the argument that he would use in the sort of case referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon). Would the hon. Gentleman like to offer the Minister an answer to my hon. Friend's dilemma? I suspect that the Minister would be pleased to get one.

The answer is not obvious to me. What will happen when there is an old boy of the school, with a child already at the school and a child not yet in a primary feeder school? There are three specific links with the school, but no right to vote in the ballot to determine that school's future. The hon. Member for Workington is staying firmly rooted in his seat.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): We would dearly love the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) to spring to his feet. However, his credentials on this matter are clear. Only a few weeks ago he described grammar schools as infernal institutions. We know the bigotry that informs his position.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman's use of language is just the right side of what is acceptable in the House of Commons, whereas the language used by the late Anthony Crosland was wildly offside.

The second example is of a grammar school with a number of different feeder schools. In some parts of the area, the primary provision covers the age range five to 11. In other parts, there is a division between infant and junior provision, with children changing primary schools at the age of seven or eight. Is the Minister seriously saying that the parents of a six-year-old in the separate infants school will not have a vote, but the parents of a six-year-old in the combined primary school will? Is that the principle that the Government want to defend? I look forward to hearing the Minister explain why the parents of one group of six-year-olds in a regular, established stream would have a vote, while the parents of another group of six-year-olds coming into the grammar school through a different feeder stream would not have a vote.

[Mr. Dorrell]

We then come to perhaps the most absurd proposition of all. I am indebted for this example to the head teachers of two schools in Reading, the Kendrick school for girls and the Reading school for boys. Those are two selective grammar schools, one single-sex male and the other single-sex female. There are mixed feeder schools going into those schools. Is the future of Reading boys school to be decided not by parents of children in the school, but by parents who have daughters in feeder schools of Reading school for boys? The decision would be made by parents of children in the feeder schools who have no prospect of ever going to Reading boys' school, because that school makes a conscious policy decision to offer single-sex provision for boys.

The parents who have a vote in the election are parents of children in the feeder schools, but not the parents of the children in the school itself. The vote is accorded not to the parents of the children in the school, but to parents of girls in feeder schools who have no prospect of going to the school for boys. I look forward to hearing that principle explained by the Minister as well.

Mr. Fabricant: As confused as I am by the logic of the argument so far, I fail to understand whether there is any equity in it. However strange it may be that the feeder school parents can make a choice in the matter, will my right hon. Friend explain to me whether they will at least have the freedom to decide that the school to which their children will go from the feeder school can become a grammar school—or can they only stop it being a grammar school?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend clearly has long vision and the opportunity to look over my shoulder to see the next point that I was going to make. The Government sought to encourage the view that grammar schools were safe with them, and that there would be no threat to grammar schools' continuance, ethos or quality. One might almost say that the Government were elected on the undertaking that the grammar schools were safe in their hands.

The truth, as my hon. Friend rightly notes, is that a one-way ratchet is envisaged in the Bill—one vote once. If the vote goes against selection in a particular school, decades or perhaps centuries of high-quality education can be swept away on the basis of a single vote—[Interruption]—but the opportunity to establish a new grammar school on the basis of parental support is denied throughout the Bill.

Under the Bill as drafted, there is no prospect of any group of parents being able to commission a ballot in order to establish that the parents, teachers and local community in a particular area believe that the grammar school model offers the best future for their children. That is one of the issues to which I shall return.

Mr. Fallon: Did my right hon. Friend hear someone shout from the Government Benches, "What about grant-maintained schools?"? I remind my right hon. Friend that the Secretary of State retains the final decision on grant-maintained schools. When Amherst school last summer decided to go for grant-maintained status by an overwhelming majority, the Secretary of State, in the person of the Minister of State, overruled the school. Five, six or seven hundred years of history can be wiped out by sudden death on a single ballot, and that is the end of the matter.

Mr. Dorrell: I thought that my hon. Friend was about to make a different point—which is that, under the Bill, a grant-maintained school that was established on the basis of parental support in a ballot can be abolished without so much as a by your leave. There is certainly no question of seeking parents' support in a ballot to reverse that status.

Mr. Bercow: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the outrageous state of affairs described by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) is compounded by the fact that destruction of a grammar school—a beacon of excellence in our system—can occur in a ballot with absolutely no minimum voter turnout requirement? Is that not an indication of how determined the Government are to skew ballots in one direction rather than another?

10.30 pm

Mr. Dorrell: I think that my hon. Friend is right, but I have no means of knowing whether he is—and neither does the Whip, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), who seems very certain about these matters. Moreover, unless the Minister has cleared the draft regulations with the Whip, the Minister will know no better than I do what will be in the regulations when they are tabled.

It is yet another manifestation of the absurdity of our position today: we are being asked to debate and decide a system dealing with the future of 163 grammar schools in England on the basis that the Secretary of State will produce the rules after the House has debated the principles and the Bill is done and dusted. Therefore, the answer to my hon Friend's question is that, although I think he is right, no one in the House really knows the answer.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Did Ministers give any hints in Committee about how petitions for ballots would work? Like the heads and chairmen of governors of the two grammar schools in my constituency, did my right hon. Friend get the impression that, whereas a ballot might mean the end of the argument—one way or the other—for five years, a parent or group of parents could petition at any time and without any limit? Even if a ballot were held in response to a petition, parents could petition again the day after the ballot, creating instability for years to come.

Mr. Dorrell: Once again, I must say that I do not know for certain the answer to the question, because I have not seen the regulations. However, the indications that we have had from the Government are exactly as my hon. Friend suggests. Ministers seem to accept that, if a school wins a ballot to retain its grammar school status, the issue should be closed for five years. However, I do not think that five years is long enough. In Committee, we moved an amendment that made the point that an 11-to-18 grammar school will educate children for seven years. Therefore, although an unsuccessful ballot may be held in the first year of a child's education in that school, the school's future may again be open to question before the end of that child's education. Therefore, the five-year bar on re-balloting is not long enough.

My hon. Friend is right to say that, if an unsuccessful attempt is made to petition for a ballot, there will be no bar—none has yet been suggested by Ministers—on the right of any individual to launch a new petition and attempt to change a school's status. He is also right to say that, although a school will have a period of grace after its future has been decided in a ballot, a school that does not hold a ballot will be continuously subject to the type of threat that he described.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will my right hon. Friend concede that, on all those matters, the Bill seems directly to contradict the Labour party's policies on grant-maintained schools? When the issues of balloting grant-maintained schools were debated during and after passage of the Education Reform Act 1988, it was never suggested that the type of arrangements proposed in this Bill should be imposed on grant-maintained schools. Now, such arrangements are being foisted on grammar schools. Does it not show enormous hypocrisy in the Labour party?

Mr. Dorrell: I agree entirely. The Government have told grant-maintained schools that the Secretary of State will sign away their grant-maintained status at a stroke of the pen. I emphasise that a grant-maintained school is grant-maintained only because a majority of parents voted for that status in a ballot. The Secretary of State is taking the power in the Bill to reverse the effect of that ballot, without any suggestion that a ballot should be necessary to support his decision.

I suppose that it is at least a small mercy that a requirement for a ballot is being written into the Bill for grammar schools—although, as I sought to argue, on the basis of the information available to the House, the requirements that have in fact been written into the Bill are wholly unsatisfactory, and some of their effects verge on the absurd.

Given the range of inadequacies in the Bill and in the undertakings that the Government have given about the operation of ballots under it, had we tabled amendments to deal with them all and then encouraged the House to vote on them, we would have been here all night. Therefore, I tabled amendments to deal with the two most important failings of the balloting arrangements as they affect individual schools.

The first of those failings is the proposition that parents of children at an existing grammar school should have no vote to determine the future of that school. That is patently absurd. Amendment No. 179 provides that the parents of children at an existing grammar school should have a vote in a ballot to determine that school's future.

The second most important failing is dealt with by amendment No. 177. Instead of the grammar school principle being a closed list, schools should have the opportunity to seek the support of groups of parents to establish themselves as new grammar schools. That amendment is the most difficult for the Government to argue against.

The Government must believe that grammar schools ought to have a continued place in the school system. It may be unfashionable and awkward for the Minister's Back-Bench supporters that that is the Government's position, but it is what the Bill outlines. If the Government really believe that grammar schools are wrong, they now have the opportunity to abolish them. Presumably they do not believe that grammar schools are damaging to the public interest, because they are passing up the opportunity to do anything about them.

The Government have to explain why a school that is delivering a high-quality service and which they are content should continue to do so, in conjunction with the schools around it, should not be used as a model by parents in other parts of the country to establish similar successful schools to serve their needs and those of their community. The effect of the Bill is to establish a closed paddock: "If you're in there, that's fine. If not, too bad." The ladder is being pulled up. This type of school might work well for some, but the experience and proven track record of a grammar school in one area, serving the needs of certain groups of people, can never be used to offer the same opportunities elsewhere.

The Government claim that they are inclusive and that they promote opportunity and excellence in education. For such a Government to argue that grammar schools should be available to some but not extended to others who may want them and who could benefit from them is absurd.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my right hon. Friend think it ironic that the Minister without Portfolio can use all his venom to accuse the BBC of dumbing down, when he is a member of a Government who want to dumb down centres of excellence in this country?

Mr. Dorrell: I agree. If there is a theme that has run through the Government's schools policy ever since their election, it is their persistent vendetta against established centres of excellence.

I do not doubt the desire of the Minister of State to establish and promote high quality where he can do so, and when we have discussed other parts of the Bill, I have welcomed and encouraged his proposals for education action zones in so far as they provide opportunities to develop new ideas for the provision of schools. The problem that the Minister and his party have in spades, however, is that, whenever an existing, proven track record of success has been achieved under the assisted places scheme, by grammar schools or by grant-maintained schools, the Government's approach has been to sweep those schools away.

The Minister likes to say how important it is to promote high quality where it does not currently exist. No one disagrees with him about that, but he would be a great deal more persuasive if he did not consistently argue against the continued existence of institutions with a proven track record of success.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): At the end of the last debate, the Minister said that we needed to take the discussion forward, and accused my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) of tabling amendments that looked back. I suggest that the proposals in the Bill look back.

I believe that the issue in education should no longer be about structure—that it should now be about performance. I think that many schools that look forward, seek a new agenda and are concerned about performance, will be thrust back into an old argument from which neither they nor pupils will benefit. That is particularly true in my constituency. Inevitably, many of us will wish to speak about constituency cases.

[Mr. David Curry]

I have mentioned this case to the Minister before, and I pay tribute to his understanding. I believe that he is genuinely anxious to improve the quality of education. As he will know, my constituency—which contains the only three selective schools in North Yorkshire—has what might almost be described as a poisonous history. That certainly applies to the Ripon side. We are trying to turn our backs on the old argument, and look forward to creating different but equal centres of excellence in the spirit of diversity.

Ripon contains a long-standing grammar school of which I was head boy. In fact, I think I still hold the hundred yards record—largely because the boys now run a hundred metres. Across the road is Ripon city school, a secondary modern where my father taught. For many years there was open or covert warfare between the two schools. There is now a new headmaster at the city school, who has decided that he wants to turn his back on that old argument. He is seeking technology status for the school: he wants a centre of excellence that is different. He wants to focus on technological subjects.

When I sent him a copy of the Minister's letter outlining his proposals, Paul Lowery, the headmaster of the school—a city school; the school that might be deemed to have the greatest stake in change in Ripon—concluded his own letter by saying:

"we remain committed to the view that it would be divisive and inappropriate in Ripon"— reorganisation, that is—

"and would certainly not contribute to the important issue of raising standards!"

I must give a full report of the letter. The headmaster also said that he felt that secondary modern schools had become the overlooked element of the education system. I have reported the letter faithfully.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is he in favour of grammar schools?

Mr. Curry: The headmaster has said that he does not believe in reorganisation in Ripon. Ripon contains a grammar school and a secondary modern, and the nearest comprehensive is in Boroughbridge. I have therefore replied accurately to the hon. Gentleman.

The situation in Skipton is somewhat different. There are twin schools: a high school for girls and Ermysted's grammar school for boys. They are radically different. Ermysted's is aided; it owns its property; it has a foundation.

I have explained to the Minister the importance of the headmaster in Ripon seeking technology status in turning the school towards a new agenda, with a very clear unique selling point, to use the modern jargon. If the threat of reorganisation is to hang over that school, it can wave goodbye to the idea of technology status. Nobody would give a particular status to a school where the constitution is likely to change.

How far does a ballot go in Skipton? Does it extend to the feeder schools to both secondary schools? Does it extend right up the dale to the people who are affected? Where are the limits? That is important. There is a single grammar school in Ripon. One could imagine the Minister saying that the ballot applied to its feeder schools, of which there are 32 or 33. Some send one child a year—or perhaps one child every other year—to the grammar school.

10.45 pm

There are 16 or 17 feeder schools for Skipton high school, many of which are out of the area. People flee from the Keighley area, in Bradford metropolitan borough council, to North Yorkshire for their education—about which nobody can really complain. Is it conceivable that Ripon grammar school would go comprehensive, to leave the two schools in Skipton? Is it conceivable that the two schools in Skipton would go comprehensive, to leave Ripon grammar the sole selective school in North Yorkshire? Does the Minister accept that, in practice, it is all or nothing for those schools—and accept equally the schools' different constitutions, which create a problem for him?

Who ballots? I accept that the Minister has not made up his mind. I accept that his letter set out a series of hypotheses. My speech is to encourage him to look hard at those hypotheses. Ripon grammar has 32 or 33 feeder schools. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood said, under the Bill, the parent of a child in the first form of a primary school would have a vote, but the parent of a child in the first form of the grammar school, who expected their child to attend that school for six more years, would not have a vote. There is a question of natural justice.

We must ask a further question: if the vote is extended to the grammar school, would it be extended to the other secondary schools in the area? I realise that that is a problem with which the Minister must grapple. I suspect that he wishes that it would go away. That is one element I share with him. The agenda must look forward. The proposals look backwards. We would both like to eliminate the backward-looking agenda.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): Coming from the city of Lancaster, I have some understanding of what the right hon. Gentleman is saying. In arguing for the status quo, he is surely undermining the case of his right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) that parents should be able positively to ballot in favour of grammar schools.

Mr. Curry: If it is a postulate of the Government that people should be able to change a school from a grammar school to a comprehensive school, and if the Government believe that we should have a diversity of education, it must be intellectually consistent to argue that parents should also be able to ballot to return to grammar school status. I do not think that that would happen often. I said in my very first sentence that we should look towards performance and not form in education.

I do not think that my party's campaign for a grammar school in every town made a great deal of sense. I did not think that the Labour party's views on grammar schools, which kept changing with every blow of the wind, made a great deal of sense; nobody knew where it stood. Sensible people on both sides of the argument wanted to bring it to an end. We wanted to look towards performance and delivery.

In the modern world, public services are increasingly asked to demonstrate that they can justify the funding spent on them. That is right; I have no quarrel with that.

A ballot must be requested by 20 per cent. of parents—but over how long? Will the list be open for a month or a year? We know what will happen; people will persuade others to sign for a ballot on the grounds that they are not voting to change the school, but merely voting for a debate. It is a bit like Members of Parliament being asked to sign early-day motions—nothing will happen; it is just an expression of opinion. Before we know where we are, ballots will be triggered.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): My right hon. Friend has put his finger on an important point. Does he agree that, if the period in which signatures can be collected is not limited, we will be in danger of creating a charter for militant political activists—for what Harold Wilson described, in a different context, as a small and tightly knit group of politically motivated men?

Mr. Curry: We are in danger of creating an almost permanent situation similar to that on the board of Newcastle United over the past few days. Such uncertainty would be to everyone's disadvantage. How long will the petition be valid? If there is no time scale, the five-year gap between ballots does not mean much, because people can collect signatures in the meantime.

Mr. Brady: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be wrong for it to be possible for a petition to roll over to a subsequent year, given that the parents who had signed it may not be part of the eventual electorate?

Mr. Curry: I absolutely agree. Someone who had signed a petition in the initial stages might no longer be eligible to vote by the time of the ballot.

How will campaigns be funded? Rightly, local education authorities are to have no say. Governors are also apparently to have no say. However, I am worried that organisations such as the National Union of Teachers will throw hundreds of thousands of pounds at the campaign to comprehensivise British education.

I should like the Government to issue regulations. They should at least have a view on the funding of campaigns. The Freedom Association, or some similar organisation, will come in on the other side. Before we know where we are, megabucks will be thrown at the campaign. In the ideological battle, people will forget that kids' future is at stake. Opinion in small towns will be polarised, and a divisive bitterness will re-emerge in communities.

If a ballot results in a vote for reorganisation, who will pay for it? The reorganised schools would not use the same buildings in Ripon or Skipton. Where would funding come from for the necessary major physical reorganisation?

I accept that the Minister probably wishes that he did not have to bring the proposals forward. They are the tail end of the old policy. The Government would—rightly—prefer to address a more forward-looking agenda. In many respects they have done so. I support that. Arguments about structures are out of date. We have tried to move the agenda to what happens in schools. How do we improve performance? How do we judge performance? How do we ensure value for money? How do we know that people are getting what they are paying for in education? How are their natural aspirations being achieved?

In the many small towns that still have grammar schools, I foresee a sustained period of bitterness and polarisation.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: So you assume you will lose.

Mr. Curry: I do not assume that. The hon. Gentleman should listen to what I am saying.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. More importantly, Members should not intervene from a sedentary position, and Members who are on their feet should not respond to them.

Mr. Curry: I regret that my natural courtesy overcame protocol.

We need to move the agenda forward. Grammar schools still exist. If they were continuing to fire the old salvos across the road at the secondary moderns, I should not leap to their defence. I do not leap to their defence on ideological grounds. Frankly, if anyone could not run an effective education system in the socio-economic conditions of north Yorkshire, my advice would be, "Give up." That is true of Kent and Sussex too, and of large parts of Essex.

I do not believe that comprehensive education would be a catastrophe in North Yorkshire. Heavens above, we have good enough conditions there for it to work. I am asking, "Is it worth the candle?" Do we really want to go back to that argument, or should we look forward to a different agenda in which, most importantly, the secondary modern schools will be able to find a new role in the world?

It is a great mistake to assume that the debate is about grammar schools alone. It is also about the other schools, and about giving secondary moderns a chance to find a new vocation—if I may use a Gallic word that I hope my hon. Friends will not misinterpret—so that they can carve a valid, different, high-quality place for themselves in the education world. If we can do that, we can put the old arguments behind us.

Mr. Dawson: I take the right hon. Gentleman's point about the debate being not only about grammar schools but about the other schools too, but if the system that he describes is so good, would it not be a mark of confidence in that system to hold a ballot? Would not the system be validated by a ballot?

Mr. Curry: That may be so, but we know precious little about the details of the ballots or about who would be able to vote. The evidence is circumstantial; we know little about the time scale, and little about the funding. We need precision to be able to come to the judgment that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): Does my right hon. Friend not agree that Labour Members have been the masters of the art of looking to focus groups? If the

[Mr. Dominic Grieve]

Government wanted to go and find focus groups to register approval or disapproval of the grammar school system, they would have no difficulty in finding them in my constituency in south Buckinghamshire, and I know what the answer would be.

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is confident about the outcome of a ballot. I do not make a judgment about that, because my argument is not about whether grammar schools are a "good thing" or a "bad thing". I am simply arguing that the measures before the House would lead to a period of uncertainty, and certainly to a period of division and argument. Above all, they would force the schools concerned to turn their backs on the progress that they are now making towards more extensive co-operation and the creation of a separate identity that works, and that delivers diversity of education, based on excellence in each case.

Mr. Rowe: My right hon. Friend may be interested to know that some of the children who live in my constituency go to a school in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), which, far from being a grammar school, managed through a parental ballot to become grant-maintained, and this year is aiming to send at least two of its children to Oxford or Cambridge.

Mr. Curry: I look forward to the time when the city school in Ripon has a graduates club, and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is now far away from the amendments, and I should be grateful if he would return to them.

Mr. Curry: The point that I am trying to make, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is that one should not get locked into a particular mindset about what a grammar school can do and what a comprehensive or a secondary modern school can do. If people set their minds on developing those schools instead, they can achieve remarkable things—but they have to begin by putting the old arguments aside. In Ripon and Skipton, we are doing that.

The Bill would drag back those old arguments remorselessly out of the past, and that is wrong. I believe that we need an agenda that looks towards performance and delivery. I believe that the Minister, whom I respect considerably, wishes to do that too. I wish to help him, so I hope that, when he finalises the provisions in the Bill, he will bear those points in mind and look resolutely forward towards how we are to deliver education in the future—in diversity, but with excellence—rather than back towards old arguments that were destructive in the past, and will simply prolong that destruction into the future.

11 pm

Miss Widdecombe: I wish to address amendment No. 165, standing in my name, dealing with the gagging clause that the Government have seen fit to insert in the Bill, which prevents a grammar school or its governing body from campaigning or proselytising during the period of a ballot. It is odd that we will have a vote which may not be preceded by a debate among those most concerned in the outcome. Not only do we not know the rules that will govern the ballot, but the most interested parties—the ones whose voices need to be heard locally—will not be allowed to campaign during the ballot.

In my constituency, there are five grammar schools, and they will not be able to state the case for their own continuation. The Conservative county council—which wishes to continue with grammar schools—will likewise not be allowed to put its case. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) said, there is nothing to stop any organisation from arguing general principles nationally, but there will not be that opportunity locally—because, under the Bill, there may not be a proper debate.

When this matter was raised in Committee, the Minister's response was that the Government did not want public money used to promote large-scale campaigns during a ballot. That is perfectly fair. All my amendment does is to put that in the Bill. At the moment, the Bill says that bodies concerned "shall not" publish any material, give any financial aid or otherwise campaign. I am simply proposing to add three little words to "shall not"—"at public expense". That leaves heads, governing bodies, parent-teacher associations and anybody who has an interest in the outcome of the ballot free to make the arguments known.

The parents, teachers, heads and governing bodies of Kent would have been offended by the mirth that has been exhibited by Labour Members this evening in discussing something of major importance to them and to the future of their children.

Several hon. Members rose—

Miss Widdecombe: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe).

Mr. Rowe: I am flattered that my right hon. Friend has prioritised me. If I understand her correctly, she is suggesting that if, for example, a school's governing body wanted to have some influence on the debate, it should resign en bloc from its position as the governing body. It would then be entirely free to campaign. This seems to be nonsense. I have no doubt that people listening to the arguments that the body puts forward would rather know that it is associated with the school than finding that it is, in some curious way, forced to conceal it.

Miss Widdecombe: That is not what I am suggesting, but it is the only possible reaction to the situation that the Government have created in the Bill. People will look for ways around the measure. My amendment is straightforward, and I am amazed that the Minister is not embracing it. Apparently it deals with his objection, which is the use of public money.

Mrs. Browning: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in Committee, we referred to the amount of publicity that trade unions could produce in such a ballot? The Minister said that they were external bodies, and nothing to do with him. Experience of grant-maintained schools, however, has taught us that they would have considerable influence, given their resources. The bodies to which my right hon.

Friend is referring would have no power against a body such as a trade union unless the Bill contained the powers as she is defining them.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is right, and she does well to remind the House of that exchange in Committee, and the deductions that can be made from it.

I tabled the amendment at the direct request of the head of one of my grammar schools, with the support of other heads of grammar schools. They were severely concerned that there would be a vote but that there would be no input in the debate from the grammar schools.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): Is my right hon. Friend aware that parents as well as heads and governing bodies want to take part in the ballots? That is shown by the fact that, next year, both the grammar schools in my constituency—Highworth school for girls and the Norton Knatchbull school for boys—will have to impose a further entry condition because of their popularity among a wider and wider range of parents in and around Ashford.

Miss Widdecombe: Indeed. I heard sedentary comments—to which, of course, I should not respond—asking whether I was afraid of the outcome of the ballot. I refer hon. Members to what happened when a BBC crew conducted a vox pop in the streets of Maidstone on the continuation of grammar schools—the response was 100 per cent. in favour. Interestingly, the crew did not approach people who looked as if they had children who were currently at the grammar schools; it approached those with tiny children—people who certainly did not look as though they had had a grammar school education. Nevertheless, 100 per cent. wanted to keep the grammar schools.

Mr. Fallon: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Miss Widdecombe: Now, of course, I shall certainly give way.

Mr. Fallon: Last, and quite clearly least.

On that point, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the fact that, by definition, some of the people who were interviewed would have voted for the Labour party at the general election? Likewise, some of the people who will be disfranchised at those schools will be members of the Labour party. Will she comment on the absence of support for Labour's proposal from Labour Members who represent Kent?

Miss Widdecombe: That is a telling point. I must tell my hon. Friend that I chose my two other hon. Friends before him purely on a geographical basis—confronted with an embarrassment of riches, I had to find some way in which to select, so I chose on a distance criterion. He is, of course, right—both Labour and Liberal supporters wanted to maintain the grammar schools.

Mr. Dawson: If the schools are as popular across the political spectrum as the right hon. Lady says, what on earth is she worried about?

Miss Widdecombe: If the hon. Gentleman had been paying attention in class, he would have heard me say that I was not worried about the outcome in Kent. That does not mean that I want a silly, unfair system in which there is no reasonable debate before the ballot, and in which major national bodies—trade unions and others—can wage a campaign in Kent, whereas the grammar schools will be gagged. The clause is a gagging measure.

The Labour Government have let down the people of Kent. During the general election, I was repeatedly told by people who claimed to be Labour supporters, and whom I had no reason to disbelieve, "It's all right. They won't do anything to the grammar schools when they get in—the grammar schools are safe with them." I reckon that many parents in Kent now bitterly rue the way they voted in the election.

Mr. Brady: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way. I hope that she appreciates the fact that I am helpfully intervening in strict geographical order.

The hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) made a telling point, on which I should be interested to hear him expand. If he believes that comprehensive schools are so popular, I presume that he will support amendment No. 177, which would give parents of children in those schools the chance to vote on whether the comprehensive system should be maintained.

Miss Widdecombe: Indeed, my hon. Friend puts an unarguable proposition to the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson).

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Will the right hon. Lady explain how she can tell whether someone has been to a grammar school?

Miss Widdecombe: I could not tell, but the BBC crew reckoned they could, so the hon. Gentleman had better put the question to them.

The BBC crew made a point of approaching a range of people of different ages—people who looked as though they might have children at secondary school or at primary school, and people who looked as though they came from a range of professions and occupations—and 100 per cent., from all political persuasions, wanted to keep grammar schools.

That view will be reflected in future votes in Kent. Where are the Kent Labour Members? What are they saying on behalf of the parents who want to keep grammar schools in Kent? We have heard from the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre, and the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) often shouts out interventions, but their constituencies are a long way from Kent. Where are the Labour Members from Kent?

Mr. Rowe: Kent has more grammar schools than any other county, and a proud record of fighting to defend their right to remain as grammar schools. That battle, which had to be fought not only against Labour but, sadly, against the Conservative Government, was fought successfully.

We strongly believe that we have nothing to fear from a ballot. In many respects, the nature of the ballot that is imposed on us does not matter much. It is perfectly clear that the Labour Government have absolutely no idea what sort of ballot they ought to run. They are full of internal contradictions and paradoxes, and they will not find it possible to run a credible ballot on the lines that have so far been suggested. Kent is ready to go along with whatever ballot they decide on.

[Mr. Rowe]

In any debate about selective education, it is never suggested that the schools that have selection are inferior; the suggestion is always that they somehow have an unfair advantage over other schools, the removal of which is the purpose of all the activity. In a country that is desperate to raise its educational standards, with a Government who have declared that their first, second and third priorities are education, education and education, there is something strange about persistently assaulting a form of education about whose standards there is no complaint.

We must find ways of raising standards in other schools to equal those in grammar schools. By becoming grant-maintained, some schools in Kent have broken free of any suggestion that they are less successful than the grammar schools, and have achieved standards of equal quality. It is a tragedy that, when the grant-maintained system was working so well, it was instantly subjected to attack.

Miss Widdecombe: Does my hon. Friend agree that Cornwallis school—one of the first to go grant-maintained in my constituency and one that also serves people from his constituency—now has a high rate of university entrance and is looking forward to its first Oxbridge entrants?

Mr. Rowe: I entirely agree; that was the point that I made earlier. That was the school that I had in mind, but there are others.

Obviously, what is frustrating about this debate is that, although the Labour Government appear to be concentrating on a backward-looking assault on a proven system of education—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that this is a debate not about the relative merits of schools or educational systems, but about a certain group of amendments, and he is very wide of the mark. Will he please return to the amendments that are before the House?

11.15 pm

Mr. Rowe: Basically, I am speaking in support of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), because I believe, as she does, that there is something inherently absurd in debarring the people who know most about the system from taking any active part in informing the public of the merits of system in which they operate. As I said in my intervention on my right hon. Friend, the proposition that, to take part in the public debate, governing bodies have to resign from being governing bodies and conceal from the public their close connections with the schools that they are attempting to promote is nonsense. It should be written out of the Bill.

The amendment is entirely apropos the argument and it should be supported. I hope to hear that the Minister accepts that argument.

Mr. Brady: I am pleased to support the amendments on grammar schools that stand in my name and that of my right hon. and hon. Friends. As hon. Members who served with me in Committee are well aware, it is with great pride and pleasure that I not only defend the excellent grammar and secondary modern schools in my constituency, but go a little further than one or two of my right hon. and hon. Friends and recommend that the grammar school system be available to parents throughout the country. That is why I wish to speak in particular to amendment No. 177, which would give parents in areas that do not have the benefit of grammar schools the facility to enjoy those benefits if they wish.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) mentioned the changes in the position of the Labour party, as did my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry). One unfortunate aspect is that we seem to be in between the position held by very old Labour, when Sidney Webb and R. H. Tawney supported grammar schools because they believed that they gave opportunities for advancement to people from ordinary backgrounds—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can have heard what I told the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe). He should now speak directly to the amendments.

Mr. Brady: I was trying to point out, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that education system must be available to parents whether they are in areas that have grammar schools or not. In fact, there has always been a wide spread of opinion on both sides of the House and support in the Labour movement and on the Conservative Benches for that proposition.

I shall certainly try to refer specifically to the amendments as you request, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but it is essential for parents who do not have the option of a selective education system to be able to look to areas such as mine in the borough of Trafford and those represented by my right hon. and hon. Friends in Kent and Buckinghamshire that have the benefit of that system.

It is utterly unacceptable for the Government to include provisions in the Bill, which they claim are there to give choice and rights to ordinary people and local parents to decide, when they are not prepared to be even-handed. They are not prepared to allow a ballot to institute new grammar schools where parents wish. They are prepared only to have the one-way ratchet which, they hope, will lead to the end of the grammar schools. It must not be a one-way door. If there is to be fairness, choice, an element of local democracy and decision making and a balloting procedure, it is fundamental that the system operates in both directions.

I return to the point that I made to my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe). The hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) believes that, if we are confident of the popularity of the grammar schools in our constituencies, we should be happy with the balloting arrangements. He cannot argue that we should be comfortable with the balloting arrangement, however structured, when Labour Members are not prepared to accept the same proposition for the system of education that they seem to prefer. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. General conversation appears to be breaking out. I should be grateful if hon. Members would listen to the hon. Gentleman who is speaking.

Mr. Brady: I look forward to some meaningful and intelligent interventions from Labour Members, if they can refrain from the juvenile gestures that they are making. They must explain why they are not prepared to allow parents across the country the choice of looking at the success of the grammar school selective education system, and deciding that it patently works and should be replicated in their areas. The results of the system in the borough of Trafford, which has the best A-level results in the country, or in Buckinghamshire, which has the best GCSE results in the country, show the quality of selective education. Parents should be free to consider that and to decide that they want that education to be available for their children, and not just in those few areas fortunate enough to preserve grammar schools.

If the Government accepted the amendment, it would have the important effect of demonstrating the good faith of the pledge that they made before the Wirral, South by-election and of subsequent occasional comments on the subject. It would remove the thread of hostility to grammar schools that runs through not only the Bill but nearly everything that Labour Members say on the matter. The amendment would allow access to the excellent academic results that selective education can give.

Mr. Levitt: Why would parents vote for a selective system in which four out of five would not qualify because of the process of selection, which classifies four out of five children as failures, and which makes its education, however excellent, accessible to only a small minority?

Mr. Brady: I thank the hon. Gentleman for bringing on my next point and, in a sense, underlining it.

Different selective systems involve different percentages. That is not a particularly relevant concern. If the hon. Gentleman believes that parents will not vote for the selective system because they do not believe that all children will go to grammar schools, he must explain why it is not reasonable to allow other parents the same balloting procedure. The hon. Gentleman is confident that they would not wish to take that option up, but if he is so confident, why will Labour not allow parents that choice? He says that parents will not accept it, but I think that they may in certain circumstances.

The reason for that is clear from a selective system that works and has developed over the years as it should have. I speak from strong personal experience, although I admit with some shame that I was only deputy head boy of Altrincham grammar school. With a system that works to the advantage of all local children, not only through excellent grammar schools but through excellent secondary moderns across my constituency, we can see the result of a system that has been developed as it should have been.

I have accepted throughout this debate and in Committee that flaws in the implementation of the system arose from the Education Act 1944. Those parts of the Act, those pillars of the tertiary system, that were not properly resourced and put in place should be encouraged and built up. It should be a case not of using a skewed balloting arrangement to level down and to remove quality and excellence where it exists but of allowing all the schools to rise to the same standards.

Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): In Kent, 50 or 60 per cent. of children in many secondary schools have special needs. How will schools right across the board rise to the level of the grammar schools, which cream off the top 30 per cent?

Mr. Brady: The hon. Gentleman makes a rather tendentious point. I do not argue that all schools will achieve the same A-level results or the same type of highly academic education, or that the output—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to have to stop the hon. Gentleman again, but will he now return from general debate to the amendment?

Mr. Brady: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was trying to deal directly with the point put to me by the hon. Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Mr. Shaw). I should have been delighted to do that, but I accept your strictures and will move on. [Interruption.] In an English school, as well.

The critical point is that selection by ability is not only about creating grammar schools. It is about providing the best form of education for each type of child, each type of educational ability—dare I say it, each aptitude. Perhaps I should use those words interchangeably.

The quality of the results from secondary modern schools in my constituency, such as Ashton on Mersey school—which has received two outstanding awards from Ofsted and two charter mark awards, has now been made a sports college and is achieving better academic results than most comprehensive schools—demonstrates the value of a good selective system. I have the greatest pleasure, therefore, in supporting the amendment to promote the choice of parents in areas where there are no grammar schools. I also support the other amendments in this group.

Some critical effects must be understood in looking at the balloting arrangement. The proposal for LEA-wide ballots runs through the structure of the outline procedure on balloting and through the provisions in the Bill, and certainly impacts on my local schools. The justification for such ballots is supposedly that the future of one school is intimately bound up with the future of other schools. That has a critical relationship with the importance of being able to create new grammar schools in particular areas and particular circumstances.

There may already be an imbalance, especially in areas that do not already have fully selective education systems, but have some grammar schools. There may be an imbalance if there is just one grammar school, or an imbalance in single-sex provision by grammar schools. To take the example of Altrincham, there may be different denominational grammar schools. In those instances, it is essential that there is a procedure whereby education provision can be evened out and a new grammar school put in place to ensure proper and fair provision between sexes and denominations, or to ensure that there are sufficient places.

[Mr. Brady]

The hon. Member for Chatham and Aylesford made a point about the percentages of children in different schools. The decision may be taken, or parents may take the view, that it is appropriate to have a greater percentage going into grammar schools, in which case it would be appropriate for them to vote in a ballot to increase grammar school provision in their area.

We must not forget that, if grammar schools are voted out of existence through the balloting process as it stands—a one-way door, a ratchet—we shall see not only grammar school status disappearing, but mergers and the restructuring of education systems in large parts of the country. That will create imbalances that can be evened out only by the provision of new grammar schools in areas where parents want them.

It is tragic that the Government have sought to avoid responsibility on this issue. Ordinarily, I should be happy to support the idea that a decision of this sort should be taken locally, by a ballot if that is the appropriate means of doing it; but I fear that underlying the Government's attitude toward our arguments and to the amendment that would extend ballots and choice to other parents is an unfortunate state of affairs whereby Ministers are trying to avoid responsibility. The Government are trying to farm the issue out to local ballots because they do not want to take responsibility as a Government or even as a party at local authority level.

I see my neighbour, the hon. Member for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes), sitting opposite; she will know well the constant battle over grammar schools in the borough of Trafford over the years. The Government are keen to remove the whole issue from the normal political arena precisely because of the popularity of grammar schools. It is most reprehensible of the Government to refuse to accept that all parents should have the same rights to vote in ballots. They refuse to accept responsibility and are farming the issue out to a skewed balloting arrangement in the clear hope and with the clear intention that, over time, grammar schools will be gradually chipped away.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the Government want to sustain their claim that they are not hostile in principle to the continued existence of grammar schools, the best way in which they could prove their case would be to provide in the Bill for a minimum turnout requirement in the ballots?

11.30 pm

Mr. Brady: I should be happy to have a minimum turnout requirement. However, I suspect that, for once, I disagree with my hon. Friend, because I think that the best way for the Government to demonstrate their good faith would be for them to accept the amendment. Doing so would clearly demonstrate that they believe in the principle of local decision making, that all parents should have an equal right to make decisions of that sort and that all parents should have a choice. It is most unfortunate that the Government do not accept that argument.

If the Government seek to defeat the amendment, as I fear they might, they will be putting their cards on the table and making it clear to the British people—especially those in constituencies where grammar schools exist, or those in nearby constituencies—that the Government harbour the same hostility toward grammar schools as Labour Back Benchers. In some ways, I should welcome a more honest and open approach from the Government than the weasel words which we have heard so far. In opposition, the Labour party says one thing when a by-election is pending; in office, it does another. That is most unacceptable.

Amendment No. 179 would be a crucial improvement to the Bill. It would tidy up the anomaly whereby in those areas where there are only some grammar schools and not a wholly selective system parents of children currently attending grammar schools are not able to vote in the ballot. That is utterly unacceptable to the parents of such children—they have a clear and direct interest in those schools. The words that the Government employ in their outline of the balloting procedures are clear: they say that the objective of the procedure is to give the choice and decision on the future of those grammar schools to those parents who have a direct interest in the future of those schools. However, the Government are still not prepared to allow those with the clearest possible direct interest—parents of children attending those schools—a vote on the future of those schools.

Amendment No. 179 would remove an anomaly. It would create fairness and it would be seen to be fair. The Government should recognise that there would be some clear benefit in that.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood referred to a letter from the heads of the Reading and Kendrick schools. They draw attention to several serious anomalies and unfairnesses in the proposed balloting arrangements, and it would be constructive to consider one or two of them. The heads of the Reading and Kendrick schools say:

> "If feeder schools are Junior rather than Junior Mixed and Infant, this means in some ballots Years R/1/2 parents will have votes, in others they will not. The right to vote will be determined by the detail of primary organisation. This is demonstrably both inconsistent and unfair. A common provision is needed."

They also make clear the fact that the Reading and Kendrick schools have received children from more than 150 feeder schools during the past few years.

All those arguments point clearly to a balloting arrangement that is ill thought out and patently unfair, and which will not be well received in those parts of the country that are still pleased, proud and fortunate to retain grammar schools and selective education.

Finally, I shall discuss amendment—[Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."] I said that I had reached the final amendment that I would discuss; I did not give any hint about the detail in which I would discuss it. It is amendment No. 160, which is especially important to parents in my constituency.

It is vital to enshrine in the Bill provisions to ensure fairness in the balloting procedures, not just for the normal maintained county grammar schools, some of which are to be found in my constituency, but for the denominational grammar schools in my constituency.

There are two Roman Catholic grammar schools in my constituency. Under the Government's outline proposals on the balloting arrangements, the future of those schools will be decided not by the parents of children attending those schools, or by Catholic parents in my constituency, or even by Catholic parents throughout the borough of Trafford; their future will be decided in a single ballot, which will apply to Catholic schools and to non-Catholic schools. The Government's approach shows no consideration for the position of Catholic parents in my constituency, or in the borough of Trafford.

Amendment No. 160, which would allow the Government to take separately balloting arrangements on denominational grammar schools, has a vital purpose in restoring some fairness and balance to the Government's proposals. It would give Catholic parents the decision on the future of Catholic schools.

I suspect that such a position arises in very few parts of the country. Altrincham and Sale, West may be the only constituency in which there are two Roman Catholic grammar schools. Therefore, it is especially important—[Interruption.] I know that the hour is late, but the Secretary of State has had plenty of time out of the Chamber, and he could have had a strong cup of coffee to sustain him through this time. It is very unfortunate that he should yawn volubly during discussion of a crucial matter for the future of Catholic schools in my constituency. That is clear evidence of the trivial approach that he and his colleagues have taken to the future of denominational schools.

Mr. Blunkett: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will explain to the House, in words of one syllable, how allowing children into a Catholic secondary school without an 11-plus threatens the school, the pupils or the ethos of the Catholic religion that they seek to obtain? Will he withdraw his remark, on the ground that he is seeking to frighten people into believing that selection is essential to keep the school open or to continue to have Catholic education available to those children?

Mr. Brady: I am pleased that I now have the close attention of the Secretary of State. I have no intention of withdrawing my remarks, because they represent the views of parents, as expressed to me when visiting the Catholic grammar schools in my constituency. It is unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman bats aside such serious and legitimate concerns.

Mr. Byers: I have a simple question: does the amendment have the support of the Church education authorities—yes or no?

Mr. Brady: The amendment has the support of the Catholic grammar schools in my constituency. The Minister should accept that it is my responsibility to represent the interests of my constituents, and I shall do so.

Mrs. Browning: Having visited the Catholic grammar schools in my hon. Friend's constituency just two weeks ago, I am concerned to hear that Ministers believe that parental preference and the views of teaching staff are secondary in the way in which the Government assess what they would call fair and just. When the Government took office, we heard, "Fairness and justice; fairness and justice; fairness and justice." There is nothing fair and just about ignoring the sincere and firmly held views of parents and staff. Does my hon. Friend think that, when the Labour party prays in aid—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is an excessively long intervention.

Mr. Brady: I thank hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) for her intervention. Not only is there nothing fair and just about the way in which the Government are approaching the matter; it is not consistent with the principles that they have previously stated. Once again, the Government are failing to take into account their stated principle that the parents with a direct interest in the future of a school should decide the future of that school.

This is another clear instance of the Secretary of State—who is now indulging in ribald laughter instead of taking the point seriously—giving the right to vote in the ballot and make a decision not just to the parents with a direct interest in the future of the Catholic grammar schools, but to all the parents in the borough of Trafford. That is a clear breach of the principle that the Government have previously stated.

Mr. Levitt: If the only Catholic school in an area is a selective school, and a Catholic parent wishes to send his child to that Catholic school but the child fails the selection process, what choice is there for that child to attend a Catholic school? None at all.

Mr. Brady: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity to mention another of my excellent local schools—the Blessed Thomas Holford school, which is a fine Catholic secondary modern. Currently, if children do not get into the Catholic grammar schools, they have the option to go to the Catholic secondary school, which achieves results rather better than most comprehensive schools. It is another clear example of how a selective education system works, but I know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will not want me to pursue that point further.

On the specific point raised by the hon. Member for High Peak (Mr. Levitt), I can say only that I am pleased to have a variety of Roman Catholic schools in my constituency—[Interruption.] The Government proposal will limit choice, certainly for my constituents. That is unacceptable. The hon. Gentleman is looking puzzled, so I shall explain why. This might be relevant to the point raised by the Secretary of State, who has again disappeared from the Chamber.

The two Catholic grammar schools in my constituency were independent until last year. They were so impressed by grant-maintained status that they chose to opt into the state system so that they could take children regardless of their ability to pay. They are now providing free grammar school education to my constituents within a Catholic environment. As a result of the Government's proposals for the removal of grant-maintained status and the threat to grammar school status, at least one of those grammar schools, St. Ambrose college, is giving serious consideration to the possibility that the only way to protect its status as a Catholic school and as a grammar school is to leave the maintained sector again.

That should be a source of great embarrassment to Ministers and Labour Members. If they are creating an education policy that has the perverse effect of driving away good schools, to the extent that those schools not only change their status but leave the maintained sector, the policy is having an appalling effect.

[Mr. Brady]

The Minister has spoken of standards, not structures, but the Government's proposals are having a terrible effect and destroying a structure that works and provides choice. In this instance, their proposals are potentially even driving a school away from the maintained sector. That, in my view, is the definition of a failed education policy.

11.45 pm

Mr. Fallon: I shall speak briefly to amendment No. 179. I do so on behalf of my constituents who are parents at the Judd school and those who are parents at grammar schools in Dartford, Tunbridge Wells and elsewhere in Kent. Those are the parents who will be disfranchised under the ballot proposed in the Bill.

Many of those parents may have supported the Labour party at the general election, in Dartford and elsewhere in Kent. They may have been beguiled by that Labour slogan, "Standards, not structure", yet here we are, nine months later, debating structure, rather than standards. Any hon. Members who doubt that have only to look at clause 96(7):

"In this Chapter 'grammar school' means a school for the time being designated under this section."

Grammar schools reflect not just the designation of Ministers or the prescription of councils. They reflect above all the consent of their communities and the approval of the parents who send their children to them. By disfranchising parents from the ballots that will decide the future of those schools, the Government are proposing a monstrous unfairness. I want the Minister to reconsider that disfranchisement.

When we proposed ballots for grant-maintained schools, we did not get the ballots and the rules for them entirely right. We subsequently revised them. However, two points are clear. First, we had the courage to write those ballots into the Bill. That is not the case in the present Bill. Pieces of paper were simply circulated in Committee. I defy any hon. Member to read the four relevant clauses and say how the ballots will work. They are being left to subsequent regulations.

Secondly, we made sure that where there were to be ballots for grant-maintained schools, they involved the parents of the schools. That was our cardinal principle. We did not enforce grant-maintained status. It was one of the options for status under the Education Reform Act 1988. The schools could have been local authority schools, city technology colleges or grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Rowe: Does not the method chosen by the Government, of making regulations later, raise the—I am sure unworthy—suspicion that they are waiting to analyse the results of their various focus groups, so that they might create the type of ballot that they think will give them the answer they most want?

Mr. Fallon: That may well be the case. I suspect that, in those four clauses, old Labour is still at work, and Labour has not properly thought through how it can move to the new Labour ground of effective consultation.

It is noteworthy that, even in those local authorities where Labour took control and which have retained grammar schools, those Labour-controlled local authorities did not propose abolition of grammar schools, although they had the opportunity under the current statute to do so. Those Labour-controlled local authorities feared the reaction of local parents. Now, those precise parents will be the only group in their local area to be disfranchised. That is what Labour means by democracy.

Unless we pass amendment No. 179, those four clauses will be another example of the politics of envy. If Labour Members really believe in excellence, they should be attempting not to abolish but to extend—to build on the success of grammar schools, to build on the support that parents give to grammar schools, and to rejoice in that support—and to determine how they can strengthen the relationship between parents and their schools in other schools across our country.

Mr. Fabricant: I rise not in defence of any grammar schools in my constituency—I have none—but in defence of those constituencies, including Lichfield, which may want the opportunity to have a grammar school.

First, however, I join the clarion call of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), who asked why Labour Kent Members were not in the Chamber for this debate. I should like to know where the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) is. I was there for the Wirral, South by-election and heard him say that grammar schools were safe in Labour hands. It should be noted that he is not in the Chamber tonight.

Amendment No. 177 would deal with the asymmetry of the legislation, which says that there should be a ballot to get rid of grammar schools—

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Good.

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman says, "Good," from a sedentary position. However, if he supports balance, fairness and opportunity, which he talked about often enough in the general election—he nods assent now—why will he not also support balance in allowing grammar schools in areas that have none—[Interruption.] Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I shall heed your earlier admonition not to respond to sedentary interventions, the Government Whip, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), has just said, "Because you lost the general election." He defiantly tells parents, "You fell for our con. You voted Labour. You actually believed our promise that choice was safe in our hands. Now hear what we arrogantly say: there can be only one-sided ballots—to get rid of grammar schools, not to create them."

As I said in an earlier intervention, arrogant Labour Members and the Minister without Portfolio attack the BBC—perhaps rightly—for dumbing down, yet they belong to the very party that wishes to destroy centres of excellence. What hypocrisy. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] He came in earlier, but scurried out.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said, there is a one-way ratchet. Once the decision has been made to get rid of a grammar school, history and excellence are destroyed.

I have a constituency interest—

Mr. Bercow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Fabricant: I am a generous person, and I shall give way shortly.

King Edward's school in Lichfield was founded 500 years ago. It was a grammar school, and Dr. Johnson was educated there. I know that some parents of pupils there would like the opportunity to choose whether it should be a grammar school again, but that opportunity is not being made available.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend referred a few moments ago to the Minister without Portfolio. Is he aware that the Minister benefited from a grammar school education? Does not he think it appalling and typical that the Minister is not in the Chamber now to witness the dirty work that he expects others to do in his name?

Mr. Fabricant: I thank my hon. Friend, but the Minister without Portfolio is not the only one who benefited from a grammar school education—the Minister for School Standards, who wants to be the hangman for opportunity in this country did, too. [Interruption.] The Government Whip, the hon. Member for Devonport, is another, and I am told that there are more.

A great opportunity is being destroyed. There is to be no opportunity to vote for a grammar school, and although there is to be an opportunity to get rid of a grammar school, it is not the parents of children who attend that school who can make that decision. Why not? If I were a suspicious person, I might say that it is because the Minister for School Standards, who benefited from a grammar school education, believes that, if those parents were balloted, they would want grammar schools to maintain their status. So what do the Government do? They are so determined, for dogmatic reasons, to destroy grammar schools that they disfranchise the parents of children at those schools and allow only the parents of children at the feeder schools to vote. They know that the majority of the parents of children at feeder schools would want all their children to attend a grammar school, and therefore think that the ballot would come out in their favour.

The Bill is ill thought out, as well as being asymmetrical and unfair. There is no mention of a quorum. How many people are going to be allowed to vote to do away with history? Will it be five or 10? If that many parents vote in favour of a change of status while the others stay at home, will that be sufficient to destroy certain schools and history, simply because of the politics of envy?

As my right hon. and hon. Friends have pointed out, there is no control of funding. What is to stop the National Union of Teachers and other pressure groups paying for campaigns to make sure that schools with an excellent history are destroyed in the way that I have described? There has been no consideration of this point, either in Committee or in the Bill itself. If, despite all the odds that the Minister has set up to try to destroy grammar schools, the ballot fails and a grammar school is maintained, there is absolutely nothing in the Bill to prevent another ballot from taking place five or 10 minutes later.

The Bill is ill thought out, and it shows the intrinsic weakness of new Labour. When it comes down to it, new Labour is no different from old Labour. All the Labour party wants is to destroy choice, opportunity and excellence; it wants to level down, and it despises the excellent.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Bill will do what Shirley Williams and old Labour could not do, and abolish all the remaining grammar schools? Far from being new Labour, this "new Labour" party is old Labour, with all the venom and spite involved.

Mr. Fabricant: The Labour party is not just following in the footsteps of Shirley Williams; it is following in the footsteps of Anthony Crosland, who thought that it was his holy crusade to destroy excellence—an excellence that had been created so that people like the Ministers present tonight, who may or may not have been born with silver spoons in their mouths, would have the opportunity given to ordinary, decent people to excel if they had the ability to do so.

As I said, the Labour party wants to level down. It despises the excellent; it wants to promote unfairness; it wants to make a virtue out of dogma; it wants to destroy parents' choice in our country. More important, it wants to restrict the choice of our children and the future of the nation. I hope that the Labour party—and the Minister, who benefited from a grammar school education—will consider adopting amendment No. 177.

12 midnight

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I had not intended to speak, but since my election I have made a practice of noting the times when my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) is speaking, or has tabled an amendment. I came into the Chamber tonight to listen to her speech, and to note what she was saying. [Interruption.] Labour Members may have pause for thought in a moment.

Let me draw the House's attention to the precise words to which my right hon. Friend's amendment No. 165 attempts to draw its attention. Clause 97(9) states:

"An authority or body"—

in this context, a governing body—

"to whom this subsection applies shall not . . . publish any material which, in whole or in part, appears designed to influence the result of a ballot".

My right hon. Friend proposes that a codicil should be added to that, providing that such arguments should not benefit from public funds.

The issue that we are debating in the context of amendment No. 165 is not related to grammar schools, and is not related purely to ballots. It is not related to educational choice; indeed, it is not an education issue at all. We are debating an issue relating to free speech, a fundamental liberty that the House defends. Indeed, the very purpose of the House's existence is to defend free speech in this country.

Tonight the Government have an opportunity to refute a proposition that is implicit in my right hon. Friend's amendment—that they are a Government who deny, and wish to continue to deny, and wish to legislate to deny, the right to free speech. To refute that proposition, the Government need only accept the three simple words suggested by my right hon. Friend.

[Mr. Oliver Letwin]

Let us remember that, in the past few months, the Government have defended efforts by the European Commission to issue propaganda in favour of certain measures, with the use of public money. They have defended those efforts on the basis that the public deserve to be informed. Here we have a harmless governing body—a group of men and women, many of whom are doubtless parents, who have put themselves forward conscientiously with the aim of understanding the interests of their schools. What do the Government propose? They propose to legislate to prevent that body—the group of men and women most closely concerned with the school—from expressing a corporate opinion about a matter that is closely related to their interests, and, in many cases, the interests of their children.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): Does my hon. Friend agree that the implication of the Bill as it stands is that, if those volunteers, the members of the governing body, pressed ahead nevertheless and spent money—not public funds, but money voluntarily donated to protect the admission arrangements of their schools—the Bill would seek to make them criminals? Is that not a complete denial of justice and democracy?

Mr. Letwin: With his customary acuity, my hon. Friend moves the debate to the next question: what is the actual effect of the subsection? Is it, as he suggests, the intent to make criminals of such a body? I do not know whether it is possible in English law to make criminals of a body corporate. That raises a most interesting question. If it is not, is such action intended to be unlawful so that it could be prevented by injunction? Are we perhaps in the terrain suggested by the Lord Chancellor, when he proposed—I believe contrary to the opinions of many of his Front-Bench colleagues—that there should be injunctions ex ante to prevent certain things from being said by the press? Are we, on the contrary, dealing with something that would enable somebody to sue a governing body? If so, on what basis? We do not know.

I very much suspect that the Minister, for whom my hon. Friends and I have considerable respect, has included the statement in the Bill without sufficient thought about the consequences not just in education but across the terrain of public liberty. What is it to legislate to prevent a body corporate that does not use public money from making a statement, perfectly reasonably, about things that intimately concern it and its community? Is it to create criminals of such a body?

Mr. Grieve: Is not what emerges from the clauses the extent to which Government Front Benchers—undoubtedly the Secretary of State and the Minister—have been torn by the realisation that only by creating a rigged ballot can they get their way? It is because they have realised that that is an unpalatable truth that they have kept the clauses so vague. In fact, they do not know what to do.

Mr. Letwin: I think that my hon. Friend must be right. Ministers hope by the vagueness of the clauses to catch much, not knowing what they may in practice be having to catch.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): He is an old Etonian.

Mr. Letwin: I am absolutely convinced that the Government, in their better moments, cannot conceivably intend to achieve the effect that the subsection would achieve in the absence of amendment No. 165.

Mr. MacShane: He is an old Etonian.

Mr. Letwin: The Minister cannot possibly tell us that it is the Government's intention to restrict free speech in this country.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Has my hon. Friend considered whether the Bill might be in contravention of article 2 of the European convention on human rights, on the protection of minorities and freedom of speech? Does he think that the Bill has been cleared by the Government in that respect?

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because I was coming exactly to that question. The situation is worse than he imagines. The Government do not rely merely on the European convention on human rights; they seek to enact it in British law. Has the Minister considered how a British court will adjudicate on the possibility of an injunction, criminal proceedings or whatever the Government may imagine under the clause, given the human rights legislation that they promote?

I cannot imagine, in the light of human rights legislation, the many things that the Government have said about freedom of information and the whole tenor of their rhetoric, that they genuinely intend to argue that free speech on these matters should be prevented by law. This must therefore be a case of legislative mischance. The draftsman must have slipped up. The Government must not have intended to put what they have included in the clause.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald, with her customary generosity, has offered the Government in three simple words a way of defending themselves against an attack that will otherwise resonate not just for the next few weeks or months, but for coming years.

Mr. MacShane: Old Etonian.

Mr. Letwin: Such an attack will be based on the principle of free speech, which the House must support—Labour Members as much as Conservative Members.

I genuinely hope that the Minister will tell us that, regardless of whatever else he accepts, he is willing to accept amendment No. 165. If he fails to do that, he will stand convicted of believing that individuals, knowing their situation and that of their children, should not be allowed to take a view.

Mr. Bercow: I am a strong supporter of grammar schools. I should dearly like there to be more. It is natural that I should support my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) on the amendments. I shall focus my remarks on amendments Nos. 177 and 165.

Labour Members have made some rumbustious, but not very articulate, sedentary interventions on the schooling of certain hon. Members. During the outstandingly eloquent speech that my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) has just made in support of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) made comments about the old Etonian background of my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset. I take this opportunity to emphasise that, in supporting amendment No. 177, I am motivated by an overwhelming desire to ensure that people who have not enjoyed a grammar school education and those who do not currently enjoy such an education should offer that prospect to others in future.

Unlike Labour Members, I am not shy about my educational background. I have no hesitation in stating that I did not enjoy the benefit of a public school or a grammar school education. It was my dubious privilege to go to a mid-market comprehensive school in the Finchley constituency then represented by my right hon. and noble Friend, Baroness Thatcher of Kesteven. I am delighted that, with the assistance of a small number of outstanding teachers and some application on my part, I managed to get to university.

It is a matter of concern that, though the hon. Member for Rotherham is happy to make abusive remarks about the education of others, he is not prepared to acknowledge the reality of his own. He is probably weak on the principle of free speech, and he is certainly weak on full disclosure. In his biographical details, he is suddenly afflicted by an unusual bout of reticence, which most of my hon. Friends have not previously detected in his character. He acknowledges that he—the great anti-elitist—went to Merton college, Oxford. I believe that he gained an MA in modern history at that noble establishment.

Mr. Rowe: I assure my hon. Friend that he should not judge Merton college entirely by the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane).

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would return to the amendments.

Mr. Bercow: I happily return to the amendments. I was emphasising the rationale behind the support of Conservative Members for amendment No. 177. Those who have not enjoyed a grammar school education can wish others to do so. I simply observe that, if the hon. Member for Rotherham opposes amendment No. 177 and refrains from making a proper, crafted speech, preferring to make down-market and offensive contributions from a sedentary position, he should at least—in the context, of course, of debating amendment No. 177—make his educational background clear.

Mr. Fabricant: Would my hon. Friend be interested to learn that not only are we not hearing from the hon. Member for Rotherham in the Chamber, but that any reference to where he went to secondary school has been deleted not only from "Dod" but also from "Who's Who"? The hon. Gentleman went to Merton college, Oxford, but it is a complete mystery where he was before that. Perhaps he would like to volunteer the information. Could he have been at Eton too?

12.15 am

Mr. Bercow: As you will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and as I am sure the House will be happy to acknowledge, I am always, everywhere and in every particular a charitable individual, so it is not be for me to impugn the motives or the integrity of the hon. Gentleman, despite the disgusting socks that he regularly sports in the Chamber.

None the less, it is a matter of legitimate concern that, although he has opposed from a sedentary position amendment No. 177, and even amendment No. 165, which was so ably and articulately explained by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald, the hon. Gentleman has declined to divulge to the House his educational background. If there is a secret of which he is ashamed, the best way to ensure that it is kept in perpetuity is to rise to his feet in the House of Commons at this time of night and make a speech.

The issues in the debate, exemplified by the amendments, are of the essence in the context of our objections to the Bill. I begin my remarks about them by acknowledging at the outset that the Minister for School Standards has been fair in giving a hearing to views different from his own.

In the presence of other hon. Members who are aware of the fact, I can tell the House that a meeting sought by my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) and attended by my hon. Friends the Members for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) and for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) and by several Buckinghamshire county councillors was held at the Department for Education and Employment on 6 November.

The courtesy of the Minister's acceptance of our representations is not in doubt, although the soundness of his subsequent response most assuredly is. That is a matter for regret. There are good reasons why Conservative Members wish not only for the retention but for the extension of grammar schools in the United Kingdom. It is painfully apparent that not one Labour Member present is prepared to argue the case for grammar schools.

Mr. Grieve: Did it not become apparent at the meeting that we were really trying to do the Minister a good turn? One thing is certain: the loser from the Bill will be the Government. They may not get their referendums, but if they do get them they may lose them, and if they win them, there will be such disruption to the school system in Buckinghamshire that standards will fall.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is right. At that meeting and in our subsequent contributions to the debate we sought to help the Government. We attempted to extract them from the imbroglio into which their internal party politics had plunged them—

Mr. Blunkett: Imbroglio?

Mr. Bercow: If the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has difficulty in understanding that word, I suggest that he repairs to the Library, even at this late hour, and consults a copy of the "Oxford English Dictionary". I assure the right hon. Gentleman that he will find the word there.

[Mr. Bercow]

There are good arguments both for the retention and for the extension of grammar schools, of which the first is that they are successful. They are beacons of excellence in the education system. I put it to the House, and more particularly to my right hon. and hon. Friends, that it is precisely the grammar schools' success that is the source of Labour Members' resentment of them.

Mr. Hayes: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not just grammar schools that are successful, but the selective system? If one compares the composite results of grammar schools and secondary modern schools with neighbouring LEAs with comprehensive systems, one finds that all the children at the grammar schools and the secondary modern schools—

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman is wrong.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman may be a public school boy. I do not know—I do not want to be rude. The evidence suggests that grammar schools and the selective system help all children in a given area.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is entirely correct, and it is precisely for that reason that we wish to see the possibility of the extension of grammar schools. Grammar schools' very presence provides a catalyst for the raising of standards throughout the system.

Mr. Lidington: Does my hon. Friend recall that the results from schools in our county show that secondary modern schools and upper schools in Buckinghamshire—despite Labour Members' allegations that grammar schools have creamed off the top 25 or 30 per cent. of the intake—were nevertheless often attaining significantly better results than comparable comprehensive schools in neighbouring counties?

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. Moreover, the point is underlined by what people said during the election campaign. If the Government's logic is to be followed, it necessarily implies that, in an area where there are one or more grammar schools—attended, inevitably, by a minority of local children—the parents of most other children locally are antipathetic to grammar schools. The evidence is demonstrably the opposite.

In Buckinghamshire, only a small proportion of children go to grammar schools—in my constituency, it is a small proportion—yet support for grammar schools is enormous. In the context of this debate, I appeared on Channel 4 the other day. As a consequence, I have received a stream of letters from parents of pupils at schools other than the grammar school in my constituency saying that they strongly support and wish to see extended the number of grammar schools—and, therefore, that they strongly support amendment No. 177.

Mr. Grieve: Does my hon. Friend recall that, in April and May of last year, so great was the popularity of grammar schools among Buckinghamshire parents that the local Liberal Democrats got extremely upset—to the extent of threatening legal action—when it was pointed out that they had opposed selective education over many years? Does this explain their silence in tonight's debate?

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The lily-livered Liberal Democrats, in their characteristic fashion, had said one thing in the past, were not prepared to admit to it in the present, and denied their intention to revert to it in the future. That is of a piece with Liberal Democrats' politics—they are pioneers in unprincipled politics, and they are without equal in the UK.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I cannot let the debate pass without mentioning Clitheroe royal grammar school in my constituency and the fact that my Liberal Democrat opponent said during the election that he did not support the retention of the grammar school and the selective procedure. I believe that that was one of the reasons I had one of the lowest swings in the country against me. Does not the fact that grammar schools are oversubscribed show their popularity? People want to go to grammar schools, and they travel for miles—even from outside my constituency—to Clitheroe royal grammar school because of the good education that it delivers.

Mr. Bercow: I have no doubt that the quality of grammar schools in my hon. Friend's area was a significant contributor to his success at the election, but it would be unfair to pass on without mentioning that his success must also have been due to his outstanding diligence and charm, which are regularly on display in equal measure.

I fear that, in developing the point about the success and continuing popularity of grammar schools, I am inviting comments—it is a welcome invasion—from the hordes of my hon. Friends who have stories to tell of the dramatic successes of the grammar schools and upper schools in their constituencies. It is a merry tale.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The problem is that it becomes rather repetitive.

Mr. Bercow: Far be it from me to want to fall foul of the amiable temper that is usually on display in the Speaker's Chair. I shall therefore take note of your kindly advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, I cannot resist the opportunity to refer to the success of grammar schools nationally and locally, as that provides the rationale for amendment No. 177, which represents our request that individuals be granted the opportunity to vote to create grammar schools as well as to destroy them. The success of grammar schools nationally is not in doubt—no Labour Member has argued that they are failures.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my hon. Friend agree that the mechanism suggested in amendment No. 177 would enable more grammar schools to be retained? If the purpose of the Bill is to abolish grammar schools, does he think that that would in any way raise educational standards? In answering that question, will he be mindful of Pates grammar school in Gloucester, which has 170 applicants for each place?

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who confirms the popularity of and demand for grammar schools. The idea is absurd and illogical that, by dismantling those institutions that are already achieving excellence, we increase the chances of achieving excellence elsewhere in the system at some time in the future.

Nationally, grammar schools are tremendously successful: 94 per cent. of children who attend them obtain five or more GCSEs at grades A to C; more than 94 per cent. stay on in the sixth forms of those schools; and more than 88 per cent. of them go on to higher education. That all testifies to the institutions' success.

Locally, in Buckinghamshire, the position is similar. At the Royal Latin grammar school in Buckingham, 96 per cent. of children in the relevant age cohort secure at least five GCSEs at grades A to C, and more than 64 per cent. achieve A-levels at grades A to C. A substantial proportion of those children go on to higher education.

Grammar schools are succeeding, which is a powerful reason why those who do not have the opportunity of a grammar school education should be given one and why future generations should also be afforded that opportunity. That would be consistent with what the Secretary of State said in opposition—as was reported in the Financial Times of 7 February 1997. He said that a Labour Government would pose no threat to the continuance, ethos or quality of grammar schools. If that is what he believes, why is he going to allow ballots, which will have no minimum turnout requirement, to destroy excellence overnight? That simply does not hang together logically.

If the Secretary of State values or does not want to threaten the ethos of those schools, what is the objection in principle to giving people the opportunity to spread that ethos elsewhere in the education system? Perhaps the Minister can tell us tonight—or should I say this morning?

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is not only obvious demand for the grammar school ethos but huge scope for a wider variety of schools? The highly academic ethos of the grammar school is by no means the only successful model that ought to be spread round the country.

12.30 am

Mr. Bercow: I am in favour of having as wide a market and as great a diversity in education as possible. That is our commitment and our belief, and that was our record. That could not credibly be said of the Labour Government. That is why we support amendment No. 177.

We also support amendment No. 165, for the reasons eloquently stated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald and by my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset. We believe passionately in free speech. Either the Government believe in the principle and practice of free speech or they do not.

If the Government are content with the idea that trade unions can mount expensive and probably unrepresentative campaigns against grammar schools, why are they not prepared to allow governing bodies to campaign for them, especially if they do not do so at public expense? The concern about public expense expressed by the Minister has been met by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald, so the Government should accept amendment No. 165.

I cannot for a moment see why teachers and governors of grammar schools should be required to keep mum and to preserve neutrality on whether the institutions to which they have given outstanding commitment should continue to exist. The idea that they should be obliged to remain impartial between good and bad, right and wrong, future success and future failure, is positively absurd.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald made the argument overwhelmingly for amendment No. 165, and the response from Conservative Members demonstrated beyond peradventure that we all agree with her. What credible argument does the Minister have to offer in response? Let it be stated this morning, and let it be lucid.

Mr. Byers: I could not resist the temptation offered by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) to reply to this important debate. We have listened to Opposition Members' concerns about our proposals. We certainly do not treat these matters as trivial, as some of them suggested. I have been pleased to discuss these matters with several right hon. and hon. Members. We want the ballot procedures to be open, fair and transparent.

We have been helped in drawing up the draft proposals by Opposition Members' contributions. I have been pleased to be able to meet several of them—not only those from Buckinghamshire—and they have taken me in detail through the arguments as they affect their schools. I believe that our proposals, which I shared with members of the Standing Committee, reflected in some measure some of their contributions. I regret the fact that we could not meet all the concerns that were expressed, but we were able to move some way towards addressing them.

I have to disagree with the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who said at the beginning of the debate that he had no notion of the detailed procedures that the Government would want to adopt. We circulated draft proposals to Committee members, which ran to seven pages and 37 separate paragraphs and which revealed our present thinking, but we are prepared to continue to listen. Indeed, one of the benefits of this debate is that Conservative Members have raised a number of issues which I am certainly prepared to reflect on and reconsider in the light of our draft proposals.

The right hon. Member for Charnwood raised one issue on which I agreed. He said that, if we had wanted, we could have moved in this Bill to the abolition of grammar schools. The Bill does not do that. In fact, it honours our manifesto commitment in the run-up to the election on 1 May, when we said clearly that the future of grammar schools would be a matter for local parents to determine. That is exactly the policy that is reflected in the regulations and the proposed approach that we shared with Committee members. Local parents will be able to determine the future of grammar schools: not local education authorities, not individual schools, not the National Union of Teachers, but local parents, will have the power and responsibility to determine the future of those schools.

Mr. Bercow: At the risk of embarrassing the hon. Gentleman, I want to place it on record that I have the highest admiration for his talents and ability as a Minister. I hope that he will take my point in good part. To prove his good intentions, will he now give the House a commitment that, when the regulations are issued, they will contain something specific on the subject of a minimum ballot turnout before a grammar school can be abolished?

[Mr. Bercow]

Mr. Byers: There is a far better way to approach the issue, which is by providing a minimum number to trigger the petition. If there is not local support for a ballot, it would be far more effective to ensure that that is tested at a far earlier stage than looking at turnouts at the ballot itself, which is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear since the early days of our consideration of this matter that we will expect a petition to be triggered by 20 per cent. of eligible parents, reflecting the position that Conservative Members adopted on grant-maintained school ballots. So that is the position.

I can go further and say that there will not be a rolling petition going from school year to school year. The Government intend to ensure that the petition is triggered in the school year in which signatures are first collected. That has always been our intention, and we shared that with the right hon. Member for Charnwood in Committee.

Mr. Dorrell: Will the Minister therefore assure the House that the petition will not merely be time-limited, but that, if an attempt is made in one school year to mount a petition and the promoters fail to secure the support of at least 20 per cent. of parents, it will not be possible for a further petition to be mounted for five years?

Mr. Byers: No, I am not prepared to give that undertaking, because our view is that the moratorium should apply to a ballot once it has been held. I think the hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) said that there could be one ballot and then another five minutes later. Our present thinking is that there should be a moratorium of five years on ballots, rather than petitions. We are of the view that local parents should be able to trigger the petition in any one school year, and do not intend to block parents expressing their views by doing so.

Mr. Fallon: Therefore, why should not parents at the school be able to be involved in that ballot?

Mr. Byers: There will be two different situations. I think hon. Members are aware of the distinction that we have drawn between whole authority-wide ballots, in which parents will be involved, and free-standing ballots. We have taken the view that, on balance, it is not appropriate for only a grammar school's parents to make the decision on that school; it should be the feeder schools.

Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that all parents of children attending secondary schools—not only the grammar schools but other secondary schools—should be part of the ballot? If he is, we may want to reflect on it, because it would allow all parents whose children go to secondary schools to have a vote on whether secondary education should be selective or non-selective. It is a logical conclusion of his point that, if grammar school parents have a ballot, it should be extended to all parents with children at secondary schools. Is that what he is suggesting?

Mr. Fallon: I know that the Minister has been thinking about these matters. By inviting us to consider whether parents of all secondary schools in an area should be involved, he is admitting that it is wrong to disfranchise the parents of the grammar school itself.

Mr. Byers: No. We believe that our proposals, which would make the parents of children attending feeder schools the electorate, is the right way forward. I am saying in a spirit of generosity, to open up a dialogue with the hon. Gentleman, that, if he is suggesting that we should spread the franchise to parents of children attending all secondary schools, I would be prepared to consider it.

Mr. Grieve: In Buckinghamshire, in my constituency, there is much movement between upper schools and grammar schools of pupils aged 15 and 16. That is another argument for allowing all those in secondary education to be included. If I understood it, the Minister's rationale was that those directly affected, without going to a de minimis rule, should be allowed the vote. If it is to go to those who are directly affected, the parents of pupils at grammar schools must be included.

Mr. Byers: Yes, and in many cases they will be, because we will distinguish between free-standing grammar schools and places where a wholly selective system covers a local education authority. In those circumstances, the parents of children attending grammar schools will have a vote.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Byers: I shall not give way for a while, because it has been a lengthy debate and I wish to make some progress.

The right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) made several important points. I have reflected carefully on them, and on those that he made when we met a couple of weeks ago about our proposals on the details of the balloting arrangements. On the campaign, we have made it clear that, if there is any misleading information that might materially affect the outcome of a ballot, the Secretary of State will have the power to declare it void. That reflects the position on balloting arrangements for grant-maintained status.

The right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) discussed amendment No. 165 and said that there was a gagging clause. I would not have put it like that, but she is right to say that we have sought to introduce restrictions on the information that governing bodies and local education authorities can provide.

I listened to the right hon. Lady carefully. I considered at an earlier stage the possibility of introducing a condition about campaigning at public expense to overcome the concerns that she expressed. Practically, it will be difficult to distinguish between spending at public expense by the local education authority or a school governing body, and spending money that may be raised by the people involved.

There is no attempt to gag or to deny free speech. There will be nothing to stop the governors of a grammar school setting themselves up as friends of the grammar school to campaign against selection. They will be entitled to do that, not as governors but in their separate capacity as individual members of the local population. They will be free to do that.

Amendment No. 177 would allow new grammar schools to be established. We believe that grammar schools and the selective system are flawed, which is why we are drawing a line in the sand and saying that there will be no new grammar schools and that it will be a matter for local parents to determine the future of the 164 grammar schools that remain.

We do that because we take the view that selection denies choice. It is the school that chooses, not the parent who selects. We had a good example from the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), who said that, in one of his local schools, 170 parents were competing for each place. The reality is that 169 parents are denied the school of their choice. That is the nature of selection.

Mr. Bercow: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byers: No, I want to make progress.

I shall be asking the House to reject amendment No. 177 because it would simply turn the clock back to the days of the 11-plus and a massive waste of talent. At the age of 11, some young people were deemed to be a success, but the majority were deemed to be failures. Labour Members are not prepared to endorse such an approach, which is why I ask the House to reject amendment No. 177.

12.45 am

Mr. Dorrell: The Minister started off sounding reasonably encouraging, but he finished with a tone that was, I am afraid, depressingly familiar and predictable. Anyone listening to the arguments made in the debate must conclude that my right hon. and hon. Friends have made a powerful case, to which the Minister made little or no attempt to respond. My right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) was not arguing that we should seek to introduce a traditional selective system across the country, but made the point that the Bill promised his constituents the proposition that the status of Ripon grammar should be permanently open to question—and that from a Government who say that they are interested in standards, not structure.

No one can look at the results achieved by the grammar schools and the other schools serving my right hon. Friend's constituents and say that the system as a whole is not delivering quality. Yet the Government whose slogan is that they are interested in standards, not structure, threaten my right hon. Friend's constituents with the prospect that the arrangements that serve them well will be subject to upheaval and change.

Such change would not be devoted to delivering standards. No case has been made against the standards delivered to my right hon. Friend's constituents. The structure would be reformed in a way that would satisfy the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and a large number of Labour Back Benchers, but also in a way that the Minister is perceptibly uncomfortable in defending. My right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon made a case to which the Minister did not respond.

Mr. Bercow: Does my right hon. Friend recall that, on Second Reading, when the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) made his disreputable comment about grammar schools, the Minister for School Standards raised his eyebrows and looked askance in my right hon. Friend's direction, then at me, in naked embarrassment?

Mr. Dorrell: It is fair to say that that was not the only moment in the debate when the Minister for School Standards looked as though he would have preferred to be somewhere else.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) proposed that the admissions authority—the governing body of a school—should have the opportunity to present the school's case. Some of those schools have 500 years'—sometimes even more—experience of delivering high-quality service. All that my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) seek is the opportunity for the governing body, as the authority in charge of the school, to present the case for the school's record.

The Minister's response was that, as private citizens, the governors can go out raise money and present the case; but he did not offer any prospect that the governing body as the governing body can present the case to parents of children at the school and its feeder schools for the way in which the school operates. Once again, the Minister did not respond to the case made by my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Will my right hon. Friend assist me before I determine how to cast my vote? I raise a serious matter on behalf of the parents of children at the Queen Elizabeth high school and the Caistor grammar school. In times past, when there were many grammar schools, the feeder schools were in the immediate locality; now, such schools are so popular that they are drawing pupils from miles around, from Nottinghamshire and Grimsby and from feeder schools that are very distant from those ancient grammar schools. Will my right hon. Friend assist me, because the Minister clearly has not, by explaining exactly how the feeder schools are to be defined? Should we not know that before we vote on the matter?

Mr. Dorrell: I wish that I could help my hon. Friend, who seeks reassurance. I invite him to support the amendment, because the Minister has failed—not only this evening, but throughout repeated debates on this subject in Committee—to offer answers to the question that my hon. Friend poses. Here we have 163 schools, the future of which is to be determined by a balloting process, but the Minister has resolutely refused to offer more than general guidance about how the ballots are to be held, who is to vote, which schools are to be considered feeder schools, or who within the feeder schools is to have a vote.

I asked several questions in my opening speech about which parents from which feeder schools will have a vote in what circumstances, but the Minister did not even address any of those questions when winding up the debate. I should love to be able to offer my hon. Friend answers to his questions, but I cannot, because the Government insist that the House decides the substance of the clause without telling the House what will be its practical effect on the delivery of service by individual schools.

Mr. Hayes: Perhaps I can assist my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough

[Mr. Hayes]

(Mr. Leigh) by quoting from the Labour party manifesto, on which the Minister relied heavily during his remarks. In extraordinary detail, the manifesto states—

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Order.

Mr. Hayes: The manifesto states—I approximate—that local parents will decide—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. What the hon. Gentleman must do in an intervention is abbreviate.

Mr. Hayes: In an abbreviated form, would my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) concede that most people would deem "local parents deciding" to mean local parents with a direct interest in the school?

Mr. Dorrell: That is precisely right, which brings me to the next question the Minister failed to answer in his winding-up speech. Surely to goodness, the people who have the closest and greatest interest in the continued existence of a grammar school are the parents of the children in the school.

I return to the question with which I started the debate: what is the basis on which the Minister will defend his system when he has to explain to the parents of children in a free-standing grammar school that parents of children in the primary schools that feed the grammar school will have a vote to determine the future of the grammar school, but parents of children actually being educated in the grammar school will have no vote whatever in determining the future status of that school? One can have a parent—

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Tedious repetition.

Mr. Dorrell: I have said it before, as the hon. Gentleman says. It is not tedious repetition; I am reminding the House that the Minister did not answer that question when he replied to the debate. That question will come back to hit the Ministers when they have to explain to parents why they do not have a vote in deciding the future of the school in which their children are being educated.

The parents of 11-year-olds will find that, although seven years of their child's education have been committed to a specific school, the future status of that school will be decided not—as the Government promised before the general election—by the parents of children with an interest in the school, but by parents of children in primary schools, some of whom may well have an interest in the future of the school, but others of whom, before their children reach the age of 11, may move to a different area and have no interest in the school's future.

I asked several more questions in my opening speech. How can it possibly be sensible for all the parents of a mixed feeder school to vote for the future status of a single-sex grammar school? Should parents of girls in primary schools vote on the future status of the boys' grammar school? How can that be justified?

My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) said that parents must have a right to vote in determining decisions about the school in which their children are being educated. He also emphasised the most important of the principles that came up in the debate—to which, once again, the Minister did not respond: the question whether we should create an opportunity for the success of grammar schools that deliver high-quality service to be copied, extended and reproduced in parts of the country that do not currently have that system.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I have just taken advice, and I am advised that, in Committee, the question whether the provisions would breach article 2 of the European convention on human rights was not raised. Does my right hon. Friend believe that there is a possible conflict, and could there be a reference to the European Court of Human Rights in respect of these provisions?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is right to ask whether there can be a conflict. There might indeed be such a conflict, as the Government propose that a decision affecting individual children be taken for those children by the parents of a collection of other children, brought together by the Minister's guidance but excluding the parents of the children most directly involved in the individual school whose future is in question.

The proposition—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Workington complains about the fact that I keep returning to the point. I have returned to the point because I believe firmly that it is the fatal flaw in the Government's proposal.

The essence of the question before the House tonight is whether grammar schools are safe with the Government. That was the pledge—the reassurance—that the Labour party sought to give, first at the time of the Wirral by-election and then during the general election campaign. I remind the House of what the Secretary of State said of such schools in the run-up to the general election: that there would be

"no threat to their continuance, or to their ethos, or to their quality".

How can anyone who has listened to the debate, and to the views expressed from a sedentary position by a wide variety of Labour Back Benchers, continue to believe that the Government offer no threat to the continuance of grammar schools? That is not the essence of the message that has come from the Labour Benches tonight.

I shall seek, therefore, to withdraw amendment No. 175, in order to seek to divide the House on amendment No. 177. Amendment No. 177 would allow individual schools that want to promote themselves as grammar schools to seek the support of parents of children attending the school to take a successful formula and to introduce it where they can obtain the support of local parents to do so.

It is impossible to argue against extending the principle where it is seen to work and generalising good practice. I seek the support of my right hon. and hon. Friends and, indeed, anyone else in the House, for that important principle. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 177, in page 70, line 32, at end insert—

'(3A) Regulations may make provision that where a maintained school is not a grammar school,—

(a) the admission authority for a school may submit an application to the Secretary of State to change the admission arrangements of the school so that the school will qualify for designation as a grammar school under this section;

(b) when the Secretary of State receives an application under this subsection he shall arrange for a ballot of parents who would qualify to vote in a ballot under section 97 and if a majority of those parents support the application of the admission authority, the admission authority shall secure that the admission arrangeents of the school are revised in accordance with its proposal.'.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 128, Noes 279.

Division No. 225] [1 am

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baldry, Tony
Beggs, Roy
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Burns, Simon
Butterfill, John
Chapman, Sir Sydney (Chipping Barnet)
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Colvin, Michael
Cran, James
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davies, Quentin (Grantham)
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fox, Dr Liam
Fraser, Christopher
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Gummer, Rt Hon John
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hawkins, Nick
Hayes, John
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Key, Robert
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Nicholls, Patrick
Norman, Archie
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Randall, John
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
St Aubyn, Nick
Sayeed, Jonathan
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Taylor, Ian (Esher & Walton)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Walter, Robert
Wardle, Charles
Waterson, Nigel
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Willetts, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Sir David Madel and
Mr. Stephen Day.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Atherton, Ms Candy
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burstow, Paul
Byers, Stephen
Cabom, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Denham, John
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drown, Ms Julia
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Fearn, Ronnie
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hancock, Mike
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John

Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Illsley, Eric
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Charles (Ross Skye)
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
Macdonald, Calum
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McLeish, Henry
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall–Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Michie, Bill (Sheffd Heeley)
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
Oaten, Mark
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Pearson, Ian
Pickthall, Colin
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Radice, Giles
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Rendel, David
Rooney, Terry
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Noes:
Janet Anderson and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 100

HOME-SCHOOL AGREEMENTS

Mr. Don Foster: I beg to move amendment No. 125, in page 74, line 25, after 'adopt', insert

'and from time to time review'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 126, in page 74, line 25, leave out 'agreement' and insert 'policy.'.

No. 127, in page 74, line 25, leave out from 'school' to the end of line 26.

No. 128, in page 74, line 28, leave out 'agreement' and insert 'policy.'.

No. 129, in page 74, line 28, leave out 'specifying' and insert

'designed to promote partnership between home and school, including'.

No. 130, in page 74, leave out lines 40 to 45.

No. 131, in page 75, leave out lines 1 to 22.

No. 132, in page 75, line 23, leave out 'agreement or parental declaration' and insert 'policy.'

No. 133, in page 75, line 24, leave out 'agreement' and insert 'policy'.

No. 134, in page 75, leave out lines 30 to 32.

No. 135, in clause 101, page 75, line 41, leave out

'agreement or (as the case may be) in a parental declaration' and insert 'policy'.

No. 136, in page 76, leave out lines 2 to 13.

No. 137, in page 76, leave out lines 14 to 16.

No. 138, in page 76, line 17, leave out 'agreement' and insert 'policy'.

Mr. Foster: This group of amendments would remove from the Bill a requirement for every school to have a home-school agreement, and to replace it with a requirement for every school to have a home-school policy.

I make it absolutely clear that we are not opposed in principle to the notion of home-school agreements. However, we believe that, if there is to be a home-school agreement, it should be part of a school's home-school policy, and that it should be part of that policy only if the school decides that it is an appropriate contribution within that particular school in developing home-school relationships.

We are specifically concerned about the way in which the Government propose to operate their plans for home-school agreements. In Committee, the Minister for School Standards said:

"The agreement will be signed between a parent's being offered a place and the child actually taking up that place."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 26 February 1998; c. 688.]

The agreement will therefore have to be signed by the parent before the child has even entered the school—which is rather like establishing a pre-nuptial agreement before the partners had even met.

We appreciate that, in the circumstances covered by the Government's proposals, not one parent will refuse to sign the agreement. If they refuse to sign it, they might fear that their refusal will somehow jeopardise their child's education at a school. Although we realise that the Minister—we are grateful for it—has made it very clear that failure to sign will not jeopardise a child's entitlement to a place, it is nevertheless equally clear that all parents will sign the agreement for fear of jeopardising their child's education.

The concept of a completely non-binding partnership agreement was examined as long as 20 years ago, by the Taylor committee, a majority of whose members concluded that the idea of an unenforceable contract was a bad one. They thought that it was the suggestion by a few of a quick and easy way of enlisting home support, but acknowledged that it would not be a particularly satisfactory way of doing so. We certainly believe that the imposition of such agreements will not improve the relationships between home and school—and, indeed, could even confuse the existing relationships.

1.15 am

In a letter that he wrote on 19 February, the chairman of the Education Forum, Mr. Maurice Plaskow, eloquently summarised the crux of the problem:

"The key issue is whether every school should be required to have agreements, or can choose whether or not to have them, as part of a flexible approach to developing home-school partnerships."

We want that flexible approach to which he refers.

Many groups have expressed considerable concern about the Government's proposals and the detrimental effect that, like us, they believe they might have. Those groups include the Campaign for the Advancement of State Education, the Advisory Centre for Education, the National Governors Council, the Secondary Heads Association—the list goes on.

Many contributed to a letter that appeared in The Independent on 7 March this year. I think that a brief extract would be of interest to the House:

"We believe that this requirement could lead to division rather than partnership between parent and school and, further, that it will impose an extra administrative burden on schools."

The Advisory Centre for Education said:

"Disciplinarian home school contracts look like an attractive quick fix. They locate the problem in a particular, discrete area (parents), divert our attention from politically embarrassing questions (the organisation and funding of education), placate powerful interest groups (teacher unions) and fit in neatly with current concerns about social standards".

In other words, they regard the proposed approach as the quick fix rather than what we and they believe is necessary, which is the development of a home-school policy in which there is equal partnership.

If there is to be a contract that all parents are required to sign before the child has even entered the school, it is clear that the parents are not on a par with the school itself. An effective home-school policy involves equality for the partners. There must be an opportunity for both partners—the school and the home—to share ownership of whatever the agreement might be.

Mr. Fallon: Does that mean that the policy, as distinct from the agreement, should be voluntary?

Mr. Foster: The whole point of what I am suggesting is that the school would develop a policy, and that the policy itself would be drawn up by the home and school in partnership. The hon. Gentleman is right; it would nevertheless be a voluntary policy, in the same way that the Government's own policy for a partnership agreement cannot have sanctions attached to it, as the Minister has made clear.

[Mr. Foster]

I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that there is little value in having a document which parents are required to sign in advance of their child entering the school but to which no sanctions can be attached. I am sure that he would prefer a system in which the school and parents work together to develop a policy that may include a partnership agreement of the type that the Minister has described.

I am aware that the House is keen to make progress, but I hope that I have, with those few brief words, explained clearly why the Government's policy is not going to be successful in developing the type of home-school partnership that we all want—a partnership in which, for the first time, we perhaps consider not only the rights of parents and the responsibilities of schools but the responsibilities of parents and the rights of schools. That notion needs to be enshrined in a home-school policy, but one for which the home and school have equal responsibility and of which they have equal ownership.

Mrs. Browning: The problem that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) has clearly encountered is one that we encountered in Committee. It typifies the experiences of those who served on the Committee. By failing to present detailed proposals, the Government have deprived both the Committee and the House of an opportunity to deal with the specifics of what they have in mind.

Amendment No. 125 suggests that the policy should be reviewed from time to time, and I do not think that anyone would disagree with that proposal. Most home-school agreements would be subject to review, and that would be a good thing. When presenting his idea, however, the hon. Member for Bath seemed unclear about the exact difference between an agreement and a policy, if both were to be voluntary.

The Minister told the Committee that home-school agreements would be subject to consultation. He said that the contracts would contain the sort of provisions that one would expect to see—for example, provisions relating to standards of education, the ethos of the school, regular and punctual attendance, discipline, homework and information that schools and parents exchange. We agree with all that in principle, but the hon. Member for Bath is now saying that what is in the Bill will be insufficient, and will not represent a true partnership between parents and schools.

In Committee, we discussed exclusions. It was suggested then that the conditions on which a child who had been excluded from a school was readmitted might—I emphasise the word "might"; again, the Government were not specific—be written into the agreements. In that event, when parents sent their children to a school, they would know in advance—because of what had been published in the home-school agreement—the conditions on which children who had been excluded might be taken back. In Committee, however, we never really clarified exactly what the Government had in mind, and whether they were happy for such agreements to encompass the conditions on which exclusions would be dealt with.

As the hon. Member for Bath said, partnership is needed. Schools and teachers, including head teachers, do not always receive the support they should be able to expect. Equally, parents often complain that schools do not share information with them, and that they are not always made aware of school rules or standards relating to, for instance, when homework is expected to be delivered. They do not always know what their role is.

I think hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that partnership is needed between parents and schools, but it is not always possible to legislate for that, because parents do not always agree with actions that teachers consider appropriate. In the middle of all that—between the school and the parents with whom it would have a contract—are the children themselves. They clearly need to be made aware of an agreement to which they would be party.

The way in which the agreements would be communicated is still rather unclear, because the House has not been told exactly what is behind the Government's thinking. We find it peculiar that they cannot give us the details, thus saving—perhaps—some time on amendments such as this. After all, they have been able to come up with the costing for the contracts. According to the Government's own figures, the administrative cost of home-school contracts is likely to amount to £1.6 million in 1998-99, and to an additional £0.5 million a year thereafter.

It therefore seems strange that, in an important part of the Bill on which there could be quite a bit of cross-party consensus, the Government have been able to provide costings but still cannot provide detailed information on the content of a contract, and more particularly, on exactly how much autonomy a school and a group of parents will have in drawing it up.

The hon. Member for Bath has made it clear that he believes that there should be dialogue and a contract drawn up before children attend a school. I would not disagree with that principle. He will know—although he did not touch on it—that clause 101 says that the Secretary of State will have the power by order to instruct that is not used in a home-school agreement".

"any form of words—

(a) specified in the order, or

(b) having such effect as is so specified,

Although the Government say that they have a broad idea of what would be appropriate in a home-school contract, and although the hon. Gentleman believes that there should be much more of a partnership between the school and the parent, at the end of the day, as one would expect in the Bill, the Secretary of State will have the power to determine the wording of the agreements.

Although we have had to deal with this part of the Bill without the benefit of the full detail that one would have expected the Government to provide, it seems clear that there will not be freedom for negotiation between parents and a school, as I assume the hon. Member for Bath wants, because the Secretary of State may intervene to override the precise wording of individual home-school agreements. That causes concern.

Why do the Government believe that that is necessary? Why do they believe that schools and parents cannot agree? Such contracts will vary from school to school.

How can the Government stipulate that the Secretary of State should intervene in the school contract in such detail, while being unable to provide us with all the things we discussed in Committee, which I will not rehearse but which are clearly behind the thinking of the hon. Member for Bath in tabling the amendments?

Mr. Hayes: The relationship between home and school is obviously central to clauses 100 and 101. It is recognised across the Chamber that that relationship is fundamental to educational progress and success. It has been so recognised by educationists for many years—perhaps always. Equally important are the expectations that the school has of parents and their role, and then the parents have of the school. That those expectations are set, confirmed, codified and communicated is critical if parents are to know how the school expects the child to be prepared for and supported in their learning, and parents are to know what they can reasonably expect the school to deliver to their child.

The home-school agreement must be sensitive to the needs not only of the school but of a particular child. In that respect, I completely disagree with the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). He talks about a policy being better than an agreement. A policy is a planned, coherent approach; a way of doing things; a set of ideas; whereas an agreement implies some sorted of binding relationship between parties or partners.

On the one hand the hon. Member for Bath says that he wants partnership, but on the other he says that he prefers policies to agreements. Surely agreements imply partnerships in a way that policies do not. Most schools already have policies for the relationship between home and school. It would be a very poor school that did not include that relationship in its strategic planning document. Such policies do not equal specific agreements that confirm the expectations of the school and the parents on what each of those partners will deliver.

The hon. Member for Bath should rethink whether an agreement is better than a policy. The Government must be clear about who will be responsible for putting the agreement together. It is obvious, as my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) has said, that the agreement will benefit enormously from the flexibility—

1.30 am

Mr. Don Foster: The hon. Gentleman passionately believes that an agreement is better than a policy. Does he accept that the word "agreement" means that both sides have jointly accepted it? If so, does he accept that an agreement that is imposed by one side on the other, as the Government are proposing, is not the same as the agreements that he is talking about?

Mr. Hayes: Yes, I am happy to concede that point. The word "agreement" implies some discussion and an appropriate exchange of views about the contents of the document. It should also be reviewed in the light of the child's progress through the school. It would be nonsense for that not to be the case.

Mr. Foster: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for explaining that his understanding of an agreement is of something that has been discussed and agreed by both sides. What sanctions does he believe should fall on anyone who is not prepared to sign such an agreement? The Minister has made it clear that no sanctions would be attached to the agreements that the Government are considering. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that there should be sanctions for those who are not prepared to sign agreements?

Mr. Hayes: The difficulty with sanctions is that turning a voluntary agreement that has been negotiated in the flexible and pragmatic way that I have described into a legally binding contract creates the potential for litigation, which might well be founded on irrational grounds. A parent who was not acting rationally or even in the best interests of their child, but fulfilling a grudge against the school, would be able to use the full panoply of the law to pursue that irrational course of action.

Let me also put the other side of that coin. Sometimes, a school will not be able to fulfil its side of the agreement, for reasons entirely beyond its control. If the local education authority came under Labour control and cut services and resources—as has happened with Labour authorities throughout history—the school would be in the invidious position, through no fault of its own, of not being able to deliver the range of services that it had promised that parents could reasonably expect. The potential for litigation thus dissuades me from advocating a legal document of the type that the hon. Member for Bath describes.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): I am intrigued by how my hon. Friend envisages the flexible system working. Suppose that I were induced to negotiate such an agreement on behalf of our Albert for his education. Does my hon. Friend envisage that I would negotiate with the head teacher a specific agreement on the circumstances for my son? If not, what is the value of it?

Moreover, what happens if the school does not fulfil the agreement? I might not be being unreasonable; I could be being entirely reasonable. Would that not necessarily open up the issue to the law?

Mr. Don Foster rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have an intervention on an intervention—and the first intervention has been going on long enough.

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for rushing to my assistance in an awkward situation. I shall try to deal with the substance of that intervention, if I may. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, South—[Interruption.] Is it East?

Mr. Swayne: West.

Mr. Hayes: New Forest, West. I think that that is the place where the ponies are not.

My hon. Friend talked about the difference between an agreement and something with the sanction of the law, and the obligations which that implies. My hon. Friend is here tonight by agreement; the Whips would not sue him if he were not here. Yesterday he agreed to buy me a meal at the Savoy, but I shall not sue him if he fails to do so.

[Mr. Hayes]

The lack of legal ability to enforce those agreements does not negate them. They depend on his will to be here, my will to accept his hospitality, and the Whips' generosity, which in my hon. Friend's case is endless.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend, whom I thank for his characteristic courtesy in giving way to me, will agree that a body of men and women of sounder common sense than is to be found in South Holland and The Deepings would be unimaginable. Will he therefore tell the House whether the good burghers of that constituency are manning the barricades in support of legally binding home-school agreements?

Mr. Hayes: First, because of its European connotations, "burghers" is not a word that I would want to apply to the inhabitants of my noble constituency—which, as I have said before, is full of decent fen people who are close to God.

There seems to me to be a reasonable demand by parents for clarity about what they can expect from their local schools. Given that the law obliges them to send their children to school, and obliges the children to attend school for the most important years of their lives, in terms of their development, it does not seem unreasonable for parents to demand that expectations be codified and communicated in a reasonably coherent and consistent way.

That is what we aim to achieve with home-school agreements, but there is a lack of clarity in the Government's position. They seem to have alighted on a good idea but not to have had the necessary foresight, or perhaps the time and energy to develop it. I often look at those on the Government Benches and see a swathe of the half-hearted and the half-witted. I do not know which of those characteristics is to blame in this case, but the Government do not seem to have had the clarity of thought to see the basic good idea through to its conclusions.

Perhaps the worst example of lack of clarity in that respect is the failure to give schools and parents the power to come to local agreements sensitive to local needs. It is nonsense to assume that one home-school agreement can apply equally in the nirvana of South Holland and The Deepings, and in Buckingham.

The idea that there will not be local needs and local differences, of the sort that should lie at the very heart of the agreements, school by school and area by area, is nonsense. It provides yet another example of the Bill's giving ever-increasing powers to the Secretary of State when we should be enabling—"empowering", to use the trendy term—local people to come to flexible agreements for the benefit of schools and children.

Mrs. May: I fear that I will not be as entertaining as my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) at 1.38 am, but I will address some of the issues.

The tone of this debate is developing in a better fashion than that of the debate in Committee, which was somewhat sterile. Many of the Labour members of the Committee took the view that the only way in which we could have a good working relationship between parents and a school was if the school was required by the imposition of statutory legislation to produce a home-school agreement and a parental declaration of the parent's rights and responsibilities. As a result, we did not have an open debate about the right way forward for schools and parents.

It is important to place it on record that none of my right hon. and hon. Friends doubts the importance of the relationship between the school and the parents of the children in that school—or the relationship between the school and those bringing up the children if they are not the parents of the children. Education is best, and the achievement of the children is likely to be greatest, where there is full support for those children, not only within the school but within the home environment. We would not deny the importance of that relationship or the importance of parents and schools working together in the best interests of the children and the school. We are looking for the best approach to develop the best kind of relationship between home and school and to develop the interests of the children concerned.

Members of the Committee received a number of representations on the points raised by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) in his amendments. For example, the Parent Teacher Associations of Wales wrote to Committee members, offering support for the concept of a home-school policy as opposed to home-school agreements. The associations said:

> "We strongly disagree with the requirement that schools need to be required by law to have home-school agreements, in conjunction with a 'parental declaration' to be signed by every parent."

The associations urged Committee members

> "to recognise that the development of policies on these and other matters needs to be a two-way process from the beginning. We all agree that home-school links are important, and that everyone has a role to play in stimulating them. There are many good examples of successful partnerships at school level, through which effective home-school polices have emerged. Let us help to build on the evidence of good practice, and not impose the illusion of partnership through this proposed legislation."

The term "illusion" is extremely important, because it captures what we see all too frequently in terms of the Government's proposals—they are interested in image, rather than in reality and substance.

Although the Bill gives the illusion that the Government are encouraging partnership between schools and parents, the reality is—given the law of unintended consequences—that the opposite will occur and that, because of a statutory requirement to develop home-school agreements, we will not see good practice developed. The process will become something that governing bodies feel that they have to do because they are required to do so by law. Some governing bodies may even treat the process somewhat cursorily—it may come to be seen either as a bureaucratic requirement that schools do not want, or as something that is created and then put to one side. That would not improve educational standards; it would be to the detriment of children and of the development of the relationship between schools and parents.

We also received representations from the Education Forum, which is convened by the National Consumer Council. It comprises representatives from a wide range of organisations, such as the Campaign for State Education, the Consumers Association, the National Association for Special Educational Needs, the National Association for Primary Education and bodies from Wales and Scotland. On an issue to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings alluded, it said:

"Even the word 'agreement' implies a legal commitment. Signed agreements would undermine the process that has been made in improving home/school partnerships in many schools . . . The key issue is whether every school should be required to have agreements, or can choose whether or not to have them, as part of a flexible approach to developing home-school partnerships."

That is the key to why the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Bath is wrong. As some of the groups that made representations to us argued, although a home-school policy—as opposed to a home-school agreement—could be beneficial, the hon. Gentleman's proposal would impose on schools a statutory requirement to develop such a policy.

We should develop and encourage best practice in schools, but we should allow them to develop approaches that are right for their local circumstances. Some schools might think it appropriate to develop an agreement to which parents would be asked to sign up, although such an agreement would be entirely inappropriate for other schools, as parents might not feel able to abide by the agreement.

Mr. Don Foster: I have been listening to the hon. Lady carefully, as until a moment ago she was mirroring—although at somewhat greater length—what I said on the issue. Does she believe that a school would not accept the need for some arrangement for liaison between home and school? If so, does she agree that that means that every school would accept the need for a policy of some sort?

1.45 am

Mrs. May: I am really concerned when the hon. Gentleman suggests that I go on at greater length than he does. I believe that the majority of schools want not an agreement, but some arrangement—I use his word—that defines their relationship with parents. However, I question whether making the development of such arrangements a statutory requirement will be to the benefit of schools and parents.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) seems to be in a state of some confusion? If he is so convinced that all schools will be persuaded of the desirability of agreements with parents, why is he so preoccupied with the need to make them a legal requirement?

Mrs. May: My hon. Friend hits the nail on the head. If schools develop such arrangements in their own right, why do we need to make that a statutory requirement? As I said, the very fact that there was a statutory requirement would be detrimental to the development of arrangements that suited the local circumstances.

The Education Forum said that it was "concerned about the implications of the term 'parental responsibilities'".

As the Bill sets out the responsibilities of both the school and the parents, the forum said:

"There is a danger that agreements could detail parental responsibilities in a way that some parents cannot reasonably be expected to meet e.g. because of home circumstances, their income, their own learning difficulties, or because they do not speak English adequately."

In those circumstances, it is imperative for a school to have flexibility and not to have a single agreement that every parent must sign or be stigmatised. The school should be able to determine how it should develop the relationship between school and home.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings spoke about the legal implications. Notwithstanding the clause that says that the agreements would not be legally binding, I remain concerned that parents might assume that an agreement and a parental declaration signed by them and by the school's representative was a guarantee of a particular level of education.

Following the Labour Government's local authority settlement, many schools have had to cut such courses as music tuition. They may be unable to deliver the level of education specified in the agreement, and that may result in parental recourse to litigation, which would sour relations between parents and the school. The proposals do nothing to encourage the partnership between school and home that is so important in encouraging and enabling children to get the best out of their education.

I fear that the clause, even with the amendments, will not encourage best practice or good relationships; indeed, it will sour the relationship between parents and schools. On that basis, I remain unconvinced by the Government's proposals.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I listened with great interest to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) as, unfortunately, I was unable to attend the Committee sitting at which the clause was originally discussed.

Many of the regulations, conditions and proposals surrounding the Bill were presented to the Committee either at the last moment or, even worse, after clauses had been considered. So it is with this very clause. A Department for Education and Employment press release of 18 March, entitled "Morris launches plans to improve management of pupil behaviour", was issued after we had discussed the clause.

How do the clause and the amendment affect children who do not behave well—the difficult ones who, in extreme circumstances, have to be excluded from the school? We all support links between schools and parents and want to build on them, but we remain to be convinced that legislation is required to get good parents to co-operate with schools.

The weakness of the clause is that it will fail to apply to the very children who need it most, because they are often those who are not prepared to co-operate or to consider the home-school agreement closely.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am listening carefully to what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but I must remind him that this is not a clause stand part debate. He must direct his remarks to the amendments.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I can assure you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that is exactly what I am going to do. Amendment No. 130, tabled by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) will exclude clause 100(3), which states:

[Mr. St. Aubyn]

"The governing body shall take reasonable steps to secure that the parental declaration is signed by every qualifying parent."

Before we decide to exclude clause 100(3), Ministers should clarify whether it is part of the reasonable steps that a governing body should take for it to tell the parents of a pupil who is likely to be excluded, "We require you to sign this agreement, or we will go ahead and exclude your child from school." Should powers of exclusion, whether for a fixed term or on a permanent basis, be held over the heads of parents who are proving unco-operative in signing home-school agreements?

I raise that matter because, as Ministers will know, the Select Committee on Education and Employment has studied hard the problem of disaffected children, among whom we include those excluded from school. We are concerned at what measures schools may take to encourage parents to become more involved in their children's problems, and what is leading to their disaffection. Tonight, we require Ministers to clarify the interaction between home-school agreements in those cases.

That those questions have to be asked is a measure not only of the surreptitious way in which the Government's policy is evolving but of the confusion in the ministerial ranks. While they are about it, they should explain more fully their policy on exclusions. How far a school can exercise its right to exclude pupils interacts directly with its proposed home-school agreement.

When the Secretary of State came before a joint meeting of the Select Committees on Education and Employment and on Health, just over a month ago, he gave us some confusing signals as to whether he thought the powers contained in the Bill should be used to provide schools with more effective powers to exclude pupils, or whether, by making schools pay for the cost of exclusion—to paraphrase his words—he would in effect emasculate them and prevent them from using that important final sanction in the armoury of discipline that we give schools today.

If he is serious in what he told us at that hearing and he believes that schools should in certain circumstances have to bear the cost of a pupil being excluded, he will make it far harder for schools to tell the parents of such children before they reach the stage of excluding them that they want parents to sign up to a home-school agreement.

In effect, the Department's proposals would undermine the very policy of home-school agreements that it has championed. The confusion should come as no surprise.

Mr. Hayes: Is that confusion not well illustrated by the fact that the Government's position, rather like that of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), is somewhat inconsistent? Originally, the Government talked about contracts that "define responsibilities". We have now moved to agreements, but the hon. Member for Bath is talking about policies.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I agree. This is another example of the Government's addiction to tokenism. When they wanted to show the world that Labour had changed and that they understood the importance of the relationship between parents and the schools that their children attend, they said, "Let us have home-school agreements"—a great banner headline for a day. When we get down to the detail and the complications of requiring parents to sign up to those agreements, it is an entirely different matter.

Once Labour Members were in government, the impracticalities were visited on them. The Department has explained to them that the ideas that they had in opposition are simply impractical, so we are burdened with confusing clauses, such as clause 100, which do not achieve anything.

Mr. Willis: I am confused about what we are discussing. We have tabled an amendment that makes a serious commitment to changing the Bill for what we believe is the better. Will the hon. Gentleman say what he would put in the Bill to make it better, or is he arguing that the whole thing should be scrapped?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am not surprised at the hon. Gentleman's confusion. A little while ago, I spoke to his colleague the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), who said that he was so tired that he could not remember what he had said in a previous debate. I well understand the problem. It is a disgrace that we should be discussing these important matters at such a late hour. The Government refuse to make available proper time in Parliament for us to debate this in normal hours. They say that it is their flagship policy, but they want it to slip through at 2 am.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is wholly new territory. The hon. Gentleman must come back to the point.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I apologise. My vote on amendment No. 125 will depend on the Minister's answer to our points. The Government have sown the confusion, and it is up to them to clarify their position now.

2 am

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am delighted to be able to speak on this group of amendments and, in particular, on clause 100, which relates to home-school agreements.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not a question of "in particular". We are on clause 100 and amendments to it.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: It is common ground that the intention behind clause 100, amended or not, is that the expectations of parents and pupils, and the aims and objectives of schools, should be better understood. The question is whether it is to be achieved by the Bill's terms and, in particular, the word "agreement", or by the amendments' terms and, in particular, the word "policy". We have been debating whether an agreement can be legally binding. I refer hon. Members to clause 101(6), which states:

"A home-school agreement shall not be capable of creating any obligation in respect of whose breach any liability arises in contract or in tort."

I concur, because as I understand it—I am not a lawyer—a contract must have parties, a specific performance and a consideration. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt. I do not want debate across the Floor. Hon. Members should listen to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I was trying to describe what I understand to be the legal difference between a contract and an agreement. A contract must have parties, specific performance and, in particular, a consideration. The word "agreement" in this context will not have a consideration, so it cannot be legally binding. I disagree with the amendments because I do not think that they are necessary. However, if they are unnecessary, perhaps the Minister can answer some questions on matters that remain unclear, whether clause 100 is amended or not.

Does the Minister envisage the provision applying to each individual pupil? Will there be different agreements for each pupil? Each pupil's need is different. My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) made a point which may have been prompted by remarks that I made to him earlier, about whether home-school agreements will make any difference to the sort of pupil or parent who would not take any notice of such things. It is all very well getting people to sign an agreement, but if they have no intention of agreeing to its terms, it is completely useless.

We should have voluntary agreements. The Bill provides great detail of what the agreement should and should not contain, but it does not contain any sanctions with which to enforce the agreement. If there are no sanctions, what on earth is the use of prescribing precisely the contents of the agreement? It would be far better to make it voluntary in the first place.

I hope that the Minister will be able to clear up some of the issues that have been raised. In essence, home-school agreements are a thoroughly good idea. We all want the aims and objectives stated in clause 100(2)(a) to be clear. We all want the school's responsibility as stated in subsection (2)(b) to be clear. We all want the parental responsibilities stated in subsection (2)(c) to be clear. We all want the school's expectations of its pupils to be clear. The idea behind clause 100 is good.

Mr. Swayne: May I ask my hon. Friend the same question that I asked of my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes)? How does he envisage home-school agreements working? Will I as a parent negotiate an agreement specifically on behalf of my child with the head teacher, the form teacher or whomever? Or will it be negotiated between parents and the school collectively, in which case it will be not an agreement but a policy?

Mr. Clifton–Brown: My hon. Friend touches the heart of what I am asking the Minister to deal with in her reply to the debate on this group of amendments. Will there be different home-school agreements for each pupil? If there are, it seems to me that they will be negotiated between the school and each pupil. If it is the intention that there will be just one identical home-school agreement for all the pupils in the school, of course there will be no negotiation between the parents or the pupil and the school.

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend underestimates the paucity of the legislation. The debate is not just about one home-school agreement for the whole school but about the Secretary of State dictating the content and nature of agreements. Can my hon. Friend envisage the Secretary of State drawing up home-school agreements for every child in the country? Or will we have something bland and ineffective rather than something sensitive and particular to the needs of individual children?

Mr. Clifton–Brown: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. It would be nonsense if the Secretary of State prescribed from the centre one model home-school agreement. He might as well not bother, because it would be so bland and ineffective that it would have no import whatever. I notice that the Secretary of State has taken powers in the Bill to enable him to do just that. That would be a dangerous precedent.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset): He has woken up.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: I am glad to see that the Secretary of State has woken up. I did not realise that he had quite gone to sleep.

It has been made clear in the debate on whether there should be agreements or a policy, that there is all the difference in the world between the conditions, requirements and needs of my hon. Friend's schools in South Holland and The Deepings and my constituents' schools in the Cotswolds. Indeed, there is all the difference between those pupils and pupils 10 miles away in the middle of Cheltenham or Gloucester.

Mr. Willis: Mr. Deputy Speaker, much as some of us would also like to debate Welsh issues tomorrow, could we deal with the issue before us, which is the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster)? May I refer the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton–Brown) to clause 100(2), which clearly states that it is for each school to draw up its own home-school agreement in writing? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, because Ofsted inspects each school and the relationships between the school and parents, it is essential that we have a policy on that?

Mr. Clifton–Brown: When the hon. Gentleman was speaking, I was trying to find the part of clause 100 that gives powers to the Secretary of State to prescribe the nature and content of home-school agreements.

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend is right to say that the Secretary of State has those powers. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) fails to appreciate that my hon. Friend is pointing out the critical and implicit difference between a contract, a partnership and a policy, which lies at the heart of the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). The Government started off with a contract, we are now talking about an agreement, and the hon. Member for Bath is talking about a policy. Each is different, and my hon. Friend is drawing attention to that in an appropriate and entirely apposite way.

Mr. Clifton–Brown: I shall return to that important subject, but first I shall reply to the intervention of the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough, who raised the question whether the power applies to individual schools. Having had a chance to find the relevant clause, I refer him to clause 101(2), which states:

"If the Secretary of State by order so provides, the governing body of a school to which subsection (1) of that section applies shall ensure that any form of words . . . specified in the order, or . . . having such effect as is so specified"

[Mr. Clifton-Brown]

and continues:

"An order under subsection (2) may apply . . . to any school specified in the order, or . . . to any description of any school so specified."

Therefore, the Secretary of State can draw up home-school agreements for a specific school or for a wider section of schools if he or she so wishes.

The import of the amendments is to determine whether the clause establishes a binding agreement, a policy or merely an aspiration. That is the heart of the debate. To my mind, it should be a policy, and there should be nothing binding about the clause. If the agreement is binding, we shall start to see litigation, either of pupils or parents suing a school, or of a school suing a parent. That would be a dangerous and disadvantageous departure, which would negate the whole benefit of the clause.

I can see no reason why the school, having drawn up a prospectus as required, should not simply issue a statement of the school's aims and objectives and pupils' and parents' expectations. There could be one copy signed by the school, one by the parents and one by the pupil, so that everybody knows exactly what is expected of them. If the agreement is broken, under the clause, neither pupil, parent nor school can be sued—there are no sanctions. Why not have a simple statement of aims and objectives as I have described?

Mr. Letwin: I shall speak—briefly, at this hour—to amendment No. 125. It is a rare privilege to be able to subscribe whole-heartedly to what I take to be the import of a Liberal amendment.

Amendment No. 125 takes us to the heart of the problem with clause 100 and specifically with the adoption of home-school agreements. As I understand it, the intention of amendment No. 125 is to allow that which is adopted to be reviewed from time to time.

Let us cast our minds back to the period from which the British education system, especially our schools, is still recoiling—the 1960s. Had the Bill been law then, many schools in many parts of the country would have adopted as their "aims and values", to quote clause 100(2)(a), aims and values that would have been abhorrent to the present Secretary of State and to Labour and Conservative Members. Many schools at that time would have adopted elements of social engineering as part of their aims and values. In those circumstances, it would have been necessary for an amendment resembling amendment No. 125 to clock in.

2.15 am

As educational ideas changed—and, if I may say so, improved—it would have been necessary for schools to refine gradually the statements of aims and values contained in their home-school agreements, on a fluid basis. Had that not been possible, there would have been a perpetuation of the worst features of the educational theorising of the 1960s.

Amendment No. 125 therefore clarifies for us a danger latent in the notion of the agreements. There is every evidence from the statements made by the Secretary of State and other Ministers that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) pointed out, the assumption underlying clause 100 is that schools, under the guidance of the present benign—as the Secretary of State no doubt believes—influence of the Department for Education and Employment, will always produce as their statements of aims and values, and indeed in every other respect, an educational elixir that will benefit all the pupils in all circumstances.

However, that assumption is not well founded. We must expect that, very often, those agreements, signed by ordinary mortals—in many cases, alas, as one gathers from a reading of the Ofsted reports, ordinary mortals not entirely able to conduct their schools in the best possible fashion—will incorporate principles repugnant to many, perhaps all, hon. Members. It is therefore of the essence that there should be a correction mechanism.

Amendment No. 125 provides at least the possibility of correction. Alas, it does not contain something that might have gone further: not merely an ability for the school to correct by reviewing its agreements if it sees fit, but a necessity for the school to review its agreements in certain circumstances. If anything, the amendment is too weak to achieve its purpose.

Mr. Swayne: On that point, does my hon. Friend accept that the primary importance for the parent is not whether the school is able to reach agreement from time to time but whether the parent is able to do so? That is the key in respect of having an agreement. I find it exasperating, but I repeat: if that is not to be the case, it is not an agreement, merely a policy.

Mr. Letwin: As usual, my hon. Friend hits a point of the greatest possible significance. These, of course, are not agreements, and for that reason the emperor's clothes have been removed by the reference to policy. For that reason, the Government will object to many of the amendments that we are currently discussing.

Mr. Hayes: Is my hon. Friend suggesting that an agreement necessarily implies obligation—or can an agreement be less formal than that?

Mr. Letwin: As my hon. Friend is not tired of pointing out in these discussions, this is not an agreement. An agreement would imply something mutual—something that is, to some degree at least, morally enforceable. What we have in the Bill is in practice a policy but, alas, without amendment No. 125, that policy is stuck in stone.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is using the term "morally enforceable". Will he explain how the agreement is actually enforceable?

Mr. Letwin: My right hon. Friend poses a problem that I am unable to solve, because clause 100(6) makes it clear that the agreements are not enforceable, although in a sense they might be morally enforceable. It must be the hope of the Secretary of State that, by signing the document, parents will somehow implicate themselves in the policy, and having implicated themselves will feel a moral obligation to fulfil their part of what he would describe as the bargain. The problem is that it is not a bargain, and parents have not had a choice in whether to implicate themselves. As a consequence, they cannot have morally implicated themselves and so cannot be said to have a moral obligation in any sense.

I leave aside that slight lacuna in what is actually a policy and revert to the main substance of my point.

Mr. St. Aubyn: My hon. Friend may not have had a chance, at such a late hour, to read the notes on clauses, but they help to clarify the fact that there is no legal power behind the clause. They draw a helpful parallel with section 13 of the Education Act 1997—which these clauses repeal—which would allow a home-school agreement to be used as part of a school's admission process. Therefore, a child could be refused admission if his parents refused to sign the agreement.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. In fact, I did have a brief opportunity to look at the notes on clauses, but not in the detail that he was able to do during the Committee proceedings.

We should inspect in more detail the proposition that the agreement will stipulate a school's aims and values, bearing in mind that, without amendment No. 125, that would be locked in stone. It would be a useful thought experiment for the House to think ourselves into how this would have operated in the 1960s and ask ourselves how schools using a policy—misnamed an agreement—enshrining a set of aims and values repugnant to this House would have approached the question of admissions or, indeed, expulsions, to take the two ends of the possible life history of a more unfortunate pupil. Surely we all agree that enshrined here are not just wild and woolly policies, but policies that might affect the conduct of a school and its relationship with its pupils on a day-to-day basis.

I remind the House that there were individuals—Professor Ted Wragg springs to mind—who leaped to the fore in the 1960s with wide-ranging descriptions of aims and values that might have been appropriate for schools. Who knows, perhaps 20 years from now—heaven forfend—there may be the successors of Professor Wragg.

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way to me for a second time. Surely his thesis presupposes that parents would have voluntarily entered into those agreements or, if my hon. Friend likes, policies—I prefer agreements. Surely he concedes that those misguided policies of the 1960s were not born of the will of the vast majority of ordinary hard-working, decent patriots, but of the liberal bourgeoisie who were the architects of the policies and imposed them upon the ordinary citizens of this country.

Mr. Letwin: My hon. Friend is right to say that we were dealing at that time with the utmost treachery—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman is moving rather far away from the amendments. I should be grateful if he would come back to them precisely.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful for that admonition, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was distracted by my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) into territory that I should not have strayed into.

Mr. St. Aubyn: In fact, that territory does touch on an important point. Earlier in the debate, my hon. Friend spoke learnedly on the question of human rights and whether a previous clause might constitute a breach of human rights—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Letwin: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall not be tempted to stray into that territory.

If we imagine how it would be if the clause without amendment No. 125 came into force, and if some future successor of Professor Wragg incorporated into teacher training or the general jargon of the education establishment views similar to those that he held 10 or 15 years ago and which were at that time the orthodoxy, and if those were locked in—here I refer to a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings that is directly germane—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman cannot address himself directly to the amendments, I shall have to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Letwin: The point is directly germane to amendment No. 125, because we are dealing not with agreements, but with policies. In the absence of amendment No. 125, those policies may be locked in stone with no possibility of being revised, even though they may be repugnant to the parents who were artificially made to sign up to them.

I cannot imagine that it was the Secretary of State's intention to provide for the policies to be locked in stone. I hope that he will tell us, or that the Minister will tell us when he sums up this section of the debate, that the intent of amendment No. 125 always lay in the Government's mind—that it was the intent not merely that a policy or agreement should be adopted, but that there should be constant revision, as thoughts about education develop over time.

That is the only rational interpretation of the intent. However, the Liberal Democrat amendment clearly reveals that there is no such provision in the Bill. That is a remarkable omission. It must be a drafting omission. If so, we shall discover that when the Minister, in his summing up, accepts the amendment. If I am mistaken in my interpretation, it must be the Government's intention—which seems bizarre, but it would have to be the interpretation that the House placed on it—to insist that the terms of the so-called agreements that are actually policies, which have the appearance of being voluntary but are not, are those that the Government intend for education for eternity, or until Parliament changes its mind and enacts an amendment.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend makes a good point in relation to amendment No. 125. With his extensive knowledge, he will recognise that ideas on education change radically, even over a period of five years, so unless the agreements were constantly updated, they would become otiose.

Mr. Letwin: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. These are fast-moving matters—perhaps too fast moving. Some stability is to be hoped for. One would hope that, having adopted certain aims and values, a school would pursue them for a reasonable period. Nobody, not even the Secretary of State, could hope that his present vision of what should be the aims and values of schools is the guide for all time. It would be a remarkable statement if the Minister rejected amendment No. 125.

[Mr. Letwin]

Mr. St. Aubyn: I invite my hon. Friend to consider the import of all this in respect of the human rights of the parents, who might be affected by a refusal to review the policy.

Mr. Letwin: Much as I would like to answer that acute point, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall not be tempted to stray, because of your earlier admonition.

It would be remarkable if the Government maintained that their current views of what should be in such an agreement constituted the inalienable truth—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has said the same thing several times. I must ask him to resume his seat. I call Ms Estelle Morris.

Ms Estelle Morris: I should say that amendment No. 125 was at least an effort to make a positive contribution to an essential debate. In moving it, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) expressed a point of view that he and his colleagues have long held. Although we differ on that point of view, we share the belief that we have to do more to help parents to support their children.

I cannot say that the same attitude was expressed in many of the comments of Conservative Members. The sadness of that is that—as much as they filibuster and make comments that are not conducive to serious debate—we are debating the serious issue of helping parents to support their children. For too long, we have not taken action to address that important issue.

Schools can do much for children. Good schools and good teachers are essential if children are to get a good education, but we know now—all the evidence shows us—that, if a child is really to do well, they will need support also from home.

2.30 am

The Government disagree with Conservative Members who have talked in somewhat disparaging terms about parents who may not know how to help their child, or who cannot cope with that need, who turn their backs on it and who may not want to help their child. We believe that it is so important that parents support and help their children at school that we must make every effort to ensure that they can do so.

Parents have rights—some of our debates today have been on those rights—but they also have responsibilities for their child's education. A home-school agreement is, first, about stating those rights and responsibilities so that parents know where they stand. I think that parents will welcome that knowledge.

Some of the parents to whom Conservative Members have so disparagingly referred do not know what they can do to help their child, but they want to help. They want their children to do well, just as middle-class parents want—and know how to help—their children to do well. They have aspirations and ambitions for their children and want their children to do better in school than they did themselves. Sometimes they do not know how to go about realising those ambitions. One of the advantages of a home-school agreement is that it will clearly state how parents can help their child to succeed. If they do not have an agreement, that opportunity will be lost.

Secondly, a home-school agreement is about expectations and about saying to parents, "You have rights. Society expects you to exercise those rights and to fulfil your responsibilities to your children who are in school." That is the key reason for making such agreements compulsory. For every parent, the agreement will state how they can support teachers in helping their child.

As a society and as communities, we are beginning to have high expectations of parents. For too long we have heard the type of moaning that we heard today from Conservative Members: that we cannot expect some parents to deliver the goods in supporting their children. In the interests of supporting their children, we can and we must have such expectations. The Bill's provision for home-school agreements is an attempt to establish in law the expectation that we rightly have of parents to fulfil their responsibilities to their children.

Some schools already have home-school agreements. The impact that those agreements have had on the children and communities involved shows that achieving those objectives is possible. Not only middle-class schools have home-school agreements; some schools in the toughest and most difficult areas have them. Those schools have begun to recreate a learning culture among parents in their communities. That must be our objective. It is sad that not all schools have chosen to attempt to recreate that culture.

We are clearly stating in the Bill that, in our efforts to value education and to acknowledge the essential partners in a child's learning, we will establish an expectation that parents have both rights and responsibilities. We will also explain how they can help to fulfil their responsibilities for their child.

It is quite clear in the Bill that we do not want to have to take criminal or other legal action or to disrupt a child's education because a parent will not sign an agreement. The agreements are about an expectation and about creating a situation in which parents know that they are doing something on behalf of their child.

There is much in the Bill that will serve to raise standards for every child. If we are serious about that, we must also tackle the role that parents can play. There is an honest difference of opinion between us, but the matter is so important that it cannot be left to chance. Our proposals are set out in clauses 100 and 101. As soon as the Bill is enacted, we intend to ensure that the education service sets out rights and responsibilities for all the essential educators, in the interests of the child. They are important clauses dealing with the responsibilities and rights of parents and teachers; they work in the interests of children and they will raise standards. I ask the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Don Foster: As the Minister said, there is an honest difference of opinion between the Liberal Democrats and the Government on this issue, but it is an honest disagreement about how we achieve something that we both regard as vital. I entirely agree with her about the unhelpful contributions made by Conservative Members—

Mr. St. Aubyn rose—

Mr. Foster: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. One of the reasons I will not give way is that during one of the hon. Gentleman's numerous interventions my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) asked what he would suggest, given that he was so critical of the Liberal Democrats' and the Government's proposals, but the hon. Gentleman had no answer.

Mr. St. Aubyn rose—

Mr. Foster: I have made it absolutely clear that I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. St. Aubyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As I am a new Member, will you explain to me whether it is in order for one hon. Member to attack another but not give him the right to reply?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is not so new any more, and knows the rules of debate.

Mr. Foster: I am grateful for your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) is not so naive that he was not able to intervene, I think, 14 times on other hon. Members.

Home-school arrangements are vital, whether they are called contracts, agreements or policies. The relationship between home and school is very important. Research into what raises standards in schools shows that the quality of the head teacher nearly always comes first, but high on the list is the relationship between home and school.

The Liberal Democrats believe that the most important aspect of the relationship between home and school is the building of that relationship rather than the product, or the simple piece of paper itself. The Government are concentrating predominantly on the piece of paper, which has to be signed so early that there will be no real opportunity for the signatories to it to have time to be involved in its development and to feel ownership of it. However, as the Minister said, that is an honest disagreement between us. As I hope that there will be opportunities to work constructively with the Government on developing their thinking, and perhaps ours, on the issue as the Bill continues its passage through Parliament, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Blunkett: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not wish to delay the House, but I wonder whether there has been a breach of privilege by The Independent. In what is now today's edition, the newspaper reports a debate on corporal punishment in independent schools, which has not yet taken place. It quotes extensively the hon. Members for Bath (Mr. Foster) and for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) who have not yet made their contributions. I pass the newspaper to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and would be grateful if, during the debate on the next group of amendments, you might consider whether it and the hon. Gentlemen have breached the privilege of this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the right hon. Gentleman wants to raise the question of a breach of privilege, the normal procedure is to write to Madam Speaker. I suggest that he do that.

Mr. Don Foster: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that I have dealt with the matter adequately.

Schedule 2

ALLOCATION OF EXISTING SCHOOLS TO NEW CATEGORIES

Amendment made: No. 3, in page 102, leave out lines 20 and 21.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 3

FUNDING OF FOUNDATION, VOLUNTARY AND FOUNDATION SPECIAL SCHOOLS

Mr. Byers: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 103, line 4, leave out 'new'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 33 to 38, 52, 53, 39 to 41, 43, 29, 44 to 46, 30, 54 and 55.

Mr. Byers: This may appear to be a considerable body of Government amendments, but they are technical. I commend them to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 33, in page 103, line 31, at end insert—

'and for the purposes of any agreed determination under sub-paragraph (6) regard shall be had to any guidance given from time to time by the Secretary of State.'.

No. 34, in page 103, line 36, leave out

'The Secretary of State shall not make a determination'

and insert

'A determination may be made'.

No. 35, in page 103, line 38, leave out 'unless' and insert 'if (and only if)—

(a) the determination is made by the Secretary of State, and

(b)''.

No. 36, in page 106, line 16, leave out 'maintained' and insert 'appropriate'.

No. 37, in page 106, line 29, leave out 'is the greater' and insert

'the Secretary of State determines to be just'.

No. 38, in page 106, line 40, at end insert—

' "appropriate schools"—

(i) in relation to a voluntary aided school having a religious character, means schools which are either foundation or voluntary schools and whose specified religion or religious denomination under section 65(4) is the same as that school's, and

(ii) in relation to any other voluntary aided school, means maintained schools.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 4

SCHOOL ORGANISATION COMMITTEES

2.45 am

Ms Estelle Morris: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 109, leave out lines 40 to 46 and insert—

'3.—(1) For the purpose of the payment of financial loss allowance under section 173(4) of the Local Government Act 1972, that provision shall apply, with any necessary modifications, to any member of a committee as it applies to any member of a parish or community council; and a committee shall be included in the bodies to which section 174 of that Act (travelling and subsistence allowances) applies.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 26 and 27.

Ms Morris: These, too, are technical amendments. They are intended to ensure that the admission exclusion appeal panels of school organisation committees fall within the scope of section 173 of the Local Government Act 1972.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 6

STATUTORY PROPOSALS: PROCEDURE AND IMPLEMENTATION

Amendments made: No. 52, in page 118, leave out lines 26 to 31 and insert—

'(a) in the case of proposals published under section 27(2) so far as relating to the provision of any relevant premises for the school, by the local education authority;

(b) in the case of proposals published under section 28(2), by the governing body and the authority; and

(c) otherwise by the governing body.'.

No. 53, in page 118, leave out lines 34 to 36 and insert—

'(a) so far as relating to the provision of any relevant premises for the school (but subject to sub–paragraph (5)), by the local education authority; and

(b) otherwise by the promoters.'.

No. 39, in page 120, line 7, at end insert—

'and for the purposes of any agreed determination under sub–paragraph (5) regard shall be had to any guidance given from time to time by the Secretary of State.'.

No. 40, in page 120, line 12, leave out

'The Secretary of State shall not make a determination'

and insert

'A determination may be made'.

No. 41, in page 120, line 14, leave out 'unless' and insert 'if (and only if)—

(a) the determination is made by the Secretary of State, and

(b)''. —[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 8

CHANGES OF CATEGORY OF SCHOOL

Mr. Byers: I beg to move amendment No. 42, in page 131, line 9, at end insert—

'(aa) where a foundation is proposed to be established for the school otherwise than under this Act, that the foundation would meet such requirements as may be so specified;'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 12 and 13.

Mr. Byers: These, too, are technical amendments, intended to tidy up the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 12, in page 131, line 20, leave out

'approved under regulations under this Schedule'

and insert 'published under paragraph 2'.

No. 13, in page 131, leave out lines 27 to 30 and insert—

'(2) Regulations under sub–paragraph (1) may, in connection with any matters falling within that sub–paragraph—

(a) modify any provision made by or under this Part of this Act;

(b) apply any such provision with or without modifications;

(c) make provision corresponding or similar to any such provision.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Mr. Clifton–Brown: I want to speak to amendment No. 13.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman cannot do so. All the amendments in the group have already been discussed.

Schedule 10

INCORPORATION OF GOVERNING BODIES

Amendments made: No. 14, in page 138, line 8, after first 'school', insert

'(other than a grouped school)'.

No. 15, in page 138, line 12, leave out from 'day' to 'conform' in line 14 and insert

'the governing body shall (subject to regulations under sub–paragraph (4))'.

No. 16, in page 138, line 16, after 'shall' insert

'(subject to regulations under sub–paragraph (4))'.

No. 17, in page 138, line 17, leave out

'end of such period as may be prescribed'

and insert

'appointed day; and regulations may make such provision as the Secretary of State considers necessary or expedient in connection with the reconstitution of a governing body in pursuance of this sub–paragraph.'.

No. 18, in page 138, leave out lines 18 to 24 and insert—

'(4) Regulations may, in relation to cases where—

(a) the instrument of government required by paragraph 6 of Schedule 12 in the case of an existing school within sub–paragraph (2) above is not made by the appointed day, or

(b) the governing body of such a school are not reconstituted by that day, make such provision as the Secretary of State considers necessary or expedient in connection with any of the following matters, namely—

(i) the making of such instruments of government on or after that day,

(ii) the reconstitution of governing bodies on or after that day, and

(iii) the constitution of such bodies on and after that day pending their reconstitution at some later date.

(5) Regulations may, in relation to existing schools which are grouped schools, make such provision as the Secretary of State considers necessary or expedient in connection with the transition of such schools from being grouped under a single governing body to having their own governing bodies constituted under instruments of government made in accordance with Schedule 12.

(5A) If the instrument of government required by paragraph 6 of Schedule 12 is not made before the appointed day in the case of an existing school, the following requirements, namely—

(a) the requirements of paragraph 2(1) below as to the name of the governing body, and

(b) the requirements of section 36(3) as to the name of the school, shall not apply until such time as that instrument of government is made.'.

No. 19, in page 138, line 25, after 'means' insert '(subject to sub–paragraph (7))'.

No. 20, in page 138, line 29, at end insert

'; and "grouped school" means a school grouped under section 89 or 280 of the Education Act 1996.'.

No. 21, in page 138, line 29, at end insert—

'(7) A school is not an existing school for the purposes of this paragraph if immediately before the appointed day—

(a) in the case of a school within paragraph (a) of sub–paragraph (6), it has a temporary governing body, or

(b) in the case of a school within paragraph (b) of that sub–paragraph, it has a governing body but it has not yet opened;

and for this purpose a school "opens" on the date when it first admits pupils.

(8) Regulations may make such provision as the Secretary of State considers necessary or expedient in connection with the transition of—

(a) any such school as is mentioned in sub–paragraph (7)(a) or (b), or

(b) any proposed school which would be a school within sub–paragraph (6)(a) and which has, or is required to have, a temporary governing body, to a school with a governing body constituted under an instrument of government made in accordance with Schedule 12.'.

No. 22, in page 138, line 29, at end insert—

'(9) Regulations under any provision of this paragraph may, in connection with any matters falling within that provision—

(a) modify any provision made by or under this Part of this Act;

(b) apply any such provision with or without modifications;

(c) make provision corresponding or similar to any such provision;

(d) provide for the continued application of any provision of Part II or III of the Education Act 1996 with or without modifications.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 11

MEMBERSHIP AND PROCEEDINGS ETC. OF GOVERNING BODIES

Amendments made: No. 66, in page 141, line 4, at end insert—

'(4) The regulations may authorise or require governing bodies to make provision with respect to any matters relating to their meetings or proceedings (including any of the matters mentioned in sub–paragraph (2)).

(5) Subject to the regulations, a governing body may regulate their own procedure and that of any of their committees.'

No. 67, in page 141, line 21, at end insert

', and the payment of allowances to a governor at any such time shall instead be in accordance with a scheme made by the local education authority for the purposes of section 519 of the Education Act 1996.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 12

INSTRUMENTS OF GOVERNMENT

Amendments made: No. 11, in page 143, line 2, leave out from 'section' to 'modifications' in line 3 and insert

'(Arrangements for government of new schools) for a new maintained school,'.

No. 23, in page 145, line 24, after 'be' insert ', or is,'.

No. 24, in page 145, line 28, at end insert

', including provision modifying any provision of this Schedule or Schedule 9'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 16

STAFFING OF COMMUNITY, VOLUNTARY CONTROLLED AND COMMUNITY SPECIAL SCHOOLS

Ms Estelle Morris: I beg to move amendment No. 68, in page 155, line 41, after 'and', insert

', where the post is that of head teacher,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 69.

Ms Morris: The amendments seek to correct an error in the original drafting and limit to head teacher posts the local authority's entitlement to make representations to the governing body's selection panel.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 17

STAFFING OF FOUNDATION, VOLUNTARY AIDED AND FOUNDATION SPECIAL SCHOOLS

Amendment made: No. 69, in page 163, line 42, after 'and', insert

', where the post is that of head teacher,'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 18

APPEALS AGAINST EXCLUSION OF PUPILS

Amendment made: No. 26, in page 170, leave out lines 5 to 11 and insert—

'3.—(1) For the purpose of the payment of financial loss allowance under section 173(4) of the Local Government Act 1972, that provision shall apply, with any necessary modifications, to any member of an appeal panel constituted in accordance with paragraph 2 as it applies to any member of a parish or community council; and such an appeal panel shall be included in the bodies to which section 174 of that Act (travelling and subsistence allowances) applies.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 22

FOUNDATION, VOLUNTARY AND FOUNDATION SPECIAL SCHOOLS: DISPOSAL OF LAND AND DISCONTINUANCE

Amendments made: No. 43, in page 180, leave out lines 42 and 43.

No. 29, in page 181, line 11, leave out 'within the meaning of' and insert 'as defined by'.

No. 44, in page 181, line 12, at end insert—

'(1A) If a voluntary aided school was, immediately before the appointed day, a controlled school within the meaning of the Education Act 1996, this paragraph also applies to any disposal by the trustees of the school of any land acquired, or enhanced in value, wholly or partly by means of expenditure incurred under section 63 or 64 of that Act.'.

No. 45, in page 181, line 13, leave out

'(b), (c) or (d) of sub–paragraph (1)'

and insert

'(c) or (d) of sub–paragraph (1) or sub–paragraph (1A)'.

No. 46, in page 181, line 14, leave out 'paragraph' and insert 'provision'.

No. 30, in page 181, line 36, leave out 'within the meaning of' and insert 'as defined by'.

No. 54, in page 181, line 40, leave out

'hold the proceeds of disposal on trust'

and insert

'use the proceeds of disposal'.

No. 103, in page 182, line 4, at end insert—

'(10) Where the trustees of a foundation, voluntary or foundation special school wish, in the case of any land held by them for the purposes of the school, to use the land for purposes not connected with the provision of education in maintained schools—

(a) the preceding provisions of this paragraph shall apply as if any such change of use of the land were a disposal of the land; and

(b) the value of the land as at the date of any determination under sub–paragraph (2) or of any direction under sub–paragraph (7) shall be treated as proceeds of the disposal of the land.'.

No. 104, in page 183, line 27, leave out '29' and insert '29(1)'.

No. 105, in page 183, line 28, leave out 'on' and insert 'in relation to'.

No. 106, in page 183, line 30, leave out 'on'.

No. 107, in page 183, leave out line 39 and insert 'public expense'.

No. 108, in page 183, line 44, leave out from 'at' to end of line 45 and insert 'public expense'.

No. 109, in page 183, line 45, at end insert—

'(2A) In sub–paragraph (2) "at public expense" means at the expense of—

(a) the Funding Agency for Schools, or

(b) any local education authority or an authority within section 29(2)(c).'.

No. 110, in page 184, line 2, leave out

'the use of land as'

and insert

'any such change of use of the land as is'.

No. 55, in page 184, line 25, leave out 'them' and insert 'the governing body'.

No. 111, in page 184, line 32, at end insert—

'Notice by trustees terminating foundation or voluntary school's occupation of existing site

7A.—(1) This paragraph applies where trustees have given a notice falling within section 29(11) which is effective to terminate a foundation or voluntary school's occupation of any land ("the relevant premises").

(2) If any expenditure has been incurred on the relevant premises as mentioned in section 29(2)(a) to (c), the Secretary of State may impose any requirements that he thinks just—

(a) in respect of the repayment by the trustees of all or part of any such expenditure which was incurred by him;

(b) in respect of the transfer by the trustees to the local education authority of the whole or part of the relevant premises where he is satisfied the authority will need them for any purpose connected with education;

(c) (to the extent that the relevant premises are to be so transferred) in respect of the payment by the authority to the trustees of so much of the value of those premises as is just having regard to the extent to which the premises were provided otherwise than at public expense;

(d) (to the extent that the relevant premises are not to be so transferred) in respect of the payment by the trustees to the authority of so much of the value of those premises as is just having regard to the extent to which they were provided at public expense.

(3) In sub–paragraph (2) "at public expense" means at the expense of—

(a) the Funding Agency for Schools, or

(b) any local education authority or an authority within section 29(2)(c).'.

No. 77, in page 184, line 38, leave out from '"disposal" to end of line 39 and insert 'includes a compulsory disposal;'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 24

ADMISSION APPEALS

Amendment made: No. 27, in page 192, leave out lines 40 to 47 and insert—

'4.—(1) For the purpose of the payment of financial loss allowance under section 173(4) of the Local Government Act 1972, that provision shall apply, with any necessary modifications, to any member of an appeal panel constituted in accordance with paragraph 1 or 2 (or in accordance with paragraph 2 as it applies by virtue of paragraph 3) as it applies to any member of a parish or community council; and such an appeal panel shall be included in the bodies to which section 174 of that Act (travelling and subsistence allowances) applies.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

New clause 5

PARTNERSHIP SCHEMES

'.—(1) In discharging its obligations under Section 78(1) of this Act a Local Education Authority shall ensure that parents of children in the area of the authority are able to express their preferences without regard to whether a school is a maintained school or an independent school.

(2) If, under Clause 78(1)(a), a parent expresses a preference for their child to attend an independent school, and the headteacher of the independent school expresses a willingness to accept the child as a pupil at the school, the local education authority may introduce a scheme of support (to be known for the purposes of this section as a partnership scheme) to allow the fees or expenses which are payable in respect of the child's attendance at the school to be met in whole or in part from the funds available to the local education authority, provided that the condition set out in sub–section (3) of this section is satisfied.

(3) In the exercise of the power conferred on a local education authority under this section, the authority shall ensure that the public funds which are committed to support a partnership scheme are fair, having regard to the factors or criteria which that local authority takes into account when determining school budget share of maintained schools under section 45 of this Act.'.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

2.45 am

Mr. Dorrell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 6—Assisted places scheme—

'.—Notwithstanding the provisions of the Education (Schools) Act 1997 any pupil who was attending a former participating school (within the meaning of that Act) on May 1st 1997 and in respect of whom the fees or charges of the school were being met in whole or in part from public funds under the terms of the assisted places scheme shall be entitled to continue support until the end of their education.'.

New clause 9—Charitable provision—

'.—(1) Nothing in this Act shall prevent a charity from re-imbursing either

(a) a primary or secondary non-maintained school; or

(b) a local education authority

in respect of the fees or related charges or expenses of any pupil resident in the area of that local authority whom the authority determines may benefit from education at that school (whether inside or outside their area)

(2) Expenditure by a charity in making a reimbursement under subsection (1) above shall be charitable expenditure, within the meaning of section 44 of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993.'.

New clause 10—Partnership provision—

'.—(1) Nothing in this Act shall prevent a local authority from reimbursing any primary or secondary non-maintained school (whether inside or outside their area) in respect of the fees of any pupil resident in the area of that local authority whom the authority determines may benefit from education at that school.

(2) The fees of any pupil reimbursed under subsection (1) may be reasonable fees in respect of—

(a) courses of academic study in a specific subject or a range of subjects; or

(b) courses in music, drama, ballet; or

(c) games including football, cricket, tennis, swimming, athletics

attended by such pupil's selected by reference to his or her particular aptitude and ability.

(3) The parents of any pupil benefiting from payments under this section shall be free to choose either at their own expense or with the aid of charitable reimbursement as provided in section (Charitable provision) to maintain such pupil's at such primary or secondary non-maintained schools for the balance of such pupil's education if the parents believe it is the best interests of such pupils to do so having regard to the continuity of his or her study and the consistency of his or her environment.

(4) No local education authority shall be under any obligation to make any payment in respect of any individual pupil under this section and an authority shall be entitled to restrict such payments by reference to household income (or such other measure of parental means that is deemed appropriate) as well as by reference to the ability and aptitude of a pupil.

(5) This section shall not apply to any pupil with special educational needs, as defined in section 312 of the Education Act 1996.

(6) Assistance under the terms of the section shall be known as Partnership Provision.'.

Amendment No. 92, in clause 118, page 87, line 24, leave out 'Subject to subsection (2)'.

Amendment No. 94, in page 87, line 24, after '(2)' insert

'in respect of any pupil with Special Educational Needs as defined in section 312 of the Education Act 1996'.

Amendment No. 93, in page 87, leave out from beginning of line 30 to end of line 10 on page 88.

Amendment No. 95, in page 87, line 36, after 'pupil', insert 'with Special Educational Needs'.

Amendment No. 96, in page 87, line 37, after 'prescribed', insert

'in respect of any pupil with Special Educational Needs'.

Amendment No. 97, in page 87, line 38, after 'Regulations', insert

'in respect of any pupil with Special Educational Needs'.

Government amendments Nos. 83 and 84.

Mr. Dorrell: If Ministers and I agree nothing else about the amendments, I suspect that we will agree that they are the very opposite of technical. The group dealing with partnership schemes concerns a major issue of principle between the Conservative party and the Government and their supporters.

The amendments bring together a number of different aspects of the issue and pose a choice. They bring together, first, the scope of the choice that should be open to parents in making a choice about the school in which their child will be educated; secondly, the scope of the Government's commitments in advance of the general election on the operation of the assisted places scheme and to children who took places on that scheme; and thirdly, the scope of discretion that should be open to a local education authority to offer support to children benefiting from education in an independent school.

Underlying all that is a key question of principle: whether the Government favour, as they say they do, an inclusive vision of education that holds out to every child from whatever background the prospect of a choice between independent and maintained-school education, or whether they intend to continue with the policy, which has motivated their actions since 1 May, of a sharp, indeed enhanced, division between the independent sector and the maintained sector—the further development of a state of affairs that has been described by George Walden as one country, two systems.

George Walden's book, which analyses what is good and bad about Britain's schools system, emphasises the damage that is done to the provision of schools education by the continued deep divide between the independent system, to which, in the Government's vision, a family can aspire only if they can afford to pay the fees, and the maintained system.

The new clauses and amendments seek to challenge the Government's view that the two systems should be kept entirely separate, and offer a variety of ways in which the Government's inclusive rhetoric can be turned into reality for families to whom the Secretary of State is effectively saying in the policies that he has espoused since coming to office, "I, the Secretary of State, am in favour of inclusion, but not in favour of including you in the choice that is available to other families in Britain." We on the Conservative Benches are clear. We are in favour of all families having choice; we are in favour of variety; and we are in favour of a system of support in education that gives real effect to the Government's rhetoric about inclusiveness.

[Mr. Dorrell]

That is why we have tabled new clause 5, which would require a local authority, when collecting the preferences of parents on the school that they want their children to go to—a process that is rightly foreshadowed in clause 78—to allow parents to express a preference not only for a maintained school, but for an independent school in the area. If a parent expressed a preference for an independent school and the head teacher of that school was prepared to accept the child on the basis of a use of funds that was fair in the context of the rest of the funding of maintained education in that local education authority, the LEA should have the power to support that child's education in that independent school. That is an important principle. I deeply regret the Government's approach to the assisted places scheme, which flew in the opposite direction. The new clause would give real effect to the ambition, which the Secretary of State is fond of quoting, of providing inclusive educational prospects for all children.

The argument used against the assisted places scheme—that it is an unfair allocation of resources—is not open to the Secretary of State in response to the new clause, because the new clause would explicitly empower the LEA to provide support to a child's education following the expression of parental preference if the use of resources was fair in the context of other resource decisions in the area. I have discussed that principle with representatives of independent schools. Not every independent school would offer places on that basis, but there is a good prospect that some would wish to do so. The argument that the Government like to use against the assisted places scheme is not available to them in response to new clause 5. It is a challenge to the Government to make real their rhetoric about inclusiveness.

If the Government do not respond to that challenge, we shall see the true substance of the rhetoric that the Minister for School Standards—who has absented himself from the Chamber—is fond of using about the importance of a partnership between public and private sector. He likes going to assemblies of independent schools and holding out the prospect of improved co-operation between the public and private sector. He has even attached £500,000 to improving that co-operation.

The new clause will flush out the Secretary of State. Does the partnership that he envisages involve simply the crumbs that fall from the table of those who can afford to pay the fees for independent schools, or is he prepared to offer children of parents who cannot afford the fees the real choice that is available under his proposals only to those who can afford the fees?

Perhaps the Secretary of State agrees with Mr. Doug McAvoy, who clearly thinks that only education provided in a maintained school should be supported from taxpayers' funds. I do not understand the logic of that. Suppose that taxpayers' funds are available to provide the best possible education for a child and the parents choose to have that child educated at an independent school, which is prepared to accept the child. Provided that the resource consequences are fair in the context of the decisions of the LEA, on what basis do the Government reject the principle of new clause 5? That is the first important principle that arises from this group of new clauses and amendments.

The second important principle relates to new clause 6, which deals with the argument whether children who were accepted on to the assisted places scheme before its abolition should be able to look forward to the planned completion of the course of education for which they were accepted.

The House will know that the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, who was the Labour party spokesman on school standards before the election, wrote at that time to many parents making it clear that any child accepted for an assisted place at a school that offered education up to the age of 13 could expect to be able to complete that education.

We failed to persuade the Secretary of State to accept the principle in the Kilfoyle letter and write it into the Act that abolished assisted places, so we now seek to bring him back to the issue. He said at the time, "Trust me; trust our discretion," but then refused, even on the basis of his discretion, to give the firm assurance that any child accepted for an assisted place at a school which in the normal course of events would offer education to the age of 13 would be able to complete his or her education in that school.

That commitment was given repeatedly and officially on behalf of the Labour party before the general election. Now the Secretary of State should at last recognise that it is an election pledge which, as the law stands, the Government have already broken.

Amendments Nos. 92 and 93 address the effect of clause 118 as it emerged from the Standing Committee. That clause was a late addition to the Bill; I believe that it was added to the Bill at the Committee's last sitting. It was prompted by an attack by Mr. Doug McAvoy of the National Union of Teachers on a scheme being promoted by Surrey county council, which planned to offer an arrangement similar to the one I described when I was talking about new clause 5.

Surrey made it clear that it wanted to offer to children from every background a real choice, including the choice of an independent education. Doug McAvoy opposed the idea because he said that it would take funds away from the maintained sector and allocate them to the independent sector.

Mr. McAvoy seemed unaware that the funds under the Surrey county council scheme would have been used to support the education of Surrey residents, exactly as they would have been if they had been spent in maintained schools. He did not seem to know, either, that the council had made it clear that its scheme, like new clause 5, was designed to offer nothing more than support similar to that available for the education of children within the maintained school system.

The effect of clause 118 as drafted is to give the Secretary of State the power to declare that scheme illegal. However, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept new clause 5, which would write in the principles of the Surrey scheme and make it a national arrangement. Because I believe in inclusive education, I think that it would be a good scheme to introduce in county council areas in general.

If the Secretary of State is not willing to do that, I hope that he will at least accept amendments Nos. 92 and 93, the effect of which would be to remove the threat to the Surrey county council scheme. He could do that on the basis that discretion should be left to LEAs. We have heard a great deal about the importance of LEAs in the Government's, and the Secretary of State's, vision. I hope that he will believe his own rhetoric about LEAs, local discretion and local decision-making and allow Surrey county council to follow up its own choice.

This is a key group of amendments. We favour partnership schemes, designed to break down the divisions between the maintained and independent sectors. That is why we tabled new clause 5. As a second choice, we believe that the Government should accept the amendments we have tabled to clause 118 to allow the Surrey county council scheme to go ahead. Most important of all, we believe that the Government should be held to the election pledge made, on behalf of the Labour party, in the Kilfoyle letter.

I challenge the Secretary of State to accept the new clause and the amendments, because they are consistent with his words. If he does not accept them, we can only conclude that his rhetoric should be disbelieved and that we should look only at his actions, which, in important respects, are at variance with his words.

3 am

Mr. Brady: I support my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), and I wish to refer to a specific local example which sheds light on these matters. St. Bede's college in Manchester is an independent Catholic grammar school, and Trafford borough council—and Cheshire county council before it—have, since the second world war, funded the provision of places for local Catholic children in the borough of Trafford at St. Bede's.

It throws light on the attitude of the Labour party and the Government that, now that Trafford borough council is Labour-controlled—for the first time in its history—it has decided to end that provision, in spite of the fact that the circumstances which my right hon. Friend described appertain exactly; the school has offered places to the local authority at exactly the same cost as the places in maintained schools. There is no financial benefit to the local authority from scrapping the scheme. It is simply an ideological attack on the principle of selective and independent schools, and shows a negative attitude to partnership.

The provision of places at St. Bede's is actually cheaper for the local authority, because there are no capital costs for the local authority—unlike at maintained schools. I am keen to support new clause 5 and the amendments, because the other parties—and I am pleased to say, in this instance, that that includes the Liberal Democrats in Trafford—are supporting partnership and choice, and opposing the Labour party's regressive thinking on this matter.

The Conservative and Liberal parties have pledged to restore the scheme when they take control of Trafford borough council. I am concerned that clause 118 could be used to prevent that, and I seek an assurance that that will not be the case. I strongly urge the House to support the new clause, to prevent any attempt to stop the reintroduction of that scheme if the local population vote for it.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I, too, support new clauses 5 and 6. I also want to speak to new clauses 9 and 10, which I tabled. We are talking about serious issues of trust. Ministers should be on the Front Bench to answer questions about what they said, day in and day out, in Committee. The moment they knew that they would be asked to explain their comments—which are recorded in Hansard—they ran away.

Mr. Blunkett: I shall not detain the House, but I want it put on the record that my ministerial colleagues, having been on the Front Bench almost continuously for the past 11 hours, deserve a break to get a cup of tea and relieve themselves. The silly nonsense that we hear from Conservative Members illustrates the utter contempt in which they hold standards and children's education.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I have not been a Member of Parliament for long, so perhaps this will carry less weight than if it were said by someone else, but I have rarely heard such a ridiculous statement by a Minister. It ill behoves the Secretary of State to try to disguise the fact—which everyone knows—that his ministerial colleagues made remarks on this issue that, after slipping clause 118 into the Bill at the last moment in Committee, they cannot now defend. I see that the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris) is now back in the Chamber—I hope that she will resume her seat on the Front Bench.

As I said, we are discussing an important issue, which goes to the heart of the question whether we should trust anything that the Ministers say. They are asking us to take much on trust, as so much in the Bill is to be governed by regulations that will be issued and reviewed long after the Bill is enacted.

It is fitting that we should be discussing partnership schemes at 3 am, because last year we debated the assisted places scheme at a similar hour of the morning. That was another occasion on which the Government did not give sufficient time for proper consideration of an issue that affects so many children—nearly 400 in my constituency alone. In the last stages of that discussion, I tabled amendments similar to new clauses 9 and 10, but I was persuaded by the Minister's response to withdraw them.

New clause 9 would encourage and enable charities to top up the fees of a child at an independent school where the cost would exceed the standard spending assessment for a child at a maintained school in the area. Last year, I accepted the right of the new Government—although I did not agree with them—to claim back the £1,000 more that it cost on average to send a child to an independent school through the assisted places scheme rather than to a maintained school, and to use that money towards the costs of teachers in other parts of the education service. However, I tabled the new clause because I believe that we should allow charities to step into the breach. In that case, the assisted places scheme, or a version of it, could continue in areas where it had popular support, without doing so at the expense of the Government's objective of finding more money for primary school teachers.

The equivalent of new clause 10 in the Education (Schools) Bill would have ensured that councils had the power to go ahead with a new version of the assisted places scheme. The Minister for School Standards said:

"I intend to ask the Committee to reject new clause 2, because it is unnecessary to include its provisions in the Bill, given that . . . Regulations . . . made under section 518 of the Education Act 1996, already give LEAs the discretion to pay the whole or part of tuition fees . . . and other expenses relating to the attendance of a pupil at a fee-paying school."

He went on:

"If the local authority wants to use the money that it raises locally for this purpose, that is for it to decide. It will be held accountable by Surrey people, if that is how it wants to spend money from the education budget. The authority has the freedom to exercise that power".—[Official Report, 10 June 1997; Vol. 295, c. 1008.]

Emboldened by the Minister's statement, I felt no need to press the motion to a vote, and I went back to Surrey and discussed the matter with the chairman of the county council's education committee. After taking expert advice, we developed a scheme that we believed was a great improvement: a development of what was best in the assisted places scheme and in the rhetoric that we were hearing from the Government about building partnership between independent and state schools.

Nearly one in five children in Surrey go to independent schools, and it is especially important for us to build bridges between those schools and the state sector. It so happened that our scheme came to fruition when the Bill was in Committee, so I took advantage of its approval by the county council to announce it to the Committee, and to seek endorsement from Ministers for what we were trying to do.

I said:

"The Education (Schools) Act 1997 . . . was a retrograde step away from more partnership between the public and private sectors. Since then . . . it was agreed to create a new partnership scheme in Surrey between independent schools and the state sector."

I sought the reaction of the Minister for School Standards and his ministerial colleague, the hon. Member for Yardley, who said:

"The Department looks forward to receiving details of those plans and to hearing how children can be given more opportunities than at present. That is exactly the sort of co-operation that we want to see".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 5 February 1998; c. 346-47.]

I was so delighted by that response that I sought confirmation from the hon. Lady, who said:

"we welcome the partnership that is clearly being made in Surrey with the private sector; that is exactly what we want in the interests of children."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 5 February 1998; c. 351.]

So, there we have it—the endorsement of the principle by the Minister for School Standards, and the endorsement of our scheme, when it is approved, by his ministerial colleague. We feel that we are going places. We have a scheme that will be greatly to the benefit of children in Surrey.

We have heard the rhetoric from Labour Members about how, through their new education action zones, they will get companies such as Proctor and Gamble involved in education—a field that the company has not previously entered to any great extent. We thought, why not get the royal grammar school in Guildford involved, as it has been in the business of education for more than 500 years and might have a thing or two to teach other schools in the area, given that it is often the best performing school in the country by many measures?

3.15 am

So we thought that we were on to a good thing, but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood pointed out, we heard from the other side of the Labour Government. Something that we have learnt the hard way in Committee is that there are two sides to this Government. This is the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde Administration. If they drink the right potion, one hears the right noises, but when they make the decisions they often reach into that other cabinet and drink potion B—then the lesson is, "Watch out!" I fear that one Minister—I would not like to say which one—had drunk deep of potion B before the Government came up with clause 118.

Mr. Willis: I do not know what the hon. Gentleman has been drinking, but it is certainly something of the night. Will he confirm the reality of these amendments, and in particular new clause 5? If it were adopted, the public sector would make a huge subsidy to every child in a private school throughout the country. Will he confirm that that is really the intention—a huge transfer of funds from the public sector to subsidise the private sector?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I hesitate even to attempt to answer the hon. Gentleman, because he clearly has not been listening to what I have been saying. I clearly described the Surrey scheme. Any additional costs—[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman will listen, I said that, under the Surrey scheme, any additional cost over the standard spending assessment would be met from outside charitable sources.

Local education authorities can now spend money in ways that we all would agree would be unreasonable. We do not object to reasonable constraints on the way in which councils spend their money, but let us not forget that children in my county are costing the local ratepayers £80,000 a year because they are in care, and there are many more costing at least £20,000 a year. Some children in our society require us to spend a great deal more per year than the standard spending assessment. Those powers would remain with the local education authority, even after the enactment of the Bill without amendment.

Mr. Willis: Probably it is the lateness of the hour and the fact that I am getting old, but does the hon. Gentleman accept that new clause 5 basically states that parents can choose to send their child to an independent school if they wish to do so, and that the cost to the local authority would be the average cost of sending them to a state school—

Mr. St. Aubyn: I will quickly answer the point for the hon. Gentleman. He should refer to new clause 5(3). If he reads it carefully, he will understand where we are coming from. I think that we need to move on, because this is a very sterile debate.

Mr. Dorrell: The answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) is that new clause 5(2) makes it clear that the local authority could meet the cost

"in whole or in part"—

the purpose being that it would meet it in part, or indeed not at all, according to a means test similar to that provided for under the assisted places scheme. So the hon. Gentleman is simply wrong.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I refer the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) to new clause 10, which may be more to his liking, and which follows the new clauses that I proposed last year. I particularly refer him to new clause 9, which exactly mirrors the one that he and the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) supported when I tabled it last summer. I was alarmed to hear from the hon. Member for Bath that he has become so tired that he cannot decide whether to support the proposal again this evening. I was sorry to hear that, but not surprised, given the confusion among the Liberals.

New clause 10 is a menu, and I invite the Minister to say how far down it he is prepared to go. I hope that the Minister is listening, because the education of children—for which, apparently, there is some support among Labour Members—is important. The menu includes buying lessons from the independent sector for a child that needs them.

Do the Government support the principle that, if a school cannot provide classes in Japanese or Latin, and it has a pupil with a particular aptitude or need to learn them, the LEA may help the pupil by buying that provision, and, at the same time, building bridges with the independent sector? Does he accept that the same should apply to courses in music, drama and ballet? Should it not apply to games such as football and cricket, where a school may have particular expertise? Does he support the principle of parental choice?

The Minister for School Standards said that his objection to grammar schools was that schools make the choice, not the parents. We invite him to support a scheme that gives parental choice. Does he agree that the parents of a child who has been favoured by support from a local education authority in having some lessons bought in from an independent school should also be able, possibly with charitable help, to buy the rest of that child's education provision at the same school out of their own resources? There is a logic to what we are asking the Government to support, and it is dictated by the needs of children, not only in Surrey but in other parts of country.

Only last night, Bromley council considered a similar scheme. It has found that the demand for places means that, if assisted places are abolished, it will have to meet not only the standard spending assessment of pupils coming back into the state sector but the capital cost of new classrooms. The Government have not provided the necessary money for that.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey): Does my hon. Friend agree that the sniggering lack of interest of Labour Front-Bench spokesmen is only what the people of Surrey have come to expect from the Labour Government? Does he further agree that people in Surrey and all over the country will look carefully at how the Liberal Democrats vote? This is a test of the Government's commitment to partnership in education that people in Surrey will hope the Liberal Democrats do not fail. The Conservatives will stand up for their interests.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I thank my hon. Friend for that point. It is disappointing that Labour and Liberal Members seem to think that this is a joke. The fact is that it involves the education of thousands of children and building the sort of bridges between independent and state provision that everyone claims that they favour. If they do, they must support our amendment.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Does my hon. Friend see any analogy with the bridge built between the Prime Minister—a product of independent education—and the Deputy Prime Minister, who, of course, is not?

Mr. St. Aubyn: That is an avenue down which you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would not allow me to travel. Nor may we consider why the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), is not present.

We know that Labour Members have a hidden constraint on the way in which they vote tonight. They have the constraint of the union vote. They have the constraint of the unions telling them that they are against the type of scheme that we suggest. We may be sure that, if Labour Members go through the No Lobby, it will be due not only to the potions that they have been drinking but to the message that they have been imbibing from their union paymasters.

I am mystified by the statements that I read out from the Minister earlier in the year, and my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) has highlighted the mystery of them. I suggest that they consider their position carefully. We heard from the Minister for School Standards that he was all in favour of Surrey making up its own mind. Now he is introducing regulations that we have not even seen today at this late stage of considering the Bill. Even now, we have no idea what the regulations will do, and how they will affect us. In the meantime, if children are to participate in a partnership scheme in Bromley, Surrey or other parts of the country, decisions have to be made today.

Decisions about where children go in the autumn have to be made at this time of year. The delay, which may suit the political purposes of Labour Members, is at the expense of children who saw themselves knocking at the door of opportunity when the schemes were put forward in good faith after the statement by the Minister last summer. Now they find the very same Minister blocking their path, because he dare not show his hand before the Bill is passed.

With this amendment, we invite the Minister to show his hand. He owes it to those children, as he does to the House, to explain the behaviour of his Department in the light of statements made by him and his colleagues. I urge all those who support the principles of the amendments to support the one on which we shall vote.

Mr. Blunkett: I wish the shadow Secretary of State a happy birthday. If I had had this inflicted on me on my birthday by my Whips and business managers, I would genuinely believe that they had got it in for me. I can only presume that it is because he has been doing too much work on a Monday and Friday in his family business, but someone has certainly got it in for the shadow Secretary of State.

[Mr. Blunkett]

We have been debating Report and Third Reading now for almost 20 hours. It is a long period, and I do not intend to keep the House on this set of new clauses and amendments. I shall seek formally to move Government amendments Nos. 83 and 84.

We debated the issues last summer, and a Bill received Royal Assent on 31 July. We debated that Bill in the light of the manifesto on which the Government were elected. I want to make it clear this morning that, whatever Conservative Members feel or think, that was a mandate, and we will not have it overturned by local authorities that are blatantly trying to reintroduce the assisted places scheme under another name.

There will be partnership. We shall have agreements. The private sector is prepared to co-operate, and we welcome that. It has to be a genuine partnership, not a subsidy to the private sector. It has to be in the interests of all children, which means not diverting public money allocated by Government for spending in state schools, to provide money for private schools. We shall continue to seek that partnership and to build on the progress that has been made, and I commend the excellent work that my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards has been doing to build those bridges.

I also want to make it clear that there will be no danger to those programmes in music, ballet, special needs, which we all accept and which we have repeatedly said are perfectly legitimate. What we shall not tolerate is local government simply seeking to cock a snook at the elected Government on a manifesto that was overwhelmingly carried on 1 May last year as a deliberate political act that has nothing to do with increasing the standards of education.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I shall not give way. In politics we are all subject to pomposity, but if there had been a competition for pomposity over the past few hours, the hon. Gentleman would have won hands down. At this time in the morning, we need to be able to distinguish simple verbal diarrhoea from genuine argument.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blunkett: I am glad the hon. Gentleman agrees.

Mr. St. Aubyn: In that case, will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I want to make it absolutely clear that I shall give way to no Conservative Member, in view of the filibuster that they have operated over the past 12 hours. We are now going to make progress.

The argument is clear: yes, let us have partnership; yes, let us ensure that, where provision is not available at local level for special needs, ballet or music, it is made available; but we are not prepared to have an assisted places scheme by another name. We shall judge each of the proposals brought forward by local government on its merits; we shall not fetter our discretion. We shall not go again through a debate that we have already had just for a party political game, which has nothing to do with the standard of education for the bulk of this country's children.

Mr. Dorrell: First, I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his birthday wishes. There are few things I should prefer to be doing than debating with him an issue of such profound importance.

The right hon. Gentleman persists in believing that the opportunity for a local education authority to buy an education from an independent school, in a way that represents a fair use of resources compared with the education bought for other children in its area, is somehow doing down the maintained sector, and is an artificial subsidy to the private sector. That is total nonsense: it is one of the clearest descriptions possible of the difference between the Secretary of State's approach and mine.

I believe that money voted by Parliament for the provision of school education for children should be used in a way that focuses on the needs of individual children, and provides that education in whatever institution is best placed to provide it. The Secretary of State clearly still believes that money voted in those circumstances is money voted to an institution. That is the clear distinction of principle that continues to divide us.

The Secretary of State says that the issue was resolved by the passage of the Bill last summer, but the fact is that the divorce between the independent sector and the maintained sector is a continuing problem facing the education system—indeed, it defaces the British school system. The Secretary of State has no response to it whatever, and he cannot simply decree it away. It is an issue that will continue to dog education debates until we have a Government who are prepared to face the issue head on, and deal with it for the serious issue that it is.

That is why—despite the lateness of the hour—we shall push the new clause to a Division. Few issues illustrate more clearly the difference of principle between the Secretary of State, who is more interested in the institutions, and the Conservatives, who are more interested in providing education to children in whatever institution is best placed to meet their needs.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 45, Noes 220.

Division No. 226] [3.34 am

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)	Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Arbuthnot, James	Jenkin, Bernard
Beresford, Sir Paul	Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Blunt, Crispin	Lansley, Andrew
Brady, Graham	Leigh, Edward
Brazier, Julian	Letwin, Oliver
Browning, Mrs Angela	Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)	Loughton, Tim
Burns, Simon	Luff, Peter
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey	Maclean, Rt Hon David
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen	McLoughlin, Patrick
Evans, Nigel	Nicholls, Patrick
Fabricant, Michael	Pickles, Eric
Fallon, Michael	Prior, David
Gibb, Nick	Randall, John
Grieve, Dominic	Robathan, Andrew
Hawkins, Nick	Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Hayes, John	St Aubyn, Nick
Heald, Oliver	Sayeed, Jonathan

Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Swayne, Desmond
Tredinnick, David
Waterson, Nigel
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann

Tellers for the Ayes:
Sir David Madel and
Mr. John Whittingdale.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Atherton, Ms Candy
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burstow, Paul
Byers, Stephen
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Canavan, Dennis
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Jim (Coventry S)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Dawson, Hilton
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Edwards, Huw
Ennis, Jeff
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Galloway, George
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Grogan, John
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hope, Phil
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Michie, Bill (Sheffld Heeley)
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Hara, Eddie
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Rendel, David
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Squire, Ms Rachel
Steinberg, Gerry
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Kevin Hughes and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

Question accordingly negatived.

New clause 16

PARLIAMENTARY SCRUTINY OF ANNUAL REPORT OF THE CHIEF INSPECTOR FOR ENGLAND

'.—The School Inspections Act 1996 shall be amended as follows—

(1) in section 2 (Functions of the Chief inspector for England), subsection (7)(a), after 'lay' there shall be inserted insert, "by order,"

(2) in section 45 (Orders and regulations)

(a) in subsection (2), after 'section' insert '2'.

(b) after subsection (2) there shall be inserted—

"No order shall be made under section 2 of this Act unless a draft of the instrument containing the order has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.".'.— [Mr. Don Foster.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.45 am

Mr. Don Foster: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

[Mr. Don Foster]

Few in the House would disagree with the Prime Minister when he said that his top three priorities would be education, education and education. The House would also agree that in education the priority must be to raise standards.

A couple of years ago, the chief inspector, Mr. Chris Woodhead, gave a talk, which he called "Inspecting schools—the key to raising educational standards". He believes, and I agree with him, that, if inspection is properly carried out, it can be a major tool in the drive to raise standards in our schools, local education authorities, colleges and universities.

If inspection is so important in raising standards, the annual report of Her Majesty's chief inspector is a vital document which should inform not just the Secretary of State but the whole of Parliament. For that reason, the new clause proposes that the HMCI's annual report should not just be laid before Parliament, as is required in the School Inspections Act 1996, but should be subject to debate in both Houses of Parliament.

Until the advent of the new Government, we used to have an annual debate on the assisted places scheme. We believe that, if it was important to debate a matter that affects such a small proportion of pupils, time could be found for Parliament to debate a matter that should affect every pupil in every school. It deserves the scrutiny of both Houses of Parliament.

Many people are concerned that there is a lack of democratic accountability in the work of Ofsted. [Interruption.] Many of us are concerned that, when we ask Ministers about Ofsted's work, we do not get— [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. Could there be less distracting noise from the Benches, please?

Mr. Foster: There are concerns about the democratic accountability of Ofsted. For example, when we ask Ministers about Ofsted's work, we often get the reply, "That is not a matter for the Minister," and our inquiries are passed on to the chief inspector.

Many of us watched the television programme "Dispatches" last Thursday, when the chief inspector acknowledged that there might be a need to improve his organisation's democratic accountability. He said:

"We've certainly got no secrets that we feel guilty about. So we're open to any kind of documentary inquiry, any kind of academic inquiry, any kind of inquiry that Parliament, perhaps, might want to throw at us."

It is therefore quite clear that the chief inspector himself can, and would, have no objection to the scrutiny allowed by public debate on the Floor of both Houses of Parliament.

Such debate would enable us to ask some questions about certain aspects of the chief inspector's report, and help us to formulate future policy. Undoubtedly, we would wish to question, for example, the chief inspector's choice of language.

There were criticisms of the chief inspector in a recent study, which dealt with how two inspectors studying the same lessons reached different judgments in a third of all lessons. Although the researchers pointed out that there was such a discrepancy in judgment in one third of all lessons, the chief inspector chose to interpret that as meaning that judgments agreed in two thirds of lessons.

The two thirds/one third issue is quite an interesting one. In the initial draft of one of his own reports, "The Teaching of Reading in 45 London Primary Schools", the chief inspector said:

"the quality of teaching is satisfactory or better in approximately 2/3 of lessons observed in Year 2."

However—as he wanted, I suspect, to make a rather more derogatory report—he changed that to:

"weaknesses in teaching hampered pupils' progress and attainment in reading in 1 in 3 lessons in Year 2."

Clearly, Ofsted's work is not of particular interest to Labour Members. However, given that it is costing the United Kingdom £150 million annually, I believe that it should concern them. I certainly hope that they believe that Ofsted should provide value for money. They should also be concerned about criticisms made of the chief inspector's annual report.

Those who watched last Thursday's "Dispatches" programme—as I certainly did—will have been very concerned by comments by Mr. Alan Padden, head teacher of the Adel primary school, in Leeds. He was very concerned about an Ofsted report of his school, and said:

"four days in a school isn't good enough if your camera isn't focused and your camera isn't pointing in the right direction. The snap isn't worth having."

In that programme, Mr. Padden reported that, in some cases, judgments of lessons in his school were made by inspectors after less than five, 10 or 15 minutes. He defied any inspector to evaluate teaching quality, the attainment level of a class of up to 30 pupils and the progress that those pupils made in a lesson, and to validate those judgments, in such short periods. Perhaps even more worrying was that the Ofsted report included judgments on—and scores for pupils' attainment in—a music lesson that had not even been given. Hon. Members should have an opportunity to debate such matters and concerns on the Floor of the House.

We should be able to debate also the manner in which the chief inspector collects his own data. It is quite fascinating that the chief inspector tells members of the public that the vast majority of people in schools are satisfied with how his inspections are conducted, yet I have a copy of his method of collecting data to formulate judgments.

The chief inspector uses a five-point scale. As I am sure hon. Members are well aware, a five-point scale will usually have a spectrum comprising statements from "strongly agree" and "agree", to a central, neutral position, and finally to "disagree" and "strongly disagree". However, although one extreme end of the spectrum in the chief inspector's scale says "strongly agree" and "agree", the middle statement is "broadly agree". At the other extreme end of the spectrum is "disagree" and "strongly disagree". It is thus hardly surprising that the chief inspector tells us that many people are happy with what he is doing, when the reality is that many are not happy.

If the chief inspector's report is considered so important by him and by the Government in the process of levering up standards in schools, and if both Houses of Parliament are interested in levering up standards, as I believe they should be, we should have the right to debate the chief inspector's report on the Floor of the House.

Only a few years ago, the chief inspector said that the importance of Ofsted's work was that it ensured that it was possible to ascertain whether the emperor's clothes existed and whether they were as they might seem to an unsuspecting eye. A debate on the chief inspector's annual report on the Floor of both Houses of Parliament would give us the opportunity not only to have an informed debate on educational standards but to check whether this particular emperor—the chief inspector—has any clothes.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I shall detain the House for only a short time. I am a member of the Select Committee on Education and Employment, and this issue goes to the heart of that Committee's responsibilities—[Interruption.] It is a disgrace that Labour Members are not prepared to consider the duties that the House gives to Members and how they might be affected by amendments. It is also a disgrace that no Labour member of the Select Committee is present to discuss this important subject. It is a matter of regret to me that only two Conservative members of that Committee are here. My hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) is otherwise detained, but she has been here for virtually the entire evening. However, not one of the Labour members of the Select Committee on Education and Employment has bothered to be here for this debate.

I regret that I have to oppose the new clause, and must point out that we have a means of examining the chief inspector: we have the right to inquire of him what his views are, and we call him before the Select Committee. My concern is that the new clause would undermine that very important role of the Committee.

Mr. Hayes: I hope that my hon. Friend's concern is not so deep that he will not be able to support the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster).

Mr. St. Aubyn: I may well end up in the Division Lobby with the hon. Member for Bath on the ground that I suspect that the new clause will be opposed by the Government, and I am deeply opposed to everything that the Government are doing in the Bill. However, I have to point out that the hon. Member for Bath did not pay enough attention in his speech—although I regret missing the first part of it—to the vital role of the Select Committee. That is where the chief inspector is primarily accountable and where we must hold him accountable on behalf of the House.

Mr. Byers: I shall invite the House to vote against the new clause, and I give two fundamental reasons why it should do so. The first is that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) has misunderstood the role played by the chief inspector. The chief inspector might advise the Secretary of State, but the Secretary of State will determine his own policy in the light of advice which he receives from a range of individuals and organisations.

The second reason, in respect of scrutiny by the House, is that the chief inspector is independent of the Secretary of State. That is one of the reasons why parliamentary questions tabled to Ministers are in fact replied to by the chief inspector—he is a Crown servant and, as such, not answerable to the Secretary of State.

In fact, the best way to scrutinise the work of the chief inspector and Ofsted is through the Select Committee. If there is an annual report, the chief inspector can be invited to give evidence, and the Select Committee can then report to the House in the light of those hearings. That is a far more appropriate way of scrutinising Ofsted's work. It keeps lines of communication and responsibility clearly defined.

We believe that the new clause will create confusion. It will not help in holding the chief inspector to account. I hope that, at this late hour, the new clause will not be pressed to a Division, but, if it is, I shall invite the House to oppose it.

4 am

Mr. Dorrell: I listened to what the Minister had to say, but I also listened to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), and I found his arguments persuasive. My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) was right to say that the Select Committee was an important element of parliamentary accountability, but I am sure that he—indeed, any member of a Select Committee—understands that the Select Committee is a Committee of the House of Commons, and that ultimate responsibility rests with the House.

The hon. Member for Bath made a number of points to which the Minister did not respond. As I have said, I found the hon. Gentleman's arguments persuasive, and if he chose to press the new clause to a Division, we would support him.

Mr. Don Foster: I was delighted to hear the response of the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell). In the light of his comments, I shall be interested to see how the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) votes.

Like the right hon. Member for Charnwood, I found the Minister's response deeply disappointing. I hope that we can press the new clause to a vote, and that it will be supported by all who believe that there should be democratic accountability in the work of the chief inspector. I hope that all who believe that raising standards is important, and that inspection is an important element of that, will have the opportunity to engage in a serious annual debate on the chief inspector's report.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 48, Noes 194.

Division No. 227] [4.1 am

AYES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)	Harris, Dr Evan
Allan, Richard	Hayes, John
Arbuthnot, James	Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Ballard, Mrs Jackie	Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Blunt, Crispin	Jenkin, Bernard
Brand, Dr Peter	Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Brazier, Julian	Lansley, Andrew
Breed, Colin	Luff, Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela	Maclean, Rt Hon David
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)	McLoughlin, Patrick
Burstow, Paul	Madel, Sir David
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey	Nicholls, Patrick
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen	Öpik, Lembit
Evans, Nigel	Pickles, Eric
Foster, Don (Bath)	Prior, David
George, Andrew (St Ives)	Randall, John

Rendel, David
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
St Aubyn, Nick
Sanders, Adrian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Desmond
Tredinnick, David
Webb, Steve
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Willis, Phil

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Paul Keetch and
Mr. Edward Davey.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Atherton, Ms Candy
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Berry, Roger
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Byers, Stephen
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Canavan, Dennis
Caplin, Ivor
Cassale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darvill, Keith
Davidson, Ian
Dawson, Hilton
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Edwards, Huw
Ennis, Jeff
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Fitzsimons, Lorna
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Galloway, George
Gibson, Dr Ian
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Grogan, John
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hope, Phil
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stratford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Michie, Bill (Sheffld Heeley)
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Rapson, Syd
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Squire, Ms Rachel
Steinberg, Gerry
Steele, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Stringer, Graham
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Wills, Michael
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John McFall and
Mr. Clive Betts.

Question accordingly negatived.

New clause 17

REQUIREMENT FOR RECOUPMENT TO BE PAID FOR PRIMARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

'.—In section 492 of the Education Act 1996 (Recoupment: adjustment between local education authorities), for "may" in subsection (1) there shall be substituted "shall".'.—[Mr. Burstow.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I shall endeavour not to detain the House too long. I should like to start with a positive comment. The aim of the new clause is to address the worst effects of the interplay of the Greenwich judgment, grant-maintained schools and selection, which can leave children in many parts of the country without a school place.

We want to allow the money to follow the pupil. I was not a member of the Standing Committee, but I have read the report of its debates. The Liberal Democrats moved an amendment in Committee in an attempt to address the Greenwich judgment head on by reversing it. After debate, the amendment was withdrawn. We have reflected on what was said and have tabled the new clause in an attempt to move matters forward.

A number of problems arise from the Greenwich judgment. It is not relevant in every area, but the problems affect many, particularly those in large conurbations with a number of smaller local education authorities—areas where selection continues and there is a large number of grant-maintained schools. There has been a fragmentation of the admission and planning arrangements designed to meet the demand for places.

As a result, it can be increasingly difficult for a local education authority to match demand for places. Authorities have a statutory duty to provide school places, and some are trying to plan for that by increasing the number of places, while others have surplus places.

Those facing increasing demand for school places experience a volatility of demand that creates greater pressure on the overall supply. It is difficult for LEAs to anticipate or control that, and thus to fund it. In those circumstances, taking into account both market-led forces and the lead times for building new accommodation, it is difficult to meet the additional demand.

Within an individual LEA, the distribution of places is no longer a question of demography but one of parental choice—perfectly legitimate choice. In Sutton, my local education authority, the situation brought about by the Greenwich judgment on grant-maintained schools and selection means that on current projections, based on the continued inflow of out-of-borough pupils, there will be a shortfall of 2,400 places by 2003.

4.15 am

In Committee, there was a detailed debate about the effects of the Greenwich judgment—[Interruption.]—perhaps of the sort that is not possible in the Chamber at this hour in the morning—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] The amendment was designed to reflect the concern of Liberal Democrat Members—[HON. MEMBERS: "Wake them up."] My hon. Friends certainly have those concerns, and we seek through the new clause another way of mitigating the worst effects of the judgment, without denying parental choice.

The new clause would require the Secretary of State to make regulations to enable local education authorities to charge other LEAs for pupils who come from elsewhere to be educated within their areas. At present, the Secretary of State has the power to do so under the Education Act 1996. It is our view that the standard spending assessment does not provide an adequate way of redressing the imbalance increasingly occurring between popular local education authorities and those with surplus places that are not doing as good a job.

The new clause represents a way in which we could begin to address that problem. I hope that the Government will give us a positive response, and that we shall be able to do something to stop the spoilt choice that parents and children in many LEAs now face.

Mr. Byers: New clause 17 would effectively reintroduce mandatory inter-authority recoupment in relation to pupil numbers. That is not a road down which the Government would wish to go, so if it is pressed to a vote, I shall ask the House to vote against it. However, I hope that we can avoid that, because the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) has raised some important points about the consequences of the Greenwich judgment on payments for pupils in the home authority rather than the host authority where they may be attending school.

We believe that such matters are best dealt with through the standard spending assessment regime. The hon. Gentleman may be aware that we are conducting a wholesale review of the system with the intention of introducing new measures for April 1999. I can assure him that the concerns that he has just raised will be taken into account as part of that exercise. In the light of those assurances, I hope that he will feel able to withdraw new clause 17 and allow his concerns to be addressed as part of the review of the standard spending assessment regime.

Mr. Burstow: I have listened carefully to the Minister, and I am grateful that he listened carefully to my remarks about the way in which the Greenwich judgment affects my authority and many others. It is not the effect on the LEA that concerns me and my colleagues—it is the effect on parents and children who find themselves unable to get a school place. However, having listened to the Minister's generous offer in respect of SSA methodology—which provides a way forward to address the funding issues—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 18

MAKING AND APPROVAL OF CODE OF PRACTICE FOR LOCAL EDUCATION AUTHORITIES AND MAINTAINED SCHOOLS

'—(1) Where the Secretary of State proposes to issue or revise a code of practice under section 117, he shall prepare a draft of the code (or revised code).

(2) The Secretary of State shall consult such persons about the draft as he thinks fit and shall consider any representations made by them.

(3) If he determines to proceed with the draft (either in its original form or with such modifications as he thinks fit) he shall lay a copy of the draft before each House of Parliament.

(4) If, within the 40-day period, either House resolves not to approve the draft, the Secretary of State shall take no further steps in relation to the proposed code.

(5) If no such resolution is made within the 40-day period, the Secretary of State shall issue the code (or revised code) in the form of the draft, and it shall come into force on such date as the Secretary of State may by order appoint.

(6) If a draft of a proposed code of practice is not approved under subsection (4), the Secretary of State may lay a new draft of a proposed code before both Houses of Parliament.'.—[Mr. Willis.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Willis: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I shall be equally brief. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] This bear pit is what it must have been like for the Christians being fed to the lions.

The purpose of the new clause is straightforward, and we hope that the Government will support it. In Committee, we discussed the relationship between LEAs and schools. It took a great deal of hard work to get from the Government an agreement that there would be a published code of practice. We welcomed that, and we welcomed also the fact that there will be a clear set of criteria covering the relationship between an LEA and an individual school. What worries us is that the Bill proposes to give the Secretary of State the power to change the code of practice without any review. The purpose of the new clause is to say that, if the Secretary of State wishes to change the code of practice, a resolution from both Houses will be needed.

Mrs. Browning: We have touched on this issue in Committee and on Report and, yet again, I seek an assurance from the Minister. The Government's consultation will be reported in the summer—I believe in about June. Will the Minister assure us that, if there are changes to the code of practice, they will not be implemented during the summer recess, and that the Government will wait for this House to give the changes full scrutiny?

[Mrs. Browning]

Mr. Byers: I am more than pleased to give an assurance to the hon. Members for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) and for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) that there will be the fullest possible consultation about the LEA code of practice. It will be one of the most important codes to come out of the Bill. It will define the relationship within the new framework between LEAs and individual schools. There is some uncertainty between those partners, and it is only right and proper that the code of practice clarifies the respective responsibilities.

I do not feel that it is appropriate to deal with the matters in the way outlined by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough. It may be that the regulations need to be changed on a regular basis, to reflect the different responses and needs of the partners within the new framework, and we need flexibility. If changes are proposed, the new draft document will be fully consulted upon, with the intention of getting it absolutely right. If, after that consultation—during the practical implementation of the system—the view is that changes are needed, once again there will be the fullest possible consultation. I hope that, in the light of that assurance, the hon. Gentleman will feel able to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful to the Minister for those assurances, which were the sort of assurances that we required. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 21

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

'(1) The Education Act 1996 shall be amended as follows.

(2) In section 548 (no right to give corporal punishment)

(a) omit subsections (2), (4) and (5).

(b) in subsection (3), after paragraph (a) there shall be inserted—

(aa) any pupil for whom nursery education (within the meaning of Part V of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998) is provided.

(c) in subsection (3), omit subparagraphs (i) and (ii) of paragraph (b), and paragraph (d).

(3) In section 549 (interpretation of section 548), omit subsection (3).'.—[Mr. Don Foster.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Don Foster: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 23—Abolition of corporal punishment in schools etc.—

'.—(1) For section 548 of the Education Act 1996 there shall be substituted—

"No right to give corporal punishment

548.—(1) Corporal punishment given by, or on the authority of, a member of staff to a child—

(a) for whom education is provided, at any school, or

(b) for whom education is provided, otherwise than at school, under any arrangements made by a local education authority, or

(c) for whom specified nursery education is provided otherwise than at school,

cannot be justified in any proceedings on the ground that it was given in pursuance of a right exercisable by the member of staff by virtue of his position as such.

(2) Subsection (1) applies to corporal punishment so given to a child at any time, whether at the school or other place at which education is provided for the child, or elsewhere.

(3) The following provisions have effect for the purposes of this section.

(4) Any reference to giving corporal punishment to a child is to doing anything for the purpose of punishing that child (whether or not there are other reasons for doing it) which, apart from any justification, would constitute battery.

(5) However, corporal punishment shall not be taken to be given to a child by virtue of anything done for reasons that include averting—

(a) an immediate danger of personal injury to, or

(b) an immediate danger to the property of,

any person (including the child himself).

(6) "Member of staff", in relation to the child concerned, means—

(a) any person who works as a teacher at the school or other place at which education is provided for the child, or

(b) any other person who (whether in connection with the provision of education for the child or otherwise)—

(i) works at that school or place, or

(ii) otherwise provides his services there (whether or not for payment), and has lawful control or charge of the child.

(7) "Child" (except in subsection (8)) means a person under the age of 18.

(8) "Specified nursery education" means full–time or part–time education suitable for children who have not attained compulsory school age which is provided—

(a) by a local education authority; or

(b) by any other person—

(i) who is (or is to be) in receipt of financial assistance given by such an authority and whose provision of nursery education is taken into account by the authority in formulating proposals for the purposes of section 110(2)(a) of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, or

(ii) who is (or is to be) in receipt of grants under section 1 of the Nursery Education and Grant–Maintained Schools Act 1996; or

(c) (otherwise than as mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b)) in any educational institution which would fall within section 4(1) above (definition of "school") but for the fact that it provides part–time, rather than full–time, primary education."

(2) The following provisions of the Education Act 1996, namely—

(a) section 549 (interpretation of section 548), and

(b) section 550 (no avoidance of section 548 by refusing admission to school etc.), shall cease to have effect.'.

Amendment No. 144, in clause 114, page 83, line 31, leave out from beginning to end of line 41.

Amendment No. 171, in schedule 29, page 205, line 25, at end insert—'Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (c.12)—

In section 1(7) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (saving for right of parents etc. to administer corporal punishment), for "teacher, or other person" substitute "or (subject to section 548 of the Education Act 1996) any other person,".'.

Amendment No. 172, in page 223, leave out lines 9 to 13 and insert

'Omit sections 549 and 550 (provisions about corporal punishment).'.

Amendment No. 173, in schedule 30, page 235, column 3, leave out lines 40 to 44 and insert 'Sections 549 and 550.'.

Amendment No. 174, in page 237, line 54, at end insert—

'1997 c. 59.	Education (Schools) Act 1997.	Section 6(1). In section 7, in subsection (3)(a) "section 6(1)", and in subsection (4)(a) "(1) and".'.

Mr. Foster: New clause 21 would remove corporal punishment from independent schools. I move it in the certain knowledge that it will receive significant support in the House—I know that because I read it in today's The Independent, which tells us in advance of our deliberations that the House has swept away the last vestiges of caning. It is not enough to rely on The Independent, however, so I shall make the case briefly in the hope that hon. Members will support the new clause.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Do the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues make a habit of issuing press releases before events in this manner?

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman should know that it is certainly our practice to issue press releases saying what we hope to achieve in the House. Indeed, The Independent carries reports of what my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) and I said about the issue at a press conference at 10.30 am—we made no attempt to imply that those comments were made later. Perhaps it will speed up the debate if I briefly describe what we said.

This debate gives us the opportunity to complete what I believe, and I am sure the House will believe, to be unfinished business. [Interruption.] Well, I hope that some hon. Members will believe it to be unfinished business. In 1948, birching as a judicial punishment was abolished in the United Kingdom. In 1957, flogging was abolished in the Navy. In 1967, corporal punishment in prisons and borstals was abolished. That was an important year, because it was in that year that the Plowden report, "Children and their Primary Schools", recommended the abolition of corporal punishment in both state and independent schools. The report stated:

"We believe that the kind of relationship which ought to exist between teacher and child cannot be built up in an atmosphere in which the infliction of physical pain is regarded as a normal sanction."

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will the hon. Gentleman say whether the new clause draws a distinction between the ritualised flogging that both he and I want outlawed and the teacher who slaps a child? [Interruption.] Obviously, that concept excites some ribaldry among Labour Members, but some parents who are completely against ritualised beating would be concerned if a teacher could not lightly slap a child. Will the hon. Gentleman clarify that matter?

Mr. Foster: I will clarify it, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving notice that he would raise the issue. I believe that the Secretary of State was right when, about two weeks ago, he introduced guidance to teachers that made it very clear that they could reasonably use a physical approach if it prevented children who were fighting from harming one another. I believe that teachers needed that reassurance. Anything beyond that is, in my view, unacceptable, and the new clause would not make the distinction to which the hon. Member refers.

It is my clear view that corporal punishment is wrong in principle: it is barbaric and inhuman. It is also wrong in practice, because there is no evidence whatever that it is an effective deterrent either for the child who may have been misbehaving or for other children.

4.30 am

The Elton committee, which studied the matter in considerable detail in 1989, said:

"there is little evidence that Corporal Punishment was in general an effective deterrent either to the pupils punished or to other pupils."

I do not believe that the use of corporal punishment in schools can help to develop good educational practice.

I hope that the House is aware that although the vast majority—80 per cent.—of independent schools have the legal right to use corporal punishment, they have already decided voluntarily to abolish it. The Independent Schools Council said:

"Many schools concluded long before any form of legal ban was contemplated that corporal punishment impeded good education."

I estimate that no more than 200 independent schools continue to use corporal punishment, but I believe that the House should act to ensure that schools are legally obliged to cease its use forthwith.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): The hon. Gentleman said that it is barbaric to use corporal punishment in schools. If it is barbaric for a teacher to slap an unruly child, is it also, in his opinion, barbaric for a parent to do the same?

Mr. Foster: My personal view is that corporal punishment by a parent is wrong, but the new clause does not in any way infringe the rights of individual parents to inflict such punishment.

Dr. Lewis rose—

Mr. Foster: I am still answering the hon. Gentleman's first point. My personal view is that corporal punishment by a parent is indeed barbaric. It is for other hon. Members to decide their view on the matter. The new clause does not deal with that point, nor was it intended to.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: No, the hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity to contribute.

[Mr. Foster]

As I said at the beginning, this is an opportunity for the House to complete some unfinished business. Were we to pass this new clause or new clause 23, we would bring this country into line with all other European countries, both east and west. Surely it must be of interest to the House that not one other European country allows corporal punishment in any of its schools. I hope that, by the end of tonight, this country will have signalled its intention of joining that sensible decision taken by all other European countries.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley): I shall address my relatively brief remarks to new clause 23. We are drawing to the close of a very long debate, and we are also drawing to a close the practice of corporal punishment in our schools and educational establishments.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on raising this important issue on the Floor of the House. I entirely agree with his aims and hope that he and his hon. Friends will agree that, as well as removing the right to corporal punishment, new clause 23 would protect teachers who in the course of their duties may be accused of administering corporal punishment when they are attempting to protect children. In the light of that, I hope that Liberal Democrat Members will consider supporting new clause 23. We have had to be patient tonight. It has been a long debate and I want to keep my comments as brief as possible. In that vein, I do not intend to take interventions.

I have seen no evidence that corporal punishment enhances teaching or learning, that it enhances a child's life chances or makes a child a better citizen, or to show that a classroom cannot be controlled without the threat or the use of violence.

Relatively few schools still indulge in this outdated practice—a practice that has been outlawed throughout the rest of Europe and abandoned by Eton. I am sure that many of the old Etonians in this place will confirm that Eton is not renowned for its lax discipline. Other disciplinary measures are available that are more appropriate in a modern school setting and which allow children the opportunity to learn how to deal with conflicts.

The report, "Childhood Matters", by the national commission of inquiry into the prevention of child abuse, chaired by Lord Williams of Mostyn, states:

"The general decline in the permitted use of sanctions in this form, for example in publicly maintained schools and nurseries, is to be welcomed. Alternative ways of ensuring acceptable standards should be explored and promoted".

Evidence shows that children in schools that indulge in corporal punishment are either frightened by the experience, which is not conducive to good education, or resentful and rebellious, which is not good for discipline. One boy in my old school was beaten daily and became the school hero as a result. Other boys sought to emulate his behaviour. Canings had the opposite effect to that intended.

Physically abused children often have problems in life. Many prisoners were beaten in school. Evidence shows that people who use violence to settle disputes have experienced violence themselves. In the interests of discipline, we merely conserve the conditions in which violence can thrive. Some hon. Members invoke the in loco parentis argument to support their case that parents can choose corporal punishment, but it is not right to delegate that choice to another adult. Teachers do not want that right, and their trade unions do not want it; they welcome prohibition.

Lord Williams of Mostyn felt that parents and those acting on their behalf as parents had no more right to use physical punishment on children. The commission that he chaired felt that children should have the same right of protection as adults, and said that the ban on the use of corporal punishment in publicly maintained schools should be extended to independent schools and nurseries.

The Independent Schools Joint Council supports the end of corporal punishment. It represents 80 per cent. of children in the private sector and supports a ban because that is what parents want. In one school, parents withdrew their children because they discovered that children were being physically punished. They did not know that their children were being beaten; when they found out that they had had their choice taken away, they withdrew their children.

The Utting report on children and violence found that children need protection when living away from home. It said that reasonable chastisement should not constitute a defence for physical abuse of children. It also said that the most effective way of discouraging violence against children is to make it plain that none is acceptable. Children should be defended against punitive treatment.

Schools need to develop disciplinary measures. I see no reason why that cannot involve the withdrawal of treats, detention, performing useful tasks and extra home work. With older children, peer group councils have been especially useful with bullies and other disruptive behaviour. It is a far better form of discipline than corporal punishment. If hon. Members accept the amendment, it will end a discredited, outdated and ineffective practice and bring us into line with the rest of modern Europe.

Mrs. Browning: New clause 21 will be subject to a free vote for Conservative Members.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Will the hon. Lady declare an interest?

Mrs. Browning: Yes. I have slapped a lot of little legs and I can see a lot of little legs that need slapping tonight. [Laughter.] Line up in the corner and see me afterwards.

I cannot support new clause 21. There are some variations on it in new clause 23, to which the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) spoke. For example, subsection (5) makes an exception in respect of action taken where a child is in immediate danger. That is a sensible addition, but I parted company from her when she invoked the idea that corporal punishment was necessarily akin to child abuse or violence with long-reaching psychological effects. She mentioned, as did the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), the European dimension. I should like to put on record the position on corporal punishment based on case law in the European Court. The European Court of Human Rights has consistently ruled that there is nothing inherently inhuman or degrading about physical correction. In its judgment on a case concerning school corporal discipline, it declared:

"a particular level of severity"

had to be reached for a punishment to be in breach of the European convention on human rights. The judgment went on to say:

"factors such as the nature and context of the punishment, the manner and method of its execution, its duration, its physical and mental effects and, in some instances, the sex, age and state of health" of the child being disciplined must all be taken into account. That judgment was in the case of Costello-Roberts v. the United Kingdom in 1993.

4.45 am

Furthermore, article 2, protocol 1 of the European convention on human rights requires states to "respect the right of parents to ensure such education and teaching in conformity with their own religious and philosophical convictions".

I am concerned about the spirit of new clauses 21 and 23 not because I advocate the flogging of children—certainly not—but because there could be a dangerous read-across from schools to the rights of parents to smack. At present, if corporal punishment is practised in an independent school, parents have an opportunity to say whether they are in support of it or not and make an appropriate choice.

I jokingly said to the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) that I had smacked a lot of little legs. I have to say to the hon. Member for Colne Valley—perhaps I failed as a parent in this—that when a child of two or three tries to run into the road, you can point out the dangers to him, but there comes a point at which a slap on the leg prevents the child coming into danger. I advocate the parents' right to exercise that type of discipline in the child's own interest. It would be a great concern if the new clauses were accepted and that subsequently led to a diminution of the rights of parents. I am not talking about flogging; I am talking simply about the slap on the legs that many parents feel is necessary in the interests of the child's safety.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): Not many things would get me on my feet in this place at 4.45 am, especially when I have to be on my feet again at 9.30 am for another debate. Having seen what corporal punishment does to people in a secondary modern school, however, I feel deeply that we should move ahead this morning in the way outlined in new clause 23.

The current situation is ludicrous and anomalous. I am grateful that the Government are prepared to listen to arguments that this nonsense should be removed. My central point is that corporal punishment simply does not work. That was my experience at secondary modern school. I urge any hon. Members here who advocate retaining corporal punishment to look at the punishment books of schools that still use corporal punishment, or of those, like my own, which used it in the past. The same names appeared week in and week out—the same boys and the same girls. That is the most obvious evidence that it does not work.

Mr. Robathan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I will not take interventions. The hon. Gentleman can make his own points at the appropriate time.

After listening to the comments that have been made so far, I should like those hon. Members who argue for the retention of corporal punishment in schools to define the difference between legitimate corporal punishment and child abuse. I say that because I have had the experience on more than one occasion of having to define that difference in a juvenile court. I used to work in a social services department.

The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) talked about slapping legs. When one slaps legs, occasionally one marks a child. I have had to go to court and give evidence in cases where children who have received corporal punishment have been marked. I should like to hear a clear definition of what is child abuse and what is not; what is legitimate corporal punishment and what is abuse. I suspect that no one here can define that difference, which is why we have to grasp the nettle tonight and get rid of this nonsense once and for all.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I have made it clear that I am not giving way. I intend to conclude shortly.

This country is looked upon by other European countries as an anachronistic regime living in a historical time warp, because we still permit corporal punishment. I agree with the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), and I hope that a time will come when we do not hit our children but look for alternative methods of discipline. I plead guilty to having occasionally slapped my children when they were younger. I recognise now that that was not the right approach. There are alternative ways, and I hope that the Government, who are making efforts in this respect, will help parents to find those other ways of ensuring that their children are disciplined and behave in an appropriate manner.

I welcome the fact that the Government have been prepared to listen to the arguments from Back Benchers on the Government Benches and the Liberal Democrat Benches and even, I suspect, from several hon. Members on the Conservative Benches who feel uneasy about the current position. I hope that, in a free vote tonight, hon. Members will support new clause 23.

Mr. Nicholls: I hope that I do not embarrass Labour Members too much by joining them in the Lobby later tonight. Of all the arguments I have heard tonight for abolishing corporal punishment in independent schools, the one that I find utterly unconvincing—almost, but not quite, to the extent that it might make me change the way I vote—is that we must do it because otherwise we would be out of step with Europe. We are having a debate in Westminster, in our own sovereign Parliament; we should make up our own minds, one way or the other, for better or for worse, about how we feel about this issue. We should make a decision and be prepared to justify it to ourselves and to our constituents.

The idea that, even at this time of the morning, we should troop up and cravenly say that, simply because Europe is out of step with the United Kingdom, we should follow Europe, is one that I find demeaning and insulting. In saying that, I hope that, to a certain extent, I have been able to do something to save the embarrassment of Labour Members who will, I suspect, find me with them in the Lobby when we vote on the new clause.

[Mr. Nicholls]

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) was perfectly straightforward in stating how he felt about smacking children, but he is wrong. It is frankly ludicrous to say that one can persuade a two-and-a-half-year-old child not to run out into a road simply by saying, "We're going to reason with you and discuss other forms of disciplinary sanction with you." That is complete and utter nonsense, although I accept that that is how the hon. Gentleman feels. The crucial point is that, even though the hon. Gentleman disagrees with it, it is not slapping in that context that has made him table his new clause. What animated the hon. Gentleman was what I would call ritualised flogging, which is what we are actually talking about.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). My memory is imperfect, but although I do not think that we went to the same school, I am pretty sure that we suffered the same experience. I do not know whether we are going to hear from my hon. Friends some sort of nostalgia for the good old days. I wonder whether they will say, "Well, I got beaten at school and it didn't do me any harm"—[Interruption.] The House can draw its own conclusions about whether it did any harm to those among my hon. Friends who may say that.

My point is that I can remember the state of boys who were beaten at my prep school. I regularly saw marks put on their backs. That was not something out of "Whacko", as some of my colleagues will know. I am talking about boys of 10, 11 or 12 who, as a result of perfectly routine, not particularly excessive, beating, were bruised, cut and bleeding in a way that even I—this should cheer Labour Members up—find utterly unacceptable. I did not think that it was right then and I do not think it is right now. That is what we are talking about—that is what is before the House this morning.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Nicholls: I shall give way, because I am not afraid to defend my arguments, but first I want to make the point that what I have described is what we are talking about—that is what animates and drives the clause. We are not having a debate about smacking, although I shall come to that in a moment.

Dr. Julian Lewis: We are not talking about beating. No one seems to be suggesting that that sort of beating is going on. It is normal chastisement, such as a parent would administer to his own child without any suggestion of abuse, that will be ruled out by new clause 21. That is the subject to which my hon. Friend should address himself.

Mr. Nicholls: I gave way to my hon. Friend; I hope that he will give me credit for that. I was going to come to the arguments that he was making, but let me deal with them now, in short order.

I accept that ritualised beatings are not taking place. I know of no public school to which I would contemplate sending my son—or to which any of my friends and relatives who educate their children at public school would send their children—that still uses beating. I know no one who sends children to a private school that treats children in that way. However, some of us have received letters from one or two strange-sounding schools which say that, for a fee, they are perfectly prepared to beat our children for us. If those schools exist, it is legitimate to ask whether they should have that power.

Although I am convinced—and on this subject, I know what I am talking about—that no public school, major or minor, to which any of us would contemplate sending our children today, beats children, the point on which the hon. Member for Bath is seizing is that it is still possible.

I now come to the second point that worries my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis). It is the only argument in this whole business that would cause me some concern. The argument goes—my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) mentioned it—that new clause 21 might be the thin end of a particular wedge. It is argued that, if we passed the new clause tonight, it might mean that parents could not apply reasonable chastisement to their children. I admit that that is a risk, and for some—but not for all—it is the motive.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East that, if that is so, it is far better to legislate out the unjustifiable and then take the argument on its merits. One does not ultimately safeguard and justify the right to smack a child by ensuring that ritualised flogging in schools remains legal under British law. I put it to my hon. Friend that we might just as well say that we cannot outlaw hare coursing because that would have an effect on the fox hunting argument. I would much prefer to defend fox hunting on its merits rather than thinking that I must defend hare coursing because otherwise there will be a read-across.

It is being suggested that we should retain for children a punishment that we would not inflict on the worst criminal. I want to distance myself from some of the hon. Members with whom I shall vote in a few minutes, so let me say that I believe that there is a very good argument for bringing back corporal punishment for a certain type of criminal. [Interruption.] There we are; we are sorting out the relativities again.

I believe that there is a good argument for corporal punishment for some criminals. If the hon. Member for Bath wants to return to the House on another occasion with such a provision, I shall support him again. However, it is nonsense that, as the law stands, a child who says boo to teacher can be beaten, but a criminal who mugs teacher afterwards cannot have a hand laid on him.

In some ways, I wish that new clause 21 had not come before the House; I should have liked to go home early. I do not believe that independent schools throughout the country are flogging children. I do not know why the hon. Member for Bath tabled the new clause. I am not sure that it was answering a perceived need, but it is there, and we must take a view on it.

The key argument for my hon. Friends to consider is whether the best way to justify the right to chastise one's own child moderately in one's own household is to defend a situation that amounts to the continuing legalisation of ritual beating. That is not the way to meet the argument.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): One of the endearing features of the Liberals is that, on many issues, they display a substantial degree of illiberality. One issue on which they do so is the question of the right of individuals to go fox hunting, although there are honourable exceptions among the Liberals.

The new clause has a lot to do with principle—the principle of the right of a parent to decide how to deal with his children.

Mr. Dawson: What about the right of a child to be protected from violence?

Mr. Howarth: I am happy to deal with that point as I proceed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) made it clear that there has been a test case under the European convention on human rights, when it was found that there was nothing inhuman or degrading about physical correction. It was decided that particular levels of severity had to be reached for a punishment to be in breach of the convention. We are not talking about a breach of the convention.

5 am

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) said that there was something barbaric about the application of corporal punishment in schools. Good luck to my hon. Friend. That may be his view and the view of the hon. Member for Bath, but they do not have the right to tell parents throughout the country that they do not have the right to take a contrary view.

Mr. Nicholls rose—

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend must wait a minute. He is effectively saying that his morality is superior to that of those who take a contrary view. He should consider that carefully before he troops into the Lobby with Labour Members.

Mr. Nicholls: We have a problem; I accept that I am a very superior person. My point—and my hon. Friend knows it—is that we are talking about fact and degree. There are all sorts of things that everyone in this House accepts we cannot do to children; we are simply talking about where we draw the line. I specifically said that I was not talking about what a parent may choose to do to a child. I was talking about handing over that right in circumstances that amount to ritualised beating. That is what I was talking about, and my hon. Friend knows it.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend is perfectly content, within the confines of his own home, to apply corporal punishment to his children, but he is not happy about allowing somebody else, who takes precisely the same view, to do so. He is saying to me, as a parent, that I may apply corporal punishment in my own home, but that I may not say to the headmaster of a school to which I wish to send my child that I want to delegate that responsibility to him, provided that he does it in a way that I approve of and not in a way that would inflict undue violence. That is somehow unacceptable.

Mr. Dawson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: No. The hon. Gentleman has already had a go and he must now make his own speech in his own time—if his hon. Friends will let him have a few moments at this hour of the morning.

There is an important point of principle—that it should be the right of a parent to decide. That is agreed by my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge. Indeed, the hon. Member for Bath had said that he believes—although I do not know whether we should take it at face value—that parents should have that right in their own homes.

I believe that the new clause is the thin end of the wedge. The fundamental principle is that parents should have the right to send their children to a school that provides a level of discipline that suits them. I say to Labour Members that the reason why many of their constituents crucify themselves financially to send their children to independent schools is that there is a level of discipline in those schools that they do not find in state schools. That is one of the factors that they take into account.

Mr. Lansley: Does my hon. Friend agree that many parents scrimp and save to send their children to schools in my constituency? The parents are seeking a level of discipline in the school, but those schools do not apply corporal punishment

Mr. Howarth: I accept that different schools apply different ranges of discipline. It is up to the parent to decide. If parents are spending that sort of money, they are entitled to make that decision. Parents should have that power.

The hon. Member for Bath assesses that only 200 independent schools use corporal punishment. Although the great majority of independent schools do not apply corporal punishment, we are asked to change the law. The school to which my son went did not apply corporal punishment. I am not necessarily defending corporal punishment. I am defending the right of parents to send their children to a school that applies corporal punishment, if that is what they want.

The fact that the hon. Gentleman seeks to use to law of the land to deal with 200 schools is rather pathetic. I have a suspicion that this is the first step towards Parliament and the law of the land telling parents what they may do in their own homes.

Dr. Julian Lewis: One thing that has emerged clearly from the debate is that no argument that has been used tonight to outlaw modest physical punishment or restraint in schools could not be used to outlaw modest physical punishment or restraint in the home.

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) gave the game away, although not willingly—it had to be dragged, if not beaten, out of him. In the course of his oration, I asked him whether, when he said that he regarded the use of physical punishment in schools as barbaric, he also regarded the use of physical punishment in the home as barbaric. Eventually he admitted that that is what he felt. That is the motivation behind the new clause.

Everyone seems to be agreed that physical punishment of an abusive nature is not going on in public schools, so why the urgency to legislate? The reason for the legislation is that it is an indirect way to set up a situation in which it would be logically inconsistent to say that a teacher may not exercise physical punishment or restraint on a child, but a parent can do precisely that in his own home.

[Dr. Julian Lewis]

Time and again in the contributions that we have heard on the other side of the argument, it is clear that like is not being compared with like. Our opponents speak of gross physical abuse in schools, but they say that the measure does not affect the right of parents to use modest chastisement. However, the new clause is framed in such a way that it will affect the right of teachers to use modest chastisement as well. It is not about physical abuse: it focuses on the right to slap a naughty child.

It is an insult to every parent who believes that it is right to slap his or her own child when it misbehaves to say that that cannot be done in a school. The entire basis for it to be done in a school is that the school is operating in loco parentis. By ruling out physical punishment for the teacher, the new clause is designed, intended and motivated to rule it out in the not too distant future for the parent as well.

Before I comment on an article in The Independent that has been mentioned, I shall deal with the difficulty of technical assault. If we rule out any sort of physical punishment for a child or physical restraint in a school, any teacher who so much as lays a finger on the child is liable to be had up for technical assault. Therefore, when people ask why one requires the ability to inflict modest physical restraint or chastisement on a child if that ability will not be used, one could answer: because one must have the ability to restrain a violent child without having the fear of being had up in court because of the provisions of this Bill.

Several remarks have been made in the debate about an article in today's Independent, which was supposedly "reporting" this debate before it had even been held. The hon. Member for Bath said that nothing that he or his colleagues had said in the article was meant to imply that their comments had already been made in the House. I should therefore like to read a few extracts from the Independent article, which I first read at 2.20 this morning—a full three hours before the debate on new clause 21 had even started—and to state for the record the prophetic skills of Mr. Colin Brown, the Independent's chief political correspondent.

Before the event, Mr. Brown "reported":

"A Liberal Democrat MP last night spoke of his 'shame' at caning children as MPs voted to sweep away the last vestiges of corporal punishment in independent schools"—

[Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."] Labour Members say, "Hear, hear," but they have not done it yet. Although they will perhaps do it, even people as craven and predictable as they are might have a tinge of resentment at The Independent saying that they had done it before they had even got off their backsides.

The "report" continues:

"Former secondary school teacher, Phil Willis, the MP for Harrogate and Knaresborough, said: 'Whenever I caned a child, I felt demeaned by it. Quite frankly, I felt quite ashamed later in life to feel that for many years I supported the use of corporal punishment.' . . .

MPs were given a free vote by the Government to extend the ban in the independent schools during the final Commons stages of the School Standards Bill. . . .

Don Foster, the Liberal Democrat spokesman on education, challenged Tory backwoodsmen who defended"—

[Interruption.] Yes; but we have not done it yet. The hon. Member for Bath

"challenged Tory backwoodsmen who defended 'spanking'"—

a word that I do not think has yet been used by any hon. Member on either side of the House—[Hon. Members: "You did."]—but that is not to say that we will not use it.

The "report" states that the hon. Member for Bath challenged those who "defended 'spanking' on the grounds that it did children no harm. 'How do they know?', he said. 'I have been caned. It did me harm.'"

With all respect to the hon. Gentleman, that is a case of what educationists would call post hoc, ergo propter hoc. Merely because something has done him obvious harm—particularly to his logical faculties—one should not assume that it was caning.

The article continues:

"Mr. Willis said there was a need to use a degree of force, sometimes to protect pupils, but caning was an admission of failure in discipline in schools. The ban will"—

it will—

"also stop punishment with a slipper or a ruler. It will still allow parents to smack their children, and smacking by child minders with the approval of parents."

The "report" deserves to be put up with those other headlines of events before they have happened, such as the Hindenburg's safe landing and Dewey's defeat of Truman in the United States presidential election. Sadly, the report may be borne out in the event, but not for the right reasons.

It has been a pleasure to have the opportunity—albeit this early in the subsequent morning—to fulfil a promise to my constituents that, if there were a free vote on this issue, I would vote against the new clause. I shall vote against it. Moreover, I know that a majority of public opinion and of parents who believe that they should have the right modestly to chastise their own children would vote against it if they had the chance. It is only sad that the serried ranks of politically correct nannies on the Labour Benches will not give them that opportunity.

Mr. Willis: It seems rather pointless for me to speak after the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) has already said so much. However, if hon. Members need to see an example of the effects of caning, they have just seen it.

It matters naught to my hon. Friend the Member for Bath and me which of the two new clauses ultimately gets on to the statute book, provided that one of them does. This debate is not about slapping a naughty two-year-old; nor is it about flogging youths, young adults or young children until their backsides bleed. It is basically about the legalised abuse of children, because that is exactly what corporal punishment is.

5.15 am

The one point that has not been made in this debate, perhaps because very few hon. Members have been in the position that I have been in as a teacher and head of a school that used corporal punishment—incidentally, I totally support the comments that I am reported to have made in today's edition of The Independent in this respect—is that, when one administers corporal punishment on another human being, in this case on a child, one demeans oneself. Anyone who does not feel that is a sick person.

Earlier today, I appeared on a television programme with a young teacher who was looking forward to an opportunity to cane students. I think that it is terrible that, as we move into the next millennium, someone looks forward to beating children as a way to discipline them.

I had a fairly long and happy career in the teaching profession, but the one thing I regret more than anything else is that, for a significant number of years, I believed, like some Conservative Members, that corporal punishment was perhaps the only way to deal with recalcitrant children. I was wrong. The system did not work.

In my early days, I worked at a school where every misdemeanour was punished by a stroke of the cane. Every member of staff had a punishment book and a cane. I remember one child coming late into my class and being caned. He was caned at each of the other four lessons of the morning, before having his lunch and running home, or so I thought. That happened for three days. It was only on the third day that I bothered to ask the youngster why he was doing this. The reality was that he had been thrown out of the house by his father on Sunday night and was living in the back of a van. The only way he could get a free meal was to come to school and bear his punishment.

That is a graphic illustration of the futility of caning. It was an easy way to deal with a situation, which avoided—[Interruption.] If hon. Members would have the courtesy to listen to me now, they can barrack me outside.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willis: No, I will not.

If hon. Members feel that caning is still a worthwhile activity, they are in fact saying that they cannot be bothered to examine the real reasons why children are naughty. Children are naughty; my children are naughty. As the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) will know, I worked in a very difficult school until I became a Member of Parliament.

In 1986, when Leeds city council decided to abolish corporal punishment in Leeds's schools, an army of staff came to tell me that it would mean the end of discipline in the school. In fact, it did not, because we found other ways of getting to the root of the problem and of understanding children. We found that many children for whom corporal punishment had been an answer got twice as much when they got home. To them, it was the norm to be beaten. It was the norm to experience violence, whether of language, a fist or a belt. We were told that that was somehow right.

The new clauses and amendments give us an opportunity to end systematic legalised abuse of children. [HON. MEMBERS: "Barbarous."] Yes, it is barbarous. I hope that tonight we shall see all hon. Members trooping through the same Lobby.

Mr. Dawson: I did not intend to speak, but I have been driven to do so by the speech of the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), which was the most disgraceful speech that I have ever heard. It is a sad day when a supposedly intelligent person cannot distinguish between the role of a teacher—a professional role requiring a repertoire of professional skills—and the role of a parent, in which a relationship is crucial and seminal.

I hope that, in this country, people will eventually be able to develop parenting skills to the point at which parents themselves will relinquish any thought of inflicting physical pain on their children; but I suspect that that day is some way off, and it is not part of this debate. This debate is about the children's rights to be respected as individuals, which are separate from parents' rights. It is about children's rights to be protected from abuse.

The debate is intended to clarify what abuse of children actually is. It is disgraceful that we need have such a debate at the end of the 20th century, and it is sad that we are having it; but I am glad that we are going to get rid of physical abuse of children.

Mr. Lansley: I share the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), and disagree with the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson). I do not think that it is simply a case of pursuing children's rights. The logic of that means trespassing on the rights and relationships of parents and children, and I do not think that that is what we are discussing. Nor do I support the premise of the speech of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), that this is unfinished business in the process of abolishing corporal punishment in judicial proceedings. We are discussing corporal punishment in the context of education.

I would not apply corporal punishment to my children, and I would not permit a school to do so. The new clauses, however, clearly relate to independent schools rather than the maintained sector. I felt that there were two competing arguments—my own argument about corporal punishment, and the argument about the desirability or otherwise of legislating for interference in the internal arrangements of independent schools.

I consulted five independent schools in my constituency, and the result was interesting. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East in an intervention, none of those schools uses corporal punishment; indeed, none of them has used it for years. The head teacher of one of those schools—a respected secondary school—wrote to me in a letter:

"I also feel very strongly that a school cannot treat pupils in varying ways according to the views of individual parents . . . Given that a sizeable number of parents would greatly object to corporal punishment (a situation which is unlikely to change for the foreseeable future) I think it is impractical to retain it."

I believe we can conclude on practical grounds that the great majority of independent schools not only do not use corporal punishment, but would not return to it. On that basis, it is demonstrated that no educational purpose is achieved by the retention of corporal punishment.

Why as a Parliament should we interfere in the internal arrangements of independent schools? In doing so, we do not deny independent schools the opportunity to use punishment for an educational purpose, since I see no argument that such a purpose exists. In pursuing such a course—on this, I go along with the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe)—we add to the protection of children under certain conceivable circumstances where abuse could occur. If parents believe that corporal punishment plays a role in the disciplining of their children, I for one feel that it is far better administered by them in a loving environment than by officialdom in an environment separated from the love of parent and child.

I look to the hon. Member for Bath for guidance if I am wrong in the following respect. If there are schools, as there may be, that see a need for corporal punishment in the context of the relationship of parent, child and school, administering it should be possible only in very rare circumstances when all parents subscribe to it—perhaps for religious reasons—and when parents exercise it in pursuit of the disciplinary code of the school, rather than under any circumstances the school's teachers or staff administering it.

[Mr. Lansley]

I rest with the view that it is therefore appropriate to proceed down either the path proposed by the hon. Member for Bath or that proposed by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford). I await an understanding from the Minister of the technical deficiencies or benefits of the new clauses.

Ms Estelle Morris: In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister promised a debate on this subject on the Floor of the House—and a free vote at that. The fact that so many hon. Members are still present at 5.30 am shows that he was right, and that the issue should be decided in the House and not in Committee.

Mr. Robathan: Labour Members are still present because of the Whips.

Ms Morris: That is the first time that whips have been mentioned in the debate. We Labour Members also have a free vote.

I turn to the new clauses. I ask the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) to withdraw new clause 21, and instead support new clause 23, which we are advised by parliamentary draftsmen will fulfil all his aims.

I have listened carefully to the debate. Much of the fear of new clause 23—even among Conservative Members who I think will eventually vote for it—surrounded how far it could be interpreted, and into which realms it might extend. I should therefore make it clear that new clause 23 extends prohibition of corporal punishment to pupils attending all types of schools, including non-maintained schools, irrespective of whether their fees are met from public funds. It also extends prohibition to children receiving nursery education that is provided on a formal and systematic basis. The new clause is tightly drawn, and we are advised—I think quite rightly—that it means exactly what I have described.

I can give a further assurance to the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), who spoke sensibly and sensitively, that the Government would certainly not support an extension of the provision into the realms of the family. I think that it is easy to see a marked difference in the relationship between a parent and child and decisions that parents may make on how they keep discipline in their household, and the relationship between an institution and many children, where the right to punish is given to the institution and delegated to a number of people who happen to work there at any one time.

I think that the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) used the phrase "institutionalised beating". The crucial fact is not whether one uses the term "beating" or any other term, but that power is given to the institution. New clause 23 would prevent that. I hope that the hon. Member will accept my assurances that the Government have no intention of using the new clause or any other provision to extend that into the family.

I have listened carefully to the debate, as I did last year when the former hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth moved a similar new clause to reintroduce corporal punishment to mainstream schools.

Mr. Don Foster: The opposite.

5.30 am

Ms Morris: Yes, the opposite. The hon. Gentleman is right. It is much later—or much earlier—than I thought.

There was an acceptance in the House last year that things had moved on. We all want discipline in schools—I am pleased that that has not been questioned today. We need discipline so that children can learn effectively and teachers can get on with teaching. However, corporal punishment is not the best way to achieve it.

The principal argument in that debate, which has been repeated today, has always persuaded me: corporal punishment does not work. The same names appearing time and again in the punishment books show that it does not work. Corporal punishment can give status to a child who may not be able to gain status among their peer group in any other way.

We must consider what message we want to give to young people about how to deal with conflict and address situations with which they are not happy. That demands skill. Objectives must be set, and there must be consequences if children do not obey the rules. We must ask whether we want to give our children the message that one way in which to deal with people who do not act in a way of which we approve is to use physical force. That conflicts with how we teach them to deal with other people.

Children will learn how to deal with other people from the message we give them in our dealings with them. Sometimes, corporal punishment says more about the state of mind of the person inflicting it than about their belief in its effects on the child.

Last year, I voted that corporal punishment should not return to maintained schools. I hold to that view. We are debating whether those schools in the independent sector that still use corporal punishment should be allowed to continue to do so merely because the parents pay a fee so that their children can go there. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) put the issue plainly, saying that, given how much money the parents pay, they should at least have the right to think that their children could be beaten by the teachers. That is a funny equation.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The issue is not the terminology of beating, but the level of chastisement that is given, with sensitivity and love. If parents are not entitled to take discipline into account when choosing a school, should they be able to take into account other factors, such as a school's religious denomination? Independent schools provide a range of choice for parents. The Minister should respect that.

Ms Morris: I am sorry that I gave way. It was a huge mistake. I shall make progress rapidly. In his original speech, the hon. Gentleman said something along the lines of, given the amount of money that the parents pay, that is almost the least that they could expect. He did not progress with the argument that, the more they pay, the greater the beating. That is the issue in deciding whether to extend the prohibition into the independent sector.

I can do no more than quote the chairman of the Independent Schools Council, Ian Beer, who said in the press release to which the hon. Member for Bath referred:

"ISC schools have always regarded themselves as an integral part of the nation's education system".

He speaks on behalf of the independent sector. I am happy to take his word for the fact that that sector is part of the nation's education system. In my view, the rules that the House has approved for the vast majority of children who are educated in the maintained schools should also apply to those who are educated in the independent sector.

We have made it clear that Labour Members have a free vote on the subject, and must follow their consciences. My conscience tells me clearly that I should vote for one of the new clauses, but I ask the hon. Member for Bath to withdraw his new clause and to support instead new clause 23, which is to be moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister referred to the debate a year ago, led by Mr. James Pawsey, who was then the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth.

Mr. Andy King (Rugby and Kenilworth): He lost. He was beaten badly.

Mr. Foster: Tonight's debate has been much more measured than last year's, and I shall finish by making four brief points.

The contribution by the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) was measured, but in reply to his comments about our following Europe, I must explain that the reason for raising the fact that all other European countries have abolished corporal punishment—more than 200 years ago, in the case of Poland—was simply to give further evidence in support of the people who believe that it is not an effective form of punishment.

Child abuse has also been mentioned. In 1996, the national committee of inquiry into the prevention of child abuse said:

"As a general proposition and on the weight of evidence, physical punishment is an unsatisfactory and, ultimately, ineffective way of improving children's behaviour".

That is what the House will decide tonight.

Thirdly, as a follow-up to my observation that we were completing unfinished business, hon. Members may be interested to know that the first attempt to persuade the House to abolish corporal punishment in schools in this country took place as long ago as 1669, when a "lively boy" presented a petition to Parliament on behalf of the children of this nation to protest against "that intolerable grievance our youth lie under, in the accustomed severities of the school discipline of this nation".

So many years since that petition was presented, I hope that tonight, at last, that lively boy's wishes will come true.

I hope that the following quotation from Elizabeth I's schoolmaster, Roger Ascham, will sum up the feeling of most Members:

"Love is fitter than fear, gentleness better than beating, to bring up a child rightly in learning".

That, I think, is what the House believes.

I am convinced by the arguments of the hon. Member for Colne Valley and the Minister that, although our new clause 21 would have achieved our purpose, new clause 23 would do so even more effectively. I therefore hope that the House will give me leave to withdraw our new clause, in the hope that there will be an opportunity to vote instead for new clause 23 and the various amendments consequential upon it. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 23

ABOLITION OF CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN SCHOOLS ETC.

'.—(1) For section 548 of the Education Act 1996 there shall be substituted—

"No right to give corporal punishment

548.—(1) Corporal punishment given by, or on the authority of, a member of staff to a child—

(a) for whom education is provided, at any school, or

(b) for whom education is provided, otherwise than at school, under any arrangements made by a local education authority, or

(c) for whom specified nursery education is provided otherwise than at school,

cannot be justified in any proceedings on the ground that it was given in pursuance of a right exercisable by the member of staff by virtue of his position as such.

(2) Subsection (1) applies to corporal punishment so given to a child at any time, whether at the school or other place at which education is provided for the child, or elsewhere.

(3) The following provisions have effect for the purposes of this section.

(4) Any reference to giving corporal punishment to a child is to doing anything for the purpose of punishing that child (whether or not there are other reasons for doing it) which, apart from any justification, would constitute battery.

(5) However, corporal punishment shall not be taken to be given to a child by virtue of anything done for reasons that include averting—

(a) an immediate danger of personal injury to, or

(b) an immediate danger to the property of,

any person (including the child himself).

(6) "Member of staff", in relation to the child concerned, means—

(a) any person who works as a teacher at the school or other place at which education is provided for the child, or

(b) any other person who (whether in connection with the provision of education for the child or otherwise)—

(i) works at that school or place, or

(ii) otherwise provides his services there (whether or not for payment),

and has lawful control or charge of the child.

(7) "Child" (except in subsection (8)) means a person under the age of 18.

(8) "Specified nursery education" means full-time or part-time education suitable for children who have not attained compulsory school age which is provided—

(a) by a local education authority; or

(b) by any other person—

(i) who is (or is to be) in receipt of financial assistance given by such an authority and whose provision of nursery education is taken into account by the authority in formulating proposals for the purposes of section 110(2)(a) of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, or

(ii) who is (or is to be) in receipt of grants under section 1 of the Nursery Education and Grant-Maintained Schools Act 1996; or

(c) (otherwise than as mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b)) in any educational institution which would fall within section 4(1) above (definition of "school") but for the fact that it provides part-time, rather than full-time, primary education."

(2) The following provisions of the Education Act 1996, namely—

(a) section 549 (interpretation of section 548), and

(b) section 550 (no avoidance of section 548 by refusing admission to school etc.), shall cease to have effect.'.—[Kali Mountford.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Motion made, and Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 211, Noes 15.

Division No. 228] [5.38 am

AYES

Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Atherton, Ms Candy
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barron, Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Bennett, Andrew F
Berry, Roger
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burstow, Paul
Byers, Stephen
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clelland, David
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davidson, Ian
Dawson, Hilton
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Edwards, Huw
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Grogan, John
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Home Robertson, John
Hope, Phil
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Lansley, Andrew
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
McCabe, Steve
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Madel, Sir David
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (B'ham Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Nicholls, Patrick
Norris, Dan
Oaten, Mark
O'Hara, Eddie
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Rapson, Syd
Rendel, David
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Squire, Ms Rachel
Steinberg, Gerry
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Adrian Sanders and Helen Jones.

NOES

Brazier, Julian
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Evans, Nigel
Hawkins, Nick
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Luff, Peter
Maclean, Rt Hon David

Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Sayeed, Jonathan
Swayne, Desmond
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown
and
Mr. Andrew Robathan.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 109

EARLY YEARS DEVELOPMENT PARTNERSHIPS

Mr. Dafis: I beg to move amendment No. 116, in page 80, line 20, at end insert

'(2A) In Wales, the partnership shall have regard to the need for Welsh-medium nursery education to be accessible to all pupils.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 124, in clause 110, page 80, line 43, after 'and,' insert—

'(aa) a statement of proposals, which sets out the authority's proposals for providing nursery education for children who have attained the age of three years.'.

Mr. Dafis: The way in which the provisions in part V are implemented in Wales will be of momentous importance to the Welsh language and to the prospects of creating a truly effective bilingual society—an aim that has overwhelming popular support in Wales.

The growth of Welsh-medium education over the past 30 years has been built to a large extent on the foundation laid by nursery education provided substantially by the voluntary nursery schools movement, Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin. A survey by the Welsh Language Board showed that 50 per cent. of parents would send children to Welsh-medium nursery schools if such provision were available.

It is vital that the expansion now proposed in publicly funded nursery education makes it possible to build on what has been achieved. That depends on partnership between LEAs and the voluntary sector and on accessibility—not just availability—of Welsh-medium provision.

Ironically, there is a danger that accessibility will be reduced by the expansion in the state sector. That issue was raised previously with the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), and I had hoped that he would be here to give me some unequivocal assurances that the right thing would be done.

Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin nursery groups are often small and are located in communities and close to homes. Welsh-medium primary schools in areas such as the valleys of the south-east are fewer in number than other schools and, therefore, further from pupils' homes. If primary schools provide nursery education directly, the danger is that existing groups will become unviable.

Parents would be understandably unhappy about sending three to four-year-olds the greater distance to Welsh-medium primary schools and would send them to English-medium schools instead, so what would seem on the surface to be an expansion of provision in Welsh-medium education in maintained schools could lead to reduced accessibility and a reduction in the number of pupils entering the Welsh-medium system.

Some LEAs might see that as an opportunity to solve what some of them would regard as the problem of meeting increasing demand for Welsh-medium education and, at the same time, to fill some of the empty places in English-medium schools. Places are scarce in the Welsh sector.

That problem can be prevented if the Secretary of State for Wales, and, from June 1999, the National Assembly for Wales, ensure that early years development plans build in the accessibility and availability of Welsh-medium provision.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the Liberal Democrats that this is a vital consideration in ensuring that Welsh culture has equal status in a Wales with its own assembly?

Mr. Dafis: The Liberal Democrats are in the forefront of thinking in these matters.

Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin must be accorded a key role in the process and be included in the partnerships established under the clause. LEAs preparing schemes under the Welsh Language Act 1993 are required to show how the language is to be treated equally with English, and I trust that the Welsh Language Board will ensure that accessibility in early years provision is a key consideration.

I am glad to know that each early years development plan is to be sent to the Welsh Language Board for comment. Its comments must carry weight with the Secretary of State, who will have ample powers under the Bill to ensure that the right policies are pursued at local level.

A few other matters arose from the guidelines on early years education issued recently by the Welsh Office. First, education and its integration with child care provision will be part of the Welsh Office's child care strategy. That will be the subject of substantial investment, so how will the Welsh language be safeguarded within that strategy? Obviously, that is of crucial significance.

Secondly, the guidelines stated that qualified early years teachers should be attached to each establishment that provides early years education. That provision is laudable, but how will it work in relation to Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin nursery groups, each of which will not have a qualified early years teacher? That must be considered, as must a strategy to provide sufficient qualified Welsh-medium nursery teachers.

Thirdly, the guidelines refer to the development of training schemes and the use of grant for education support and training money for that purpose. How do the Government propose to ensure that Welsh-medium training is central to those schemes?

We have an opportunity to achieve major progress if we get early years provision right; however, the perils are also apparent. I look forward to having the Minister's assurance—I suppose that I will receive it not tonight, but at some future time—that the perils will be avoided and the opportunity taken.

Ms Estelle Morris: The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) has had an opportunity to talk about a subject that is vital to people in Wales. I hope to give him some reassurance on the issues which he raised. I know that he had a meeting just before Christmas with the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), and that, as a result, the Welsh Office guidance on early years education issued in January is unequivocal on that issue. It states that partnerships that are providing for early years places must take into account the need for Welsh-medium provision. My hon. Friend certainly thinks that that is much better left to guidance than put in the Bill, like many other aspects of guidance on that issue.

[Ms Estelle Morris]

The fact that the provision is in the Welsh Office guidance that was issued in January should give the hon. Gentleman the reassurance that he has sought.

Mr. Dafis: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 114

NO RIGHT TO GIVE CORPORAL PUNISHMENT TO NURSERY PUPILS

Amendment made: No. 144, in page 83, line 31, leave out from beginning to end of line 41.—[Mr. Don Foster.]

Clause 127

GENERAL INTERPRETATION

Amendment made: No. 76, in page 92, line 40, at end insert—

'(3A) For the purposes of this Act references to disposing of land include references to—

(a) granting or disposing of any interest in land;

(b) entering into a contract to dispose of land or to grant or dispose of any such interest; and

(c) granting an option to purchase any land or any such interest.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Clause 128

INDEX

Amendments made: No. 10, in page 94, line 37, at end insert—

'new school (in Chapter IV of Part II)	section 43(4)'.

No. 2, in page 95, line 20, at end insert—

'school opening date	section (Arrangements for government of new schools)(9)'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Schedule 29

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Amendment made: No. 87, in page 205, line 25, at end insert—

'Local Authorities (Goods and Services) Act 1970 (c.39)

.—(1) Subject to sub-paragraph (2), in the Local Authorities (Goods and Services) Act 1970 (supply of goods and services by local authorities to public bodies) "public body" shall include any Education Action Forum established in an education action zone.

(2) The provision in sub-paragraph (1) shall have effect as if made by an Order under section 1(5) of that Act (power to provide that a person shall be a public body for the purposes of the Act).

(3) An order under section 1(5) may accordingly vary or revoke the provisions of sub-paragraph (1) above as they apply to an Education Action Forum specified in the order.'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Amendment made: No. 171, in page 205, line 25, at end insert—

'Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (c.12)

In section 1(7) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (saving for right of parents etc. to administer corporal punishment), for "teacher, or other person" substitute "or (subject to section 548 of the Education Act 1996) any other person,".'.—[Kali Mountford.]

Amendments made: No. 74, in page 209, line 16, at end insert—

'. In section 3 of the Charities Act 1993 (the register of charities), after subsection (5) insert—

"(5A) In subsection (5) above—

(a) paragraph (a) shall be read as referring also to any school to which section 21(8)(a) or (b) of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 applies, and

(b) paragraph (b) shall be read as referring also to any foundation to which section 21(9A) of that Act applies;

but an order of the Commissioners, or regulations made by the Secretary of State, may provide that section 21(9A) of that Act shall cease to apply to any such foundation as is mentioned in that provision or to any such foundation of a description specified in the order or regulations." '.

No. 75, in page 209, line 17, leave out 'the Charities Act 1993' and insert 'that Act'.

No. 83, in page 219, line 47, leave out from 'etc.)' to end of line 49 and insert—

'(a) in paragraph (a), for "county, voluntary, grant-maintained" substitute "community, foundation, voluntary"; and

(b) omit paragraph (b).'.

No. 28, in page 219, line 49, at end insert—

' .—(1) Section 519 (allowances for governors, etc.) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1), for the words from "travelling" to "section 115);" substitute "such allowances as may be prescribed to governors of—

(a) any community, foundation or voluntary school or community or foundation special school which does not have a delegated budget (within the meaning of Part II of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998);".

(3) In subsection (3) for "travelling and subsistence allowances" substitute "such allowances as may be prescribed".

(4) After subsection (6) add—

"(7) Regulations may impose a limit on the amount which may be paid by way of any allowance under this section." '.

No. 78, in page 222, line 40, at end insert—

'. In section 543 (relaxation of prescribed standards in special cases)—

(a) in subsection (1), for "or (4)" substitute ", (4) or (4A)"; and

(b) after subsection (4) insert—

"(4A) This subsection applies, in relation to any playing fields used by the school for the purposes of the school, if the Secretary of State is satisfied that, having regard to other facilities for physical education available to the school, it would be unreasonable to require conformity with any prescribed requirement relating to playing fields.

In this subsection "playing fields" has the same meaning as in section (Control of disposals or changing use of school playing fields) of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 (control of disposals or changing use of school playing fields)."—[Mr. Byers.]

Amendment made: No. 172, in page 223, leave out lines 9 to 13 and insert

'Omit sections 549 and 550 (provisions about corporal punishment).'.—[Kali Mountford.]

Schedule 30

REPEALS

Amendment made: No. 84, in page 235, line 8, column 3, at end insert—

'Section 518(b).'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Amendments made: No. 173, in page 235, column 3, leave out lines 40 to 44 and insert 'Sections 549 and 550.'.

No. 174, in page 237, line 54, at end insert—

'1997 c. 59.	Education (Schools) Act 1997.	Section 6(1). In section 7, in subsection (3)(a) "section 6(1)", and in subsection (4)(a) "(1) and".'.— [Kali Mountford.]

Schedule 31

TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS AND SAVINGS

Amendment made: No. 112, in page 239, line 46, at end add—

'6.—(1) This paragraph applies where—

(a) at any time before the appointed day, whether before or after the date on which this Act is passed, any trustees (being entitled to do so) have given to the governing body of a former voluntary school a notice which is effective to terminate, on or after that day, the school's occupation of any land held by the trustees for the purposes of the school; and

(b) the termination of the school's occupation of that land would have the result that it was not reasonably practicable for the school to continue to be conducted at its existing site.

(2) Paragraph 7A(2) of Schedule 22 shall apply in relation to the land to which such a notice relates as it applies in relation to the land to which a notice falling within section 29(11) relates.

(3) Section 29(13) and (14) shall apply, with any necessary modifications, for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1)(b) as they apply for the purposes of section 29(11)(b).

(4) In this paragraph "former voluntary school" means—

(a) any voluntary school, or

(b) any grant-maintained school which was a voluntary school immediately before becoming grant-maintained or was established by promoters, within the meaning of the Education Act 1996, which on the appointed day becomes a foundation or voluntary school within the meaning of this Act; and "the purposes of the school" has the meaning given by section 29(15).'.—[Mr. Byers.]

Order for Third Reading read.

5.59 am

Mr. Blunkett: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

It gives me great pleasure to move Third Reading. I thank my ministerial team, the Whips and the parliamentary private secretaries, and all those who have stayed for the last 14 hours who are with us in being committed to making the Bill a reality.

The Bill is about standards and opportunity, ranging from the early years development plans, to lowering class sizes, to the education development plans for local authorities, to a new framework to reunite the education system, to pull school together with school, to unite partnerships between LEAs and schools, parents and governors in lifting standards across Britain. It gives me great pleasure as the clock strikes 6 o'clock to move that we at last send the Bill to the House of Lords so that we can give every child in Britain the opportunity that they deserve.

6 am

Mr. Dorrell: I shall be as brief as the Secretary of State. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) for her support during the passage of the Bill. I thank hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Sir D. Madel), who acted as Whip, and my hon. Friends who served in Committee and who stayed in the House this evening. I also thank the officers and staff of the House of Commons for supporting us through a long sitting.

We shall not support Third Reading. The Secretary of State has said times without number, both inside the House and outside, that his priority is standards, not structures. However, the Bill damages key structures which deliver the standards that we all want in our schools. It is committed to the abolition of grant-maintained schools and to an overly restrictive control on class sizes which will reduce choice for parents with children in infants schools. It establishes a one-way ratchet for the abolition of successful grammar schools.

Earlier, the Government sustained yet again their view that we should continue to have a division at the heart of our school system between the independent sector and the maintained sector, a division which I believe continues to damage opportunities for many children. This is a bad Bill which should not command a majority in the House. We shall oppose its Third Reading.

6.2 am

Mr. Don Foster: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), who has worked tirelessly with me in Committee and on Report.

We made it clear on Second Reading that, like the Government, we were interested in raising standards in our schools and that the Bill contained many measures that had our full support and many exciting ideas. We also made it clear that we disagreed with the Government about the appropriate way forward on certain aspects. We discussed those issues in Committee and on Report. On some, we received assurances from the Government about our concerns; on others, we continue to believe that the Government are not necessarily pursuing the most effective way forward. Broadly speaking, because there are so many measures that we support, and because we are keen to show our desire to be part of the process of moving forward to raise standards in our schools, we will certainly vote for Third Reading.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

The House divided: Ayes 208, Noes 19.

Division No. 229] [6.3 am

AYES

Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Atherton, Ms Candy
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barron, Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Bennett, Andrew F
Berry, Roger
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Blunkett, Rt Hon David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brand, Dr Peter
Breed, Colin
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Bruce, Malcolm (Gordon)
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burstow, Paul
Byers, Stephen
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Caplin, Ivor
Cassle, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clelland, David
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cooper, Yvette
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Coventry S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davidson, Ian
Dawson, Hilton
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Edwards, Huw
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Grogan, John
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hope, Phil
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
McCabe, Steve
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McNulty, Tony
MacShane, Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Marshall-Andrews, Robert
Martlew, Eric
Michie, Bill (Sheffld Heeley)
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morris, Ms Estelle (Brm Yardley)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
Osten, Mark
O'Hara, Eddie
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Rapson, Syd
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Rendel, David
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Squire, Ms Rachel
Steinberg, Gerry
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Tyler, Paul
Wallace, James
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Whitehead, Dr Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Clive Betts and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Arbuthnot, James
Brazier, Julian
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Evans, Nigel
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Jenkin, Bernard
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lansley, Andrew
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Maclean, Rt Hon David
Nicholls, Patrick
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Sayeed, Jonathan
Swayne, Desmond
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann

Tellers for the Noes:
Sir David Madel and
Mr. John Whittingdale.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Local Government Finance

That the Special Grant Report (No. 33): Community Care Special Grants for 1998–99 (HC 534), which was laid before this House on 24th February, be approved.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

RATING AND VALUATION (SCOTLAND)

That the draft Railways (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 27th February, be approved.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

Question agreed to.

Farming (Ribble Valley)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

6.14 am

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I have waited a long time to make this speech. It is important, and I have an important point to make at the start. I see that the Minister who will respond to the debate is not a Farming Minister. At about midnight, I was told that the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), the junior Minister in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, would answer my debate on farming. I thought that that was especially odd, but later I was told that I was not even to be blessed with someone from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

I do not blame the Minister for School Standards, the junior Minister who is responding to the debate this morning, because obviously he has had this put upon him, but, whereas the environment was somewhat removed from farming, which is the subject of my debate, education is even further removed. The Government must explain themselves.

I know that the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, has a specific problem, and I fully accept that he cannot be with us today, but there are other Ministers in the Ministry of Agriculture and, as far as I know, in the five years when the Conservatives were in government when I was a Member of Parliament, we never once at an Adjournment debate put up a Minister who was not associated with the subject matter that was being discussed. The Government have a duty to tell the House why they have put up someone from the Department for Education and Employment to answer a debate on farming. What they have done tonight is contemptuous of the farmers of Ribble Valley and of this country, and a contempt of the House.

We need to get answers on that, but I shall continue with my speech and trust that someone from the Ministry of Agriculture will read it at some stage, and that we shall receive a proper response to the debate.

I suspect that Radio 4 could do no better than to scrap what it had planned for its "Farming Today" programme and broadcast what I have to say, so that people may listen to the problems of the farmers of Ribble Valley, which are replicated throughout the country, and can witness the fact that the Government think so little of farmers' problems that they cannot be bothered to put up a Minister who is available to respond to the problems of farmers in Ribble Valley.

Earlier this month, I challenged the Minister of Agriculture to come to Ribble Valley, to visit a farmer in Samlesbury and talk to the farmer's wife, Cath Wright, who had telephoned me that day and spoken about the plight of her husband, and of all the other farmers in the Samlesbury area. She said:

"I don't think the Minister is aware of the amount of effort we put in for little return. My husband regularly ploughs at night because he doesn't have the time during the day and often works a 90-hour week. The Minister is trying to turn a blind eye to our problems. That's why he will not come!"

I can tell the Minister, through the Minister for School Standards, that Cath Wright still extends that invitation—that she would like the Minister of Agriculture to visit her farm in Samlesbury, to see the problems that she is experiencing there.

[Mr. Nigel Evans]

Today is also poignant because it was the day that a delegation of 30 people from this country involved in farming, including a constituent of mine who is chairman of the Lancashire branch of the National Farmers Union, Peter Stott, went to Brussels to meet the European Commissioner for Agriculture and Rural Development, Franz Fischler; Commissioner Leon Brittan; Commissioner Neil Kinnock; and several MEPs concerned with farming, so that they could bring directly to Brussels the problems experienced in farming.

The one thing that the members of the delegation wanted was a lifting of the beef ban in this country. They wanted to ensure that they were getting the same treatment as the rest of Europe. It is important to note that, in the easing of the beef ban in Northern Ireland, even with all the scientific evidence that supported the lifting of that ban, Germany and Belgium still voted against us, and Luxembourg and Spain abstained. Science has been neglected for too long. Some countries were using all sorts of excuses to ensure that protection was in place for their own industries while British farming was being damaged.

The excellent recent Agriculture Select Committee report stated:

"Ironically, while the slaughter and other measures introduced to eradicate BSE from the British herd have raised UK beef hygiene standards to exemplary levels, inevitably they have reduced the volumes of the domestic product and opened up the UK market to some beef imports produced to less exacting hygiene standards."

That will include beef from European Union countries that have refused to acknowledge the action taken by the Conservative Government, and even by this Labour Government, to ensure that we have traceability of stock and eradication of bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Of course, it is not just the European Union, but other countries. I asked the Library for recent figures for Argentina, for example, which show that, including corned beef, £39 million-worth of beef came into this country from Argentina in 1997. Indeed, imports generally were up 18 per cent. in 1997 on the year before.

While we welcome the overdue easing of the ban in Northern Ireland, we need to know when the Minister of Agriculture will achieve the timetabled lifting of the ban in the remainder of the United Kingdom. After all, British beef is among the safest in the world. For purely political reasons on the part of our competitors, my farmers are suffering. British farmers are seeing their markets being destroyed.

I want to touch on a number of problems facing the farming industry in Ribble Valley, which is not unique by any stretch of the imagination. It is a micro-picture of what is happening elsewhere. The National Farmers Union county chairman wrote to me in December saying:

"I scarcely need to tell you about the mood of British farmers at the present time. You will have understood from media reports just how angry the mood is—the industry is facing a bleak future if nothing is done to address the extremely serious economic situation reflected in the Government's 1997 farm incomes. These show a 47 per cent. drop in real terms in just one year."

So what has got Ribble Valley farmers so angry? I thought I would go through some of the anecdotal evidence from the farmers, so that the Minister will be able, at some stage, to respond to it. Paul Kenny, one of my farmers from Slaidburn, has 60 dairy cows. He is facing a veterinary bill this month of £600. Because the farmers care about their animals, they do not turn their backs when some of their animals are ill. Even though he cannot afford the £600, he will have to pay that amount.

Two years ago, Paul Kenny was getting 26p a litre for his milk; now, it is 19p a litre, and he has been told that next year it is likely to go down to 16p a litre. What he resents more than anything is that, because of the way in which the quota is arranged, he cannot produce enough to make his farm viable. I was talking to another farmer today, who has poured 6,000 litres down a hole in his farm because his quota does not allow him to put that milk on the market. That is the sort of problem that our farmers are facing.

Peter Stott, whom I mentioned earlier, is a farmer. He says that the whole of farming is in total disarray and that the beef crisis is not over. Prices are as low today as they have ever been. Howard Blackburn, who works for Dugdales in Clitheroe—a feed merchant—says that in certain areas beef production is at a standstill. There is so little happening that it is laughable. There is talk now that farmers are making a negative profit, which is a euphemism for a loss. He told me that that has an enormous knock-on effect.

Farmers are not buying machinery for their farms and they are not buying stuff from other dealers, so there is less trade in the auction marts. There is a real danger of farmers going out of business and depopulation of the rural areas. We all know the dangers of depopulation. Rural schools and shops will close and the rural way of life will go. Howard Blackburn says that banks are looking seriously at the borrowings of some farmers. In the summer, they give out umbrellas; when it is winter, they take them away. That is exactly what they are doing. He also complained about the price that people are getting for their milk.

Harry Backhouse, a farmer in Bashall Eaves, talked about the price that farmers are now getting for their sheep. It is half what it was a year ago, when they were getting £60. They are now getting £30 to £32. Some cast sheep are fetching prices of less then £30.

Steve Fawcett, who works for the National Farmers Union in Clitheroe, said that many farmers who own their farms will not risk going bust—they just get very poor. They do not want to do anything other than farm, but because of the low incomes that they are now receiving, they have become poverty-stricken.

Stuart Kerr, one of my butchers from Clitheroe, spoke about his pride in the people of Ribble Valley, who have stayed loyal during the beef crisis. They have gone to him and carried on buying beef because they do not believe the rubbish that they have read in some of the papers and all the nonsense that Professor Richard Lacey churns out, frightening people needlessly.

John Swingler, who works at the Clitheroe auction mart, made it clear to me that the beef crisis is certainly not over. He said that the trade simply is not there. One farmer to whom he spoke the other day had to get two new tyres for his tractor. That cost him three cull cows, because he was getting £300 for each cull cow and the tyres cost £900.

John Swingler also complained about the price of the sheep. He said that one man aged 30 who is a farmer has had to supplement his income by going to work in another industry in Clitheroe. That means that he must farm when he has finished his work in the industry. Farmers now need two jobs to earn a living. John Swingler recently had a meeting to discuss the problems in farming and how farmers could present their produce better. More than 300 local farmers attended the meeting.

I spoke to Nick Capstick this evening. He is a fifth-generation farmer, only 34 years old. Council tax in Ribble Valley is going up 12 per cent. this year—that is four times the rate of inflation—yet he tells me that he put two cows into auction the other day and got only £294 each for them. Nick has four children to look after. His income has gone down dramatically.

How will a farmer like Nick—in his 30s, with four children and a wife to keep—make a living? He used to employ his sister to help milking the cows, but he can no longer afford to employ her, so he has to do the work himself. His situation is desperate. Nick was telling me about the problems caused by the increase in petrol prices. As a result of the Budget last week, he must pay 4.5p more on his petrol, on top of the 4p rise in July. Moreover, there is a tremendous knock-on effect for anyone who distributes goods to the farms.

There have been enormous problems in farming in Ribble Valley. We know about the cuts in the hill livestock compensatory allowance. Our Government gave £60 million to those areas, and it is being clawed back. We know that the Government got well over £100 million in the EU premium underspend, yet that did not go back into farming—the money has gone elsewhere. We know the problem of beef on the bone and the reaction that that has produced. There are people in Ribble Valley who want to buy beef on the bone, but they are not allowed to do so.

The cuts in the over-30-months scheme when the deadweight limits were introduced mean that the farmers are getting far less for the cattle when they take them to market. Green-top milk is another issue. Simonstone dairyman Alan Picking said:

"I have drunk raw milk all my life without incident and the Government should leave it alone."

Bryan Jackson from the Primrose dairy in Clitheroe said:

"It's down to freedom of choice. If people want to drink unpasteurised milk, let them. Cigarettes and cars are far more dangerous."

I agree entirely with him.

There is also the green pound and the strengthening of sterling. The Farmers Guardian reports how the strong pound is slowing the UK farming recovery. The article talks about the problems that farmers are facing because of the strengthening pound. Cheap imports are entering the United Kingdom, and our farmers are unable to compete—because of the five interest rate rises that have further increased the pound's value. What does the Minister think has happened to the pound since the Budget? It has gone up, making the farmers' job all that more difficult.

We also want the Government to do much more to ensure that local authorities and hospitals source locally and buy British meat, particularly beef, and that the armed forces are encouraged to buy much more British beef.

I have anecdotally described some of the problems and aspects of the daily crisis faced by people involved in farming in Ribble Valley. We want the Government to take action to help farmers with the problems that I have described. Farmers do not need more words; they need help.

The matters with which farmers most require help are the strong pound and timetabling, to ensure that not only Northern Ireland, but Scotland, England and Wales will see light at the end of the tunnel. Farmers will have to prove to their bank managers that there is some light. They want to farm, Minister—please give them the opportunity to do so.

6.30 am

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on securing this debate on a most important issue. I should also like to address the issue that he raised at the beginning of his speech—why I, as a Minister in the Department for Education and Employment, will reply to the debate. As a Minister of State, I shall reply on behalf of the Government. The hon. Gentleman knows why the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture was unable to attend the debate, and he should be aware that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture is representing the United Kingdom at the Fisheries Council meeting. It is very important that he discharges those specific responsibilities. I therefore have the opportunity, as a Minister of State, to reply on behalf of the Government to the serious points that have been raised in the debate.

The Government are not turning a blind eye to the constituents mentioned by the hon. Gentleman—whether Cath Wright or the others he mentioned—but are very mindful of the difficulties and problems that they face. However, the difficulties and problems mentioned by the hon. Gentleman did not suddenly emerge on 2 May 1997; many of them are legacies that we inherited from the previous Administration. We are developing policies to address and alleviate the issues and concerns that were mentioned in the debate.

The Government are aware that agriculture is currently going through a difficult time, and there is no doubt that the past year has been a bad time for farm incomes generally and for the livestock sector particularly. Total farming income has fallen in 1997, although it is true that some sectors have fared far better than others. The fall in incomes for the general cropping sector, for example, has been less marked than that for mixed farms or for lowland cattle or sheep farms.

The principal cause of the across-the-board fall in incomes has been the lower prices attracted by all major commodities. Furthermore, as the hon. Gentleman said, sterling's relative strength throughout 1997 has clearly had an effect on the prices that can be achieved by United Kingdom producers.

While sterling remains at its current high levels, and with structural surpluses in most agricultural sectors not only in the United Kingdom but in Europe generally, prospects—certainly in the short term—for increased commodity prices and therefore for improved incomes are not good. However, it is worth pointing out that the longer-term prospects for farmers are perhaps not as gloomy as the hon. Gentleman has said and as other Opposition Members have been very keen to portray. Although, as I said, incomes fell in 1997, that followed some very good years for farming. Incomes rose steadily from 1990 onwards, rising to a peak in 1995. During that time, sterling was relatively weak, and commodity prices were firm.

[Mr. Stephen Byers]

In general, that was a good period for the farm industry generally although, clearly, some sectors experienced difficulties throughout the 1990s, and the Government are very mindful of that. Because of the increase in farm incomes that was achieved in the 1990s, business debts could be repaid and farmers could reinvest for the future. As a result, the level of debt experienced in the agricultural sector as a whole is low compared with that in other industries. There is good reason to believe that farmers will come through the present difficult period, although the Government are not complacent about the problems facing farmers.

I deal now with how the Government will tackle farmers' concerns, and why we believe that it is important to take a rational, long-term view of the pressures and needs of the farming industry. Many hon. Members, including Conservatives, have demanded that the Government act to secure the aid available under the European Union's agrimonetary arrangements to offset the strength of the pound. In order to mitigate the effects on farmers' incomes, the argument has been that we need to take that action. It is argued—the hon. Gentleman touched on this point—that we should draw on European Union funds for that purpose. It is also argued that the money is there and that the Government should not ignore the availability of such funds. Those demands ignore several key issues and questions, which have wider implications for the public purse and for taxpayers.

First, those demands ignore the substantial protection that the agrimonetary arrangements automatically give to the value of the common agricultural policy payments against the consequences of the strength of sterling. The rules delay green-rate revaluations, which reduce the value of CAP payments, but allow devaluations, which will increase them, to take effect almost immediately. CAP payments made direct to UK farmers—around 60 per cent. of UK CAP spending—will receive protection under the European Union rules to the tune of around £400 million over two years. That is a considerable contribution by way of protection to the farming industry.

Secondly, such demands ignore the fact that aid has significant implications for public expenditure. European Union rules would allow the UK to pay farmers up to £690 million spread over three years. Up to half that total could be reclaimed from the European Union budget. In practice, however, that compensation is not simply ours for the taking.

As hon. Members will know, the operation of the UK rebate from the European Union budget—a rebate that was negotiated by Baroness Thatcher when she was Prime Minister—means that even paying the EU-reimbursed element of the aid carries significant public expenditure implications for the UK. Broadly speaking, the UK Exchequer would bear around 71 per cent. of the costs of EU-reimbursed aid. Most of the money that we would be spending would be not the European Union's money but the UK taxpayers'. The argument is perhaps not as simple as it is made out to be.

It is also worth bearing it in mind that the legal basis for agrimonetary compensation payments for currency revaluation has been in place since April 1997. In fact, it was introduced in the dying days of the previous Government. Had they wished to do so, the Government could have begun to make payments then, but—despite pressure from farmers' organisations using the same arguments that we have heard today—no such compensation was provided.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): The Minister ought to accept that two wrongs do not make a right. The farmers are genuinely concerned not just about where the money is coming from, but about the fact that other European countries are being subsidised to the full.

Mr. Byers: As I think the hon. Gentleman will know, in the case of some sectors of the United Kingdom farming industry that are under particular pressure, we have been prepared to use European Union support. The Government's policy has been to provide support where it has seemed to be in the national interest. It is worth noting that the previous Government voted to abolish the compensation mechanism completely when it was established at the Agriculture Council meeting last March. That demonstrates their intent all too clearly.

As I have said, the present Government recognise that some sectors are more affected than others by the current situation—which is relevant to the point made by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir R. Smith). That is why, even against a background of tight public expenditure control, we decided to provide some aid for the beef and sheep sectors. In structural terms, those sectors find it most difficult to absorb and adjust to the changes in income generated by green-rate revaluations.

The measures introduced by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture on 3 February will deliver £72.5 million to the specialist beef sector, in the form of payments made on the basis of eligibility for the 1996 suckler cow premium scheme. The benefits of focusing aid on specialist producers, who have the least flexibility to adapt to revaluation-derived falls in income, should feed through to other parts of the sector—by, for example, helping to ensure a supply of reasonably priced calves to calf finishers, thereby improving finishers' gross margins. We are also making £12.5 million available to the sheepmeat sector. That is targeted aid to the tune of £85 million.

Livestock farmers will receive £1 billion in direct subsidy this year. The Government have also said that they will fund the initial costs of the new cattle-tracing system, and the implementation of specified risk material controls. That will save the industry £70 million. It is clear that farmers are receiving a great deal of support from the taxpayer. That aid is in addition to nearly £1.7 billion of support for the livestock sector as a whole in 1997–98. It is a significant sum in public expenditure terms, by any standards. Total UK expenditure on the common agricultural policy will be £3 billion this year.

We acknowledge that other sectors also face difficulties. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley specifically mentioned the dairy sector, which I know has particular significance in his constituency. He referred to the difficulties caused by the fall in the price of milk. The price has dropped dramatically over the past 18 months—albeit, perhaps, from very high levels—not only because of the strong pound, but because of strong competition between buyers and sellers. Such competition, however, has been an inevitable consequence of the deregulation of the UK milk market, which the previous Government introduced.

It remains the case that, over the years, dairy farming has been relatively profitable compared with other sectors. The continued strong demand for milk quota, for lease or for purchase, indicates that there are plenty of producers in the dairy sector who feel that an adequate return can still be gained from dairy farming.

Apart from the effects of a strong currency, the farm incomes problem in the UK has highlighted a more general problem in the European Union—the problem of a long-term structural surplus in agricultural production. The Government recognise—

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at sixteen minutes to Seven o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 25 March 1998

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Children's Health

[Relevant documents: Second Report from the Health Committee, Session 1996–97, on The Specific Health Needs of Children and Young People (HC 307-I); Third Report from the Health Committee, Session 1996–97, on Health Services for Children and Young People in the Community: Home and School (HC 314-I); Fourth Report from the Health Committee, Session 1996–97, on Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services (HC 26-I); Fifth Report from the Health Committee, Session 1996–97, on Hospital Services for Children and Young People (HC 128-I); The Government's Response to the above Reports, published as Cm 3793.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

9.35 am

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I express my appreciation and that of members of the current Select Committee on Health for the opportunity to debate in detail the reports produced in the previous Parliament on children's health. I particularly thank those hon. Members who, like me, have been up all night for their presence at the debate. It is a tribute to their commitment to the issues that we shall be discussing.

I find myself in the unusual position of introducing a debate on four reports produced by a Committee of which I was neither the Chair nor a member. Therefore, my introduction will be somewhat general. However, I am delighted to see in the Chamber two Committee members from the previous Parliament: the former Chair, the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe), and my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise), who devotes great energy to this issue. I know that they will address in detail many of the points picked up by the Committee.

For the record, the Health Committee's inquiry ran from February 1996 until March 1997—just before the general election. It received some 500 submissions and conducted 19 oral evidence sessions. It is fair to say that it was a very thorough inquiry; the hon. Members involved deserve our congratulations on considering serious concerns in depth. The Committee issued four reports. The first two were published on 27 February 1997, and the final two were published on 18 and 26 March 1997. In an effort to conclude the inquiry, the Committee met 29 times in a four-month session shortly before the general election.

The reports from the 1996–97 Session covered a range of areas. The Committee's second report addressed the specific health needs of children and young persons; the third report dealt with home and school; the fourth report addressed mental health services; the fifth report considered hospital services. In introducing the debate, it is obviously important to stress that the contents of the reports refer to the policies of the previous Government. I pay tribute to Ministers in the new Government for the way in which they have picked up many issues raised by the Committee.

Last July, my hon. Friend the Member for Preston and I met the Minister of State, Baroness Jay, and had detailed discussions with her in the Department of Health. We are also grateful for the formal response that the Government gave in November to the recommendations in the reports.

As a background to the debate, I particularly welcome the efforts of the Select Committee in the previous Parliament. I welcome also the chance to discuss the contents of its reports. It has been my long-standing concern that Parliament rarely gives detailed consideration to child welfare and children's health. There are few debates on those subjects, so it is commendable that we have the chance this morning—I hope that we shall have more chances in due course—to examine an area that is much neglected.

It is said that children should be seen and not heard, and I believe that that saying typifies the attitudes to children's issues that have prevailed in this place—certainly during my time as a Member—until very recently. For generations, little consideration was given to the key concerns of children and young people.

One reason for that attitude is that, until recently, the overwhelming majority of Members of Parliament were male. Some of the male membership wrongly held the view that child care is a women's issue rather than an issue for men and women; but that attitude is changing. During my time in Parliament—and at 5 o'clock this morning, when we were discussing corporal punishment—I have been struck by the number of hon. Members, especially Conservative Members, who still place their children in private boarding schools. They probably have less contact with their children in term time and less knowledge of their children's concerns than I have. I am generalising. I accept that that does not apply to all Conservative Members, but a significant number of them have dispatched their children to school. Parenting at home has perhaps been second hand, because nannies have taken the bulk of the responsibility for the care of the children.

I welcome the radical changes that have occurred since the general election, such as the great increase, certainly on the Labour Benches, in the number of women Members of Parliament. The impact of that will be far greater consideration of wider issues of family policy, and of the health and well-being of children and young people.

Perhaps it is because I have reached middle age or beyond, but I also welcome the radical reduction in the average age of Members, which will afford us far more opportunities to discuss the concerns of children and young people. It is a particular delight that several of my female colleagues have just had or are expecting babies. That is healthy for Parliament, because their experiences of the health service and of caring for young children will be brought to bear in debates. In the past, opportunities to debate a huge area of policy have been missed because the vast majority of hon. Members, because of their age or background, had no direct experience of children's and young people's issues.

[Mr. David Hinchliffe]

The changes have resulted in a radical sea change in attitudes. About 10 years ago, I was attempting to persuade the Whips Office that I needed time off to be present at the birth of my second child. There was a good deal of resistance, because the poll tax was coming through. I was told that there would be rebellions by Conservative Members, and that I had to be at the House. My daughter's arrival was delayed, and I was able to be present at the birth. My discussions with female colleagues who have recently been through those experiences suggest that there has been a radical change in the views of parliamentary business managers, which bodes well for future discussions about children and young people.

Members of the Select Committee will reinforce the fact that the overall picture of children's health and well-being is encouraging. The figures in the reports show falling mortality rates and marked improvements in the ability to treat children with diseases and to reduce the extent of those diseases in a range of ways. From our different perspectives, we all welcome those advances, which have been delivered relatively recently.

Nevertheless, the Select Committee has identified several key anxieties that relate to wider policy areas outside those for which my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health is responsible. For example, the number of children who are killed and injured in road traffic accidents is alarming. That tragedy should be urgently addressed, and we must consider our personal transport habits. There has been a rapid increase in childhood asthma. I regularly visit schools in my constituency, and virtually every classroom has a supply of inhalers. It is tragic that such young children have been affected by problems that, in many areas, are directly related to traffic levels and pollution.

Transport policy must be reappraised radically if we are to have an effect on the health of young people, and I welcome the fact that the Government are soon to publish a White Paper on it. With regard to respiratory problems and asthma, I also welcome the steps that the Government are taking to reduce smoking. I look forward to the White Paper on smoking. As the Minister knows only too well, the Select Committee has produced but one report on tobacco so far in this Parliament. We feel strongly that urgent and radical steps must be taken to deal with the effect that passive smoking has on the lives of children and young people.

The Select Committee identified the mental health problems of children and young people as a key anxiety, and wider issues such as the increased incidence of family breakdown must be considered when addressing them. I urge my hon. Friend to discuss with her colleagues the apparent conflict between policies introduced by the previous Government, such as that between the Children Act 1989, which had cross-party support, and the operation of the Child Support Agency. The 1989 Act is underpinned by the welfare principle—the welfare of the child should prevail in relationships with the state and the natural family—but the CSA operates in such a way that children's welfare is the last thing to be considered. I see that too often in my constituency: CSA interventions often cause conflicts that damage children's welfare, and there is a knock-on effect on their well-being.

My personal anxiety about the mental health problems of children and young people is that we increasingly place far more pressures and stresses on them than we did when I was a youngster. Children do not have anywhere near as much freedom to enjoy childhood as I had. We make them grow up a great deal sooner, which is directly connected to the sad increase in mental health problems.

Eating disorders, especially among teenage girls, are a consequence of body image and the way in which the media reinforce what is expected of girls and, to a lesser extent, boys. The drug and alcohol culture has developed beyond that of the 1960s and 1970s, when I grew up.

The Select Committee rightly highlighted areas for specific action which my hon. Friend the Member for Preston and the hon. Member for Broxbourne will want to mention. It identified the lack of comparable data on children's health, which is discussed by the Acheson report on health inequalities. Although Government adult health figures can be compared, a comparison of children's health is not possible. I hope that the Government will rectify that through the health inequalities initiative on which Sir Donald Acheson will report.

The way in which children's services are fragmented over a range of professionals and agencies was emphasised. I had never heard of the children's community nurse service; as far as I know, it does not operate in my area. I was interested to discuss with my hon. Friend the Member for Preston the services that it offers. There are also health visitors, the school nursing service, social services and education services. The Committee is considering the divide between health and social services, and has rightly drawn attention to the fragmented provision and to how problems sometimes slip between the various agencies and professionals.

People in my area recently experienced the problem of the dreaded head lice, which caused great distress to many parents who look after their children and attend to their welfare. That problem arises throughout Britain, and it is difficult to decide who is responsible. Does responsibility lie with the school, the district nurse or the family? We need to consider carefully how to address this distressing, if not serious, problem.

It is obvious from the reports that, in the past, the health service has failed to recognise the separate needs of children. The report on hospital services emphasised that many hospitals do not take account of the specific needs and problems of children and young people.

I have my own interpretation of the Committee's conclusions, but other members of the Committee may take a different view. In my view, the Committee has clearly identified the need for much greater strategic vision in relation to provision for the health of children and young people. The Minister was a member of the Committee, and knows that there is a Cabinet Sub-Committee on Women's Issues. Perhaps we should consider a similar arrangement to oversee children's health and issues pertaining to them.

Perhaps the Minister will give us some information about collaboration between Departments. I served with the Minister, as a shadow Minister. She will remember that, at that time, we had a shadow Minister for children. There is a strong argument for a Minister with specific responsibility for children's issues who can span Departments and draw initiatives together.

Perhaps the Select Committee will consider the issue of a children's rights commission, which has been debated for a long time. It was raised in a recent inquiry into children who are being looked after. I welcome the Government's initiatives on children's health and their willingness to consider the issues that the Committee identified. I appreciate that wider policy changes, in particular the abolition of the internal market, will have a direct impact on the health of children. The expertise in commissioning children's services was discussed in the Select Committee.

I welcome the suggestions in the NHS White Paper on primary care, because they will certainly bring together community services that are currently fragmented. The Budget positively discriminates in favour of poorer families, and we know that there is a direct connection between poverty and the ill health not just of adults but of children.

The Committee's report on children who are being looked after was initiated in the previous Parliament and, because of its importance, was picked up by the new Committee. I hope that the House will debate that report soon. I also hope that this debate will be the first of many that will reflect a new political agenda for children and young people.

9.53 am

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): I am pleased to be called to speak in this important debate, and to have the opportunity to comment on the four reports on children's health; the inquiries took place when I was Chairman of the Select Committee on Health in the previous Parliament. I thank the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) for bringing those reports to the Chamber, and for his kind comments. I pay tribute to all my colleagues on that Committee for their constant support and commitment to our work.

It was the first time that the Select Committee had held an inquiry into services for children and young people. Twenty years had passed since the publication of the last comprehensive Government review of children's services—the Court report, "Fit for the Future"—and there had been no major parliamentary inquiry into the subject. That may surprise some people, because media hype about children easily lulls us into the trap of thinking that children, who comprise about a quarter of the population, receive excellent health provision that is specifically designed to meet their needs.

As the hon. Member for Wakefield has said, there is no doubt that the overall epidemiological picture is encouraging. Childhood mortality rates have been falling steadily for more than 100 years and are lower in the UK than in many comparable developed countries. There have also been significant improvements in the incidence and severity of childhood illnesses. However, areas of significant concern remain, and although the number of deaths and injuries from road traffic accidents have declined steeply in recent years, they remain high in absolute terms. There is considerable scope for further improvement, as there is for accidents generally.

There are still problems with respiratory and infectious diseases, and asthma, in particular, appears to have increased over recent decades, for reasons that are imperfectly understood. Mental health problems among children and adolescents may be increasing. Finally, there are the problems of success. Children who, in the past, would have died now survive with varying degrees of disability or need for care.

Unfortunately, the Committee's inquiry also identified areas of major concern and revealed that the specific needs of children were commonly ignored in the NHS. Our overall terms of reference were to consider "The specific health needs of children and adolescents, and the extent to which those needs are adequately met by the National Health Service".

We identified several major themes that were common whichever aspects of services for young people and children were studied. I hope that the new Committee will utilise the findings of the four reports to undertake further inquiries on individual aspects of care. I am pleased to note that the new Committee has resumed and completed the inquiry of major importance, "Children Looked After By Local Authorities". I look forward to seeing its report.

It is crucial that the inquiry's findings are not ignored because of the change of Parliament. As Chairman of the previous Committee, I urge the new Committee to be vigilant and to ensure that that does not happen. I hope that it will require the Department of Health to provide regular reports on its progress relating to the inquiry.

In their response issued in November, the Government recognised:

"Healthy children are much more likely to become healthy adults and we must make sure that we are investing in the future".

They also agreed with the Committee that

"The health needs of children are significantly different from those of adults, that they are a particularly vulnerable group, and that the provision of effective health services for children depends upon a thorough understanding of their special needs."

The Government's response states:

"The Department of Health will be discussing the future structure and development of health services for children with the service, the professions, users and their representatives. The Committee's reports will inform the debate about the specific policies of the new Government, and will help set the agenda for the future. Accordingly, we are not yet able to offer the Committee a substantive reply on many of their recommendations."

Although I accept that any new Government have many issues with which to contend, I have seen little evidence of activity either specifically relating to our conclusions or recommendations, or in the involvement of professions, users and their representatives. It appears that the Department of Health has no intention of consulting anyone other than its own civil servants. That must be rectified. I for one do not intend to let all the work on the four reports following that first inquiry into children's services be ignored.

The Committee recognised and welcomed the undoubted improvements in some areas of children's health in recent decades, but that should not lead to complacency or to an under-estimation of the importance of a change in attitude, leading to child care that is more child centred. Many factors have contributed to those improvements: immunisation, health education, improved nutrition and housing are just a few. I welcome the Government's acknowledgment that the reports echoed the fundamental philosophy of their public health initiative and the fact that they are carrying forward the public health initiatives to which the previous Government gave such serious attention.

[Mrs. Marion Roe]

The rewards of good health care in childhood, especially health promotion and preventive interventions, are unique, because the benefits may last a lifetime and may be passed on to future generations. We all recognise that. Therefore, it seems incredible that health visiting and school nursing posts are being dramatically reduced. That group of health professionals has played such an important role in keeping children healthy.

The Committee received an enormous volume of evidence across a wide range of topics, but several themes were prominent in every aspect of health services for children and young people. The first theme we identified was that, at present, services for children do not always consider the specific needs of children. Too often, they are based on traditional customs and practices or on professional self-interest. Children's health services must be needs-led, not based on historical patterns or the self-interest of provider groups.

That was obvious in myriad examples, some practical and involving few, if any, additional resources, such as grouping children together in out-patient clinics, rather than mixing children and adults together. Another example was of information wholly designed for adults being sent to child patients. How can a mother feel confident that her small child's needs will be met when the information that is sent refers to refraining for a defined period from returning to work or resuming sexual intercourse? We would not appreciate information advising us that we should not attend nursery school or be permitted to play boisterous games such as football. Children have as much right as adults to receive information that is appropriate to their needs.

On a more serious note, it is worrying that many of our witnesses felt that, some six years after the purchaser-provider split, purchasers still did not have the necessary commitment to, or expertise in, purchasing services that focus on the specific needs of children. Department of Health policies relating to children's services rarely appeared to have been considered by the commissioners.

Some commissioners appeared to limit specific services for children to immunisation and health surveillance. The needs of children who were ill appeared to be completely subsumed within services for adults. We therefore recommended that hospital services for children should be purchased as part of an overall package of services for children. To rectify the problem, we also recommended that each purchasing authority should appoint a lead commissioner for child health services. The Government's response was:

"We agree that health authorities could benefit from having an individual who has a lead role in the commissioning of child health services".

That lacks commitment. Again, children's specific needs are given less attention than those of adults.

A basic tenet of all Governments since 1959 has been that children should be nursed in children's wards among their own age group, with appropriate facilities for parents, play, leisure and educational activities, and that staff providing care should have undertaken specific training in children's needs, yet many witnesses gave examples of children being put in adult wards—even when there were empty beds in the children's ward—with no contact with specifically trained staff. That situation was often referred to as "surgeon's shoe leather syndrome." Some surgeons do not want to walk down the corridor to the children's ward from the adult ward in which the majority of their patients are placed.

That was clearly an example of the recurrent theme that services were too often based on traditional custom and practice or professional self-interest, and not in the best interests of the child. The Committee therefore recommended that the percentage of children admitted to adult wards should be included as a performance indicator in the Department of Health's annual hospital performance league tables. That would focus the minds of hospital managers, clinicians and purchasers on the importance of meeting that target. We also recommended that all the standards that are set out in the "Charter for Children and Young People" should be monitored.

I am sure that I was not the only member of the Committee to be staggered by the Government's response, which stated that their evidence was contrary to all that the Committee had received, as only 1.2 per cent. of children admissions are to a hospital without a children's ward. As a paediatric nurse said to me, the only reason for such a response is that the Department is being extremely economical with the truth, or deliberately obtuse, or it is completely ignorant of the reality of the situation in acute hospitals.

In reply to the Government's response to our reports, a Royal College of Nursing press release stated:

"We believe that the Government had simply failed to understand the situation. The problem is widespread in hospitals which do have children's wards and it is the reality which the Government has failed to address."

The RCN's paediatric nurse managers forum has recently completed a survey of hospitals with a children's ward. It showed that the third commonest cause of concern of paediatric nurse managers was children in adult wards.

I was pleased to note in the Government's response that they were considering whether care of a child outside a children's ward should be a centrally returned quality indicator. I should be grateful if the Minister would inform me whether a decision has been made and, if so, what it is. If no decision has been made, when will it be made, and will she assure me that her decision will be announced in the House?

The care of children in accident and emergency departments provided evidence of similar lack of implementation of well-established good practice guidelines. More children attend A and E departments during a year than are admitted to hospital. Children comprise almost one third of A and E attendees. It is reasonable to expect that high priority should be given to children's needs in those departments. The Secretary of State for Health has properly drawn attention to the violence that is now common in A and E departments. What must it be like for young children to witness such events?

The 1996 Audit Commission report "By Accident or Design" showed that even separate waiting areas for children, recommended since 1959, were uncommon. The Department's response ignores our conclusions and recommendations. I specifically ask the Minister personally to consider children in A and E departments.

Another of the "cardinal principles" stemming from 1959 is that children should be admitted to hospital only if the care that they require cannot be provided as well at home, in a day clinic or on a day basis in hospital. To facilitate that, community children's nursing services must be rapidly expanded.

The Committee was unanimous in its concern in discovering that in 1997, almost 40 years after the expansion of community children's nurses was recommended, only 50 per cent. of the country had such a service. Only 10 per cent. provided a 24-hour service. The Department of Health report on the evaluation of the pilot projects between 1992 and 1997, published last month, concluded that "community children's nurses make a vast difference to these families."

We would all agree that, whenever possible, children should be nursed at home. We were interested to learn how children's community nursing teams enable parents to care not only for children following a short acute illness or surgery, but for children who require long-term care due to major chronic illness and/or disability. That included children requiring special feeding techniques or ventilators to assist with their breathing.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Roe: No. I have so much to cover and time is limited. The hon. Lady will forgive me, but I still have some important points to put on the record.

Only a few years ago, such children, if they had survived, would have spent their whole lives in an institutional setting. Now, if community children's nursing and appropriate social care are available, not only can such children live at home with their families, but they can participate in activities of the local community and be integrated back into school—some into mainstream schools.

We were most concerned to hear that, despite continual Government recommendations to expand services, the Department has paid so little attention to their provision. Our recommendations for the rapid expansion of community children's nursing services are clearly set out in our reports. For many years, such a nursing service has been available to all adults in their own homes. We consider that, as a matter of principle, sick children need and deserve no less. It is another example of the needs of children being given less consideration than those of adults.

We all recognise that children's health needs are different from those of adults. Children become more ill more quickly and more seriously than adults do, even those with the same condition. Safety margins are much narrower and, due to their stage of development, children have difficulty in telling us what is wrong, particularly when they are ill.

Like my fellow Select Committee members, I had always assumed that health professionals, particularly those for whom children are the focus of their work, would be required to have undertaken specific training. That is not so, yet staff caring for adults undertake long training focused on the needs of adults. How strange it is that children receive an inferior service.

Clinical effectiveness is of concern to us all, yet we received evidence from surgeons that a considerable number of operations are being performed on children unnecessarily. In 1996, the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, in association with other royal colleges, issued a report entitled "Children's Surgical Services", which sets out the principles for those services. We recommended that the Department should issue explicit guidance to all those involved, reminding them of the good practice guidance and the need to monitor implementation.

While welcoming such reports from professional bodies, the Government's response is that they will consider how to encourage everyone to comply with them. That is not satisfactory. Successive Governments seem to spend considerable time "considering"; it is about time that action was required. I am waiting to see whether any action will be taken or whether such an announcement will prove to be no more than rhetoric.

An aspect of care that gave serious cause for concern—so we devoted an entire report to it—was child and adolescent mental health. Even the Department of Health witnesses agreed that current provision is inadequate in quality, quantity and geographical spread. In recent years, the House has rightly heard much about unsatisfactory mental health services, but our debates have been almost totally confined to services for adults.

Child and adolescent mental health services seem to feature at the bottom of the agenda in both mental health and child health services, and there is little public sympathy either for the children and young people concerned or for their parents.

Prevention is by far a cheaper option than treatment at a later date, when a plethora of problems have arisen, and health, social services, education and the youth justice system are involved. How many of those in prison, costing the country millions of pounds, would have become involved in criminal behaviour if their mental health difficulties had been addressed earlier? The paucity of services results in difficulty of access.

Successive Governments have devoted attention to the waiting time for surgery, but no such targets or the resources to meet them are available for child and mental health services. Only last week, the Select Committee's adviser informed me that his waiting list for an appointment is now 12 months. It is very difficult for those of us who have not had to experience the trauma associated with a mentally disturbed child or teenager to imagine what it must be like to have to wait at least 12 months for an appointment unless the child attempts suicide.

In common with consumer and professional groups, I was extremely disappointed that the Government response stated that they had no plans to set up a committee on children and young people. In Scotland and Wales, Ministers with responsibility for children review, develop and co-ordinate Government policy and strategy for children.

The House has a responsibility to represent all our constituents, particularly the most vulnerable. I was not fully conversant with how orientated our services are towards adults and so often ignore the needs of children, who represent 25 per cent. of the population and our future. Children are a vulnerable group. They have no political vote and cannot lobby Members of Parliament, yet they are not even to have parity with women by being given a Cabinet Sub-Committee. Surely that cannot be right.

[Mrs. Roe]

The Government's response stated that they have a children's strategy group, which includes representatives of all the main Government Departments concerned with children, thus co-ordinating their activities. That does not convince me that fragmentation will be reduced. It was obvious from the evidence of Government witnesses that there was much about the services of which they appeared to have little knowledge and no mechanism for obtaining it. That is not good enough.

I remind the House that children are our future. The first inquiry into service for children and young people identified the serious lack of action by successive Governments on policies that were agreed by the House, consumers and voluntary bodies. It is about time that action rather than rhetoric was forthcoming. Why are our health services so focused on the needs of adults? Surely, as the 20th century nears its end, the needs of children should receive the same attention as those of adults. A notable achievement for the millennium would be in 2000 for the Secretary of State, backed by the facts, to confirm that all the principles of health care for children and young people had been implemented.

10.17 am

Audrey Wise (Preston): I congratulate the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on chairing the Select Committee during the inquiry. It was a long inquiry. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) said that it started in February 1996. However, terms of reference and an appeal for evidence were published back in summer 1995, so we gave those in the field an ample opportunity to prepare evidence. The whole process has resulted in a substantial report of no less than eight volumes—four volumes of reports and four volumes of evidence to back up their conclusions.

One of the main and best characteristics of the work of the Select Committee is the publication of the evidence. I am pleased that, in their interim response, the Government have said that that substantial body of work would inform the debate. My only worry about the report is that it costs £131.60 to buy the whole of it, so I fear that its circulation is unlikely to be as wide as its contents merit.

Like the hon. Member for Broxbourne, I have noted that theGovernment's response is an interim one; I must advise the Minister, in the friendliest possible way, that I have carefully annotated the Government's responses, paragraph by paragraph, and will seek out suitable opportunities to pursue each one. Never let anyone think that a promise by the Government to "consider" something will be allowed to die the death: it will not.

One of the good features of the new Government's policies on health is their emphasis on the baleful effect of inequality. The Committee said:

"We were surprised to hear from the Department of Health that there was no readily accessible data on variations in child health by region and social class. It is our understanding that there is a considerable body of evidence going back to Sir Douglas Black's report in 1980,' 'Inequalities in Health', and before, which deals specifically with this topic. We welcome the Department of Health's announcement that further research into the nature and extent of variations will shortly be commissioned".

The Government's response states:

"the Secretary of State for Health has asked Sir Donald Acheson to report to him on social, geographical, ethnic and sex inequalities of health . . . The health of children is likely to be a key component of this report."

I am not sure that that sufficiently meets the case. I hope that the Government will convey to Sir Donald the firm idea that the health of children must be a key component of his report; otherwise, his report will not be the valuable document that we need.

The Committee looked first into whether children need any special attention. Are they not simply miniature adults? This view, although perhaps not entertained in theory, has been prevalent in practice. Thus, children being prepared for surgery are prepared just as though they are adults. That can be harmful, because, as we learned, children's physiology is different, and all their body processes work faster. In short, they are very different from adults. I will not dwell on all the differences, because the hon. Member for Broxbourne covered them competently.

Another difference between children and adults is that children must be considered in context. A doctor can treat an adult for a particular problem—we think ourselves quite lucky if the doctor treats us as a whole person. I do not mean any offence to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand), who is sitting directly opposite me—I hope that he will not take my strictures personally. As I was saying, we feel lucky if we are considered as a whole person rather than, say, a walking stomach.

With a child, it is not enough to say, "This is a whole person." One cannot sensibly deal with a child without dealing with that child's context—the family. Professionals dealing with children are dealing not just with individuals but with whole families. For this and many other reasons, children require a different service.

This fact seems to have been overlooked by Governments, planners and managers. We became aware that many of the professionals struggling to provide a good service feel undervalued. It is almost as though, because children are small, those caring for them, and their talents and expertise, are also thought of as small. That is a wrong point of view.

I was surprised to learn during our visit to Great Ormond street hospital that paediatrics is quite an unpopular specialty. Paediatricians often earn less than other doctors—they do not go in for private practice—and they work longer hours. In general, they are regarded somewhat as the Cinderellas of the profession.

As we continued our inquiry we discovered that there is a lamentable lack of properly qualified and trained children's nurses. Only 3 per cent. of nurses hold a children's nursing qualification. That results in a ratio of one nurse to 1,400 children, which is clearly ridiculous. Depending on where we mark the boundary between childhood and adulthood, children make up between one fifth and one quarter of the population. We do not say that between one fifth and one quarter of all nurses should be children's nurses, since children are generally reasonably healthy—but 3 per cent. is ludicrously low.

We also discovered that the guidance to the effect that there should always be two registered sick children's nurses in a children's ward during the whole 24-hour period is not observed; and whereas adults expect district nurses to treat them at home, there is no such adequate service for children. There have been district nurses for adults for about 100 years, and our report draws attention to the fact that children should be entitled to the same service. But 50 per cent. of the population have no access to properly organised, co-ordinated children's community nursing services, and only 10 per cent. have access to a 24-hour children's community nursing service. That is deplorable.

We found in the course of our inquiry that children's community nurses have additional duties; the recommendation made to us by the Royal College of Nursing about how many children's nurses are needed to provide a good community service was based on the notion that an important part of their work is training parents to do for their children what adults are not expected to do for other adults for whom they are caring. I refer, for instance, to passing nasal gastric tubes. Those of us on the Committee who are parents or grandparents found ourselves thinking about how we would have managed even if we had been lucky enough to have a trained children's nurse to show us the procedure. We were not especially enamoured of the prospect.

Our estimates of the necessary increase in the number of these nurses are based on the most conservative calculations.

Ms Drown: According to my reading of the report, the Committee found that areas with a children's community nursing service provided care that was not only better but more cost-effective. In three instances, the cost was between 11 and 43 per cent. of the cost of treating the children involved in hospital.

Audrey Wise: My hon. Friend is right, and the Government acknowledged that. I was therefore rather disappointed that, in their response to the report, they said—referring to improvements that might be made—

"This might include hospital at home schemes, community paediatric nursing and improved primary care services."

There should be no "might" about community paediatric nursing.

The eight-volume report covered many issues. One was the patients charter as it applied to children. The charter states that parents may "expect" certain things, but we discovered, on examination, that that "expectation" could be deemed to be no more than a target—something very different from a right.

We investigated the response to respite care needs, and found it to be totally inadequate. We also investigated the need for proper equipment to be provided, and heard from witness after witness that it was also very inadequate. We heard repeatedly about the fragmentation of services, and about problems relating to the boundary between social services and education, and health services. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is interested in that aspect. We certainly feel that it requires special attention, not only in relation to the elderly but in relation to children.

We found that parents were being told to take home and wash equipment labelled "For single use only". One mother who had to use a suction device to clear a child's airway was given a packet of six for a week, although she had to clear the child's airway 56 times in that week and the packet was labelled "Use once only". I hope that the Minister will take our recommendations in that regard seriously.

We considered the need for accident and emergency departments to be properly designed for children. We pointed out that, although children use accident and emergency services far more than in-patient services, some hospitals seem to ignore the fact.

We looked carefully at the whole range of children's problems and needs. My overriding impression was that, if I had to name the most important thread, it would be the nursing thread—the need for a seamless nursing service, with properly qualified nurses. Children's nurses receive excellent training, but unfortunately not all places are being taken up, because of the exigencies of training budgets.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider all those points carefully. I promise her that I shall come back to her for regular updates on the Government's interim response.

10.33 am

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): I must declare an interest, especially for the benefit of the hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise). I was destined to become a paediatrician, but moved sideways to become a holistic family doctor in general practice.

The report is valuable, as today's speeches have been. I know that time is short, but I want to highlight two parts of the report that illustrate the lack of a national strategy, which has caused confusion in regard to the local delivery of services for children. One part deals with medical advice and treatment for children in schools, and is relevant to yesterday's prolonged debate.

In many areas, school nursing services have been cut to such an extent that they have become almost irrelevant, given the vast task that needs to be performed. That task involves surveillance, immunisation, the advising of parents, teachers and pupils, the identification of social care needs, all the work connected with child abuse, the identification of special educational needs, health promotion, the support of children when they first experience anxieties about sex and, indeed, the protection of children from the consequences of sexual activity.

I am disturbed by the fact that those services have been allowed to decline without consideration of children's needs. We seem to be considering which agency is responsible for a particular service rather than what a pupil requires. As has been explained, children with a vast range of medical needs now attend normal schools. It is unreasonable to expect a single nurse to meet those needs, especially one with a potential case load of between 2,500 and 5,000 patients spread over 15 schools.

There should be a much more flexible framework, allowing specialist community nurses who may be attached to hospital departments—and practice nurses, who are very experienced in the treatment of such conditions as epilepsy and asthma—to go into schools and advise not just teachers but children themselves.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): In Cambridge and Huntingdon, in my constituency, there is a greater integration of the services provided by health visitors and school nurses, but that integration is in the context of what is euphemistically termed disinvestment. What that has actually meant is redundancies among health visitors and a reduction in services, which are focused only on children who are understood to be at risk. Because of that, we have lost the universal screening services that promote good health in children and help them to become healthy adults.

Dr. Brand: The hon. Gentleman makes a valuable point, which illustrates what I am about to say.

[Dr. Brand]

We need to use the specialist skills that are available to the community to help people in their homes and those visiting GPs, but also to help people in schools. Children are people, and they are entitled to all those specialist services. Not all services need to be delivered by specialist paediatric nurses. This is another example of the achievement that is possible for the NHS, provided that it encourages team work.

The second issue that I must mention is the provision of mental health services for children and adolescents. There seems to be almost universal confusion about the roles of education, social services and health departments. A cultural apartheid seems to apply to the various people who deliver mental health services to, in particular, children and adolescents. It is rare for educational psychologists to talk to clinical psychologists or psychiatrists, and social workers do not get much of a look in. That must be changed. It is not just the child who suffers in such circumstances.

A few years ago, the only place where I could send a psychiatrically disturbed 12-year-old lad was the local police station. The adult mental health facility would not take him, and he was too disturbed to be put in a paediatric ward in the local hospital. That is not satisfactory. It is a direct result of planning failure, which is itself due to the lack of a national strategy.

I welcome the spirit of the Government's response to the reports, but I am disappointed at the lack of detail. This debate is particularly valuable, in that it enables us to extract further details from the Minister about the direction in which she believes that these important services should go. It is not only the children who matter, but their parents, their carers, their teachers and the broader community.

10.39 am

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I shall be as brief as possible, as not only do hon. Members want to hear from the Minister, but she will want to respond to the points that have been made.

The series of reports represents a formidable piece of work. When I first read my Whip, I thought that the debate would last for three hours, which I did not think would be long enough—one could not even read the reports in that time. When I realised that it would last for only an hour and a half, I knew that our work would be cut out.

The introduction to the second report sets the scene very well. It says:

"Childhood is a period of rapid and uneven development . . . Illness, disability and problems of mental health which develop during childhood may remain with an individual throughout life . . . Twenty years have passed since the publication of the last comprehensive Government review of children's health services, the Court Report . . . The Court Report contained over 200 recommendations".

It also points out that the Department of Health said that it could not provide a check list showing whether those recommendations had been met, as there had been so many reorganisations in the national health service.

The Select Committee concludes that its consideration of reports dating back to 1959

"reinforces our view, which has gained in strength as our inquiry has progressed, that the special needs of children are given insufficient priority by policy-makers, health service professionals and others who in one way or another have a responsibility for children's well-being. Changes in attitude, not merely in policy, are clearly needed."

Although that is stated in the introduction to the inquiry, I think that it probably says it all.

Anyone listening to this debate—I take the point made by the hon. Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) that listening to it or reading it will be less expensive than buying the reports to read—will have realised that this is the House of Commons at its best. A report that was prepared under the previous Conservative Government has been introduced on the Floor of the House by the current Chairman of the Health Select Committee. Most of our work in the House is a seamless robe, which sometimes the public do not realise. I commend the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) for staying up—as I hope to do for the next few minutes—and I thank him for his kind words about the way in which the Select Committee carried out its work, including under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe).

I mentioned that the reports represent the first major inquiry since the Court report. When they were issued, they were welcomed by one and all. Baroness Jay said of the Select Committee:

"We welcome their reports, which will make a substantial contribution to the debate on children's health."

I make no criticism in saying that, although they are a substantial contribution, they must ultimately represent more than a contribution.

I have not totalled the number of specific recommendations in the reports, but even on a cursory count I reckon that there are at least 70—I could not begin to go through them all in the time I have. Indeed, it is always invidious on such occasions to highlight particular recommendations, but I shall point out the issues that struck me as relevant, in the knowledge that other hon. Members with greater experience of the Select Committee have highlighted the same recommendations.

The Select Committee said:

"health services for children and young people are not always designed to meet their needs, but may be based on traditional custom or on the convenience of the provider. They are not always delivered by appropriate staff."

It also said that it

"endorses the 'cardinal principles' set out in Department of Health guidance on hospital care for children, but doubts the extent to which they are actual achievements, rather than aspirations. In particular, the principle that children should not be in hospital unless absolutely necessary cannot be met given the current inadequacy of community nursing" care. It went on to say:

"many hospitals fail to meet the Department of Health standard of having at least two registered sick children's nurses on duty 24 hours a day . . . the Patient's Charter standard that children should be cared for in a children's ward under the care of a paediatric specialist is not being met; it is recommended that such information should be collected as part of hospital performance league tables to reinforce its importance."

That point has rightly been made by a number of hon. Members.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that children are subjected to a vast array of environmental hazards—such as ionising radiation—which may explain the increase in childhood leukaemias both in this country and in the United States? Would not reducing such hazards lead to a decrease in the number of illnesses to which young people, with their sensitive bodies, are subjected?

Mr. Nicholls: With a medically qualified doctor, the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand), sitting to my left, and another, the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), sitting opposite, I shall have to be careful in passing judgment, but I think that that must be right. The hon. Member for Preston rightly said that childhood is dangerous; like the last days of one's life, it is a difficult time. I welcome the fact that we are moving away from the idea that children are mini-adults and can be treated as such. It is difficult to know where the dividing line falls, but children's experiences are clearly different.

The Government's detailed and thorough response to the reports was commendable. As has been said, the reports represent an agenda for action—we all share the duty to ensure that there is action. Again, time does not permit me to go through the details, but I shall mention some of the responses, both to commend the Government and to point out that further action will be necessary.

On page 13, the Government say:

"We do not believe that it is acceptable for children to be treated by inexperienced and inappropriately trained staff. We shall ensure that measures are taken to address this problem. This will include continued action to increase the numbers of relevantly trained staff."

During the debate, hon. Members have stressed the importance of staff who are trained in the care and treatment of children. I believe that the Government's aspiration is laudable, and I hope that the Minister will find time to say something further about it.

In its extremely helpful briefing, the Royal College of Nursing highlights what the Government say on page 16 of their response. The Government state:

"We acknowledge the past shortages of qualified children's nurses have limited the opportunities for the health service to benefit from their skills. As the number of children's nurses increases, their skills can be utilised in many more areas of healthcare for children and young people."

The Government's reaction is fine and right, but we need the Minister to explain how the number of children's nurses will increase.

On page 38, the Government say:

"As the Committee noted, there continues to be a need for more child trained nurses. The NHS Executive has asked education commissioners to ensure that sufficient children's nurse training commissions are placed to meet the recommendations of the Clothier enquiry (to have at least two Registered Sick Children's Nurses or equivalent, on duty 24 hours a day in all hospital children's departments and wards) and, in addition, that adequate provision has been made for the staffing requirements of paediatric intensive care units."

Again, I commend the Government for their response, which was exactly right, but we need to have some idea of how they believe that they can take that process forward.

In preparing my thoughts for the debate, it seemed to me that three common themes ran through the reports. First, there is reference to the fragmentation, and lack of child-centredness, in the delivery of many child services. Secondly, there is a failure to follow existing good practice guidance. Thirdly, there is training, training and training, a point that has been made throughout the debate.

What is interesting about the reports—I say this as a compliment, not as a criticism—is not so much that they break new ground as that they remind us of how much there is that has yet to be implemented. It is significant that the Court report was issued in 1976 and that other official Committee reports go back to 1959 because it illustrates how Governments and Select Committee reports have so often failed to pick up and run with the excellent work done. I referred to the Department of Health's response that it could not comment on whether the Court report had been dealt with, because rules had changed and the matter was difficult.

New Governments have an opportunity. This Government are not quite bright and spanking new—if I may pinch a theme of an earlier debate in which the hon. Member for Wakefield and I were involved—but they are pretty new. We are also fortunate that the Minister for Public Health's commitment to the health and welfare of children is thoroughly accepted and appreciated on both sides of the House. There is an opportunity for a new Government to ensure that the sins of the past are not repeated. I would like to think that constructive suggestions by Opposition Members on how recommendations may be taken forward and the brooding and extremely experienced presence of the hon. Member for Preston, combined with what the Minister will bring to the matter, will ensure that the reports' recommendations will not suffer the same fate as the Court report, and that, in 20 years' time, they will be seen as an agenda that was taken forward.

10.50 am

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): I join others in paying tribute to the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) for her stewardship of the Select Committee on Health and her contribution to the debate. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), and particularly to my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise).

All speeches in this very important debate have made it clear that the Select Committee's conclusions and the Government's response to them are in the light of the development and implementation of children's services under the previous Government. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Preston referred to the Government's response as interim, I hope that members of the Committee will not be holding their breath over the publication of the next stage of the Government's response.

I should make it absolutely clear first that I would expect nothing less from my hon. Friend the Member for Preston than her persistence and vigilant scrutiny of Government action in the light of the reports' many recommendations, and secondly, that the Government are as one with the Select Committee in its determination to meet the many shortcomings in the service that the reports identified. I hope that there can be a spirit of partnership and common purpose as we take action in areas where the need for it has been so clearly identified.

It is important to reflect on the difference between the approach adopted by this Government and that adopted by the previous one. Several hon. Members have made clear the devastating impact of inequalities in health on children's opportunities. Inequalities are evident in almost every aspect of young children's lives. Health services for very young children are so important because they can act as an instrument to combat inequality and to promote greater fairness and opportunity for all children. That is so when judged by any measure.

[Ms Tessa Jowell]

Let us consider accident rates. The child who is born into a family of social class 4 or 5 is five times more likely to die in an accident before the age of 15 than a child from social class 1 or 2. Stark regional variations can be linked to poverty, unemployment, pollution and lack of educational achievement. Enormous regional variations occur in the incidence of tooth decay, which is very important to the developmental health of children. As our public health Green Paper makes clear in considering the likelihood of survival of children in the first year of their life, the most telling indicator is the country of birth of their mother.

Tackling inequality sits at the centre of the Government's approach to dealing with the problems that the Select Committee raised, as does our commitment to insisting on consistency of quality. The Select Committee was rightly critical of the preoccupation with numbers rather than the consideration of quality of interventions.

We are absolutely at one with the Select Committee and several speeches in the debate about the extent to which the impact of good work and services can be sabotaged by fragmentation. It is an enormous challenge for health, social and education services to move to treat the child as a whole person in context, as part of their wider family. That is the challenge for the Government, local government and local health services.

In the context of Sir Donald Acheson's report on health and equality, to which several hon. Members referred, it is important to understand that not all children who appear to suffer the same social and economic hardship necessarily suffer the same degree of ill health as a result. We need to understand much more about the protective factors that can act. That has been a major preoccupation of the review of services for children under the age of eight, which I have chaired as part of the Government's comprehensive spending review.

We intend to build on the very important contribution of prevention in our investment in the health of children, reiterating and underlining the importance of immunisation. I draw to hon. Members' attention yesterday's very important statement from the Medical Research Council and the Chief Medical Officer about the desirability of the measles, mumps and rubella vaccination to protect children against what were previously killer diseases.

Yes, we are absolutely committed to strengthening the role of health visitors and the important contribution of school nurses, but it is important that their role develops as part of the strengthening process, at a pace that reflects the change in the nature of services, the importance of overcoming fragmentation and the importance of applying evidence of what works.

Yes, we are determined to overcome the unacceptable degree of local variation and inequality in access to services. That is why the national health service White Paper stressed the importance of national frameworks. Yes, we see the development of healthy schools, harnessing the resources of health and education, as a very important contribution to overcoming fragmentation and the treatment of the child as a whole person.

I shall pass quickly through the specific points raised in the debate. On proposals for a Minister for children as a way of overcoming fragmentation, I draw hon. Members' attention to my remarks about the efforts to scrutinise across government the effectiveness of spending on children, reflecting the importance of how we put in place structures that address the whole child.

We are dissatisfied with the data on the level of community nursing available to children and on establishing the extent to which children are being treated as if they were adults requiring adult services. That is unacceptable. We recognise that that is particularly a cause for concern in relation to adolescents, which is why £2 million of the mental health specific grant will be dedicated to the development of child and adolescent mental health services. We are certainly open to the case for a lead purchaser for children. Target setting in relation to mental health is very much a preoccupation of the current consultation on the public health Green Paper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Preston made an important point about ensuring that equipment in hospitals is used only once, but clinical advice suggests that specific guidance may be provided on equipment used at home.

We are concerned about the shortage of children's nurses, as we recognise the important point that children are not merely small adults: their needs are very specific.

I hope that I have made absolutely clear the Government's commitment to acting on the recommendations of this important report. We see this is as the beginning, not the end, of the process, and we recognise that we must invest now for the future health of our children.

Railway Regulation

[Relevant document: The Third Report from the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee, Session 1997–98, on The Proposed Strategic Rail Authority and Railway Regulation (HC 286-I).]

11 am

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): One of the strengths of the House of Commons is its Select Committee procedures and the ability to take detailed evidence on matters relating to individual Whitehall Departments; to consider carefully their impact on legislation and on the future developments of particular industries; and to take account in every way of the varying views of those who are involved, in this instance, in transport.

I was thrilled to introduce the first report of the Transport Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs, on the strategic rail authority. The Committee is lucky in having representation not only from the Conservative party but from our colleagues from across the water in the Ulster parties, and I believe that it is capable of producing a high-quality piece of work.

I warmly welcome the opportunity to debate on the Floor of the House the result of Select Committees' deliberations. It is very sad when a Select Committee produces an enormously detailed and useful piece of work that is introduced at a press conference and gets some superficial publicity only if members of the specialist press happen to be present. I am grateful that the Liaison Committee has found time to recommend that we talk about the strategic rail authority this morning. I am also grateful to my colleagues on the Select Committee and to those who helped us to prepare the report.

When the railway system was fragmented, it became obvious that there would continue to be different political views on how the future of transport should be handled. The Select Committee decided not to look backwards, as we had produced a large report on privatisation before the general election, but it was clear from all the evidence we took that there were still real difficulties in railway transport.

The difficulties were not only in the structure of the existing privatised railways. It was hard to determine the best way forward, and there was an overall lack of a strategic view. We were heartened by the Secretary of State, who gave us a clear commitment, on behalf of the Government, to create a strategic rail authority. We saw our role as that of taking evidence that could help to construct that authority and ensure that it covered all the aspects of its responsibilities to the House of Commons that would make it a really effective and useful body. That is what the report delivers.

The consensus across the railway industry on the need for a strategic rail authority was heartening. Of course, some will feel that some of our recommendations went too far and will find them too political. The aims of an authority were not only accepted but asked for. Regardless of whether we spoke about the manufacturing industry, about those who deal with passengers or about those who deal with freight, it was clear that the lack of guidance, overall responsibility and forward planning was felt throughout the industry.

We took evidence on the roles of the various parts of the Government machine that deal with the railway industry: for example, the role of the regulator. We considered what the aims of a strategic authority should be, and how it should plan its use of Government finance. We deliberated how it should consider the various parts of the industry, in relation not only to one another but to the job that they are required to do for the passenger.

The strategic rail authority must, first and foremost, have responsibility to the customer, who is being badly served by the privatised railways, and to the taxpayer. It is an extraordinary fact that the taxpayer is paying double the subsidy that went to the old British Rail system, and receiving just about half the level of service. Performance is patchy across the railway industry as a whole, but it should be a matter of concern to every one of us.

We envisaged that, as the Department said, the authority should manage the existing franchise; develop a strategic vision for investment in the national network; act as a one-stop shop for progressing investment proposals; take responsibility for some of the functions currently exercised by the Secretary of State; promote integration between rail and other modes of transport; consider the need for voluntary action by the operating companies to win more passengers; and promote the needs of disabled passengers and the personal security of all rail passengers.

We also felt that there was a need for clear accountability. The taxpayer pays for the system and initiates the money-go-round whereby large sums move in a large circle that stops at a certain point. The House is responsible to the taxpayer.

We must have clear links between elected bodies and the rail authority. The Welsh assembly and the Scottish Parliament, as well as this Parliament and the regional decision-making bodies, will want to have a direct input into both the type and the quality of services. If we are to have a radical improvement in the integration of rail, a great deal of work must be done to maximise the benefits of the existing system and develop passenger and freight services.

Many of our witnesses gave a clear picture of the existing regulator's role and said that changes needed to be made and that the regulator would always have a role as an arbitrator between certain areas of the industry. We felt that, although the regulator's role needed to be revised, he should maintain an independent status, umpiring contracts and considering fair competition issues. A lot of the work of restoring the original requirement in section 4 of the Railways Act 1993 would mean, however, that he had to take guidance from the Secretary of State. The regulator accepts that he should not be operating independently.

We believe that, in discussing the future of the railway system, we should carefully consider the role of Railtrack, which is today with great fanfare launching its report on its future role, with many comments on its intended investment in the future of the railways. Many of us will regard those figures with some disenchantment—I shall not say disbelief; that would be ungracious and unacceptable—but it is important to remember that vast sums of public money go into privatised railway subsidies. Although subsidies are nominally paid to the train operating companies, most of that public money comes back to Railtrack in the form of track access charges.

[Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody]

The answer to my written parliamentary question of 3 November 1997 revealed that the subsidies paid to the train operating companies in 1996–97 amounted to £2.099 billion. The same answer revealed by some uncanny coincidence that the income to Railtrack from track access charges was almost identical. If that is not a back-door subsidy to Railtrack, I should like to know what is.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): I do not wish to breach the all-party consensus of the report, but will the hon. Lady acknowledge that the £17 billion that Railtrack intends to invest over the next 10 years is much more than the public subsidy that she described, and certainly more than the Government would have spent had British Rail remained in their hands?

Mrs. Dunwoody: There are no plans for the extension of the main-line electrification network. Cities such as Sheffield, Aberdeen, Hull and Bristol will continue to be served by diesel trains for the foreseeable future. The west coast main line continues to deteriorate every day, and Thameslink 2000, which is to paid for by a massive debt write-off by the previous Government, looks as far as away as ever. I should be happy if Railtrack's figures materialised in practical investment terms.

The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) is a valued member of my Committee and knows that there is considerable disquiet about the way in which Railtrack does its accounting. It has not been transparent in the past, and maintenance is not regarded by most qualified accountants as a suitable heading in connection with investment. It is clear that Railtrack has not lived up to the previous record. It has needed to be prompted, to put it in the most polite way, by the authorities already because of the shortfall in investment. It is obvious that it has considerably underspent on track and structure renewals. There is a £385 million backlog on property maintenance. Those figures are a great worry, which we must consider carefully.

Our report sets out the belief that Railtrack should no longer control safety. Our railways have always had good safety, from the time when a man walked in front with a red flag. We are a little faster than that, although not on all privatised lines. The Committee believes that there is a problem in safety remaining part of the existing organisation. The time has come to set up an independent transport safety authority that would not only continue to safeguard the levels of care that have been endemic in the railway industry, but prove to the customer how independent it is and what a good job is being done at every level. We want Railtrack to lose that aspect of its work. We should like safety regulation and the safety standards directorate to be transferred to an independent safety authority.

We also make considerable recommendations on the need to transfer freight from road to rail. There is no point in Governments talking about that need unless there is a practical way of achieving it. I hope that our suggestions will be acted on.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): Freight is a significant factor in the report. The relationship between road and rail transport—the intermodal system—must encourage more freight on to rail. A significant void exists there. Does my hon. Friend agree that we must impress on Ministers that the intermodal exchange between road and rail is important and should be developed?

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Committee not only emphasised that but offered various solutions, given the need for clear strategic planning if we are to achieve that useful aim.

We also suggested that customers have little idea who is responsible for what in a fragmented railway. It is all very well for those of us who understand what Railtrack is supposed to be and what train operating companies and ROSCOs—rolling stock companies—do. Customers waiting for trains, late or otherwise, have little understanding. We were disturbed because we did not believe that existing customer organisations were easily accessible or understood or that they were performing the task necessary to reassure customers.

If we are to have standards, customers must know what they are and how to complain efficiently and simply, and they must be sure that something will be done about their complaints. We suggested that the consumer organisations should be reorganised and given a much higher profile. They must have ways of advertising what they are doing and be given a bit of muscle, so that they can shout out for the passenger. That need is felt strongly by anyone who uses the existing system.

The SRA will provide a comprehensive, clear, single body reporting to the Secretary of State. It will analyse the needs and demands of the new railway system to find which aspects are failing. It will insist on high customer standards and ensure that investment goes where it is needed, when it is needed. It will seek high-quality standards so that the ways in which passengers receive services are clearly marked and capable of delivery. It should also promote a radical improvement of the integration of rail with other transport modes.

In achieving its aims, it will need to demonstrate to the public that we are no longer prepared to accept considerable amounts of taxpayer's cash going in without clear accountability and transparency of accounting procedures, and without direct responses to the needs of customers: high-quality rolling stock; high-quality services; clean, tidy and safe stations; and proper facilities for those who use the system.

To that end, we suggested that the Minister should seriously consider whether the British Railways Board should be used as a benchmarking facility. The franchises will have to be examined as they come up. Many of us believe that some of them will collapse before the end of the franchise period. The board could be used to judge the efficiency of the system and whether it is delivering what it should. There may even be a case, although there is political disagreement about this in the Committee, for the Government taking equity in Railtrack to ensure that there is a clear line of accountability to the passengers who use the service.

I hope that the House will not just debate the report, but act on it. It is a good report—although that may be rather immodest from the Chairman of the Committee. Again, I should like to pay tribute not only to the individual members, but to those who helped us prepare and take evidence.

The report looks forward, but—for obvious reasons—it will be differently interpreted in different parts of the House. However, it is constructive, useful and detailed, and it needs to be acted upon. I expect my Government to lead the way in giving that chance to the transport system of the new century.

11.19 am

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), and I should like to express my appreciation of the way in which she chaired the Select Committee. Those of us who know her know that she is a lady of considerable views, and it was a marvellous feat for her to chair a Committee in which there was a great deal of consensus. Speaking as someone who admires her for her views, I was pleased to see today that she occasionally returned to type.

This is the first major report produced by the Committee, and I wish to refer to the way in which Opposition Members have approached it. It is clear that the Government intend to have a strategic rail authority. We had a choice of either blindly opposing everything and trying to wreck the Committee, or of laying down benchmarks for when we examine the matter in a Bill. The latter was the right approach. The railways have gone through a period of considerable change and upheaval, and they need a period of stability in which long-term investment can be committed.

Railtrack and the train operating companies have an impressive programme of work planned, but investment takes time. I must take issue with the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich—£17 billion is a serious sum. Some £5.5 billion on maintenance is a serious sum. Some £8 billion on renewals is a serious sum, and enhancements of more than £3 billion involve a serious sum of money. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) said, there would have been nothing like those levels of investment within the public sector.

It is early days, but rail privatisation is following the same predictable path as previous privatisations—unpopular in its early stages, with all the cumulative ills of the past half-century being blamed on privatisation. If we were to substitute BT or British Airways for Railtrack in the current headlines, we could run the same stories as ran previously. Those who predicted gloom and despondency then had to eat their words, and they will have to do so again.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich): Does the hon. Gentleman share my concerns and those of my constituents at two derailments in my constituency earlier this year? One involved a passenger train in which eight carriages out of 10 derailed. That had never been heard of before rail privatisation. Does he accept that there are occasions when Railtrack may be forcing contractors to do work on the cheap, something that affects not only the track maintenance but the employees of the contractors—all of which has happened since privatisation?

Mr. Pickles: I ask the hon. Gentleman to read the evidence from the Deputy Prime Minister. I specifically asked him about such claims, and he said that there was no evidence that Railtrack had in any way compromised itself in terms of safety. On this occasion, the Deputy Prime Minister's word is good enough for me.

In a perverse way, the change of Government has made the commitment of capital slightly easier, because there is a realisation that there is no possibility—as the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich said—of renationalisation. The old British Railways Board is dead ,and soon, we hope, will be forgotten. The future of the railways remains firmly in the hands of the private sector. The Committee was not attempting to renationalise the railways or to make them vulnerable to short-term political interference. Those points might have been better made before privatisation, as the taxpayer would have received considerably more money had the uncertainty been removed.

We have seen a steady growth in passenger numbers, reversing the decline that occurred over a number of years. The evidence suggests that passenger growth could be as high as 25 per cent. by 2005. It is important that we look at the subsidy, which is set to decline over the next 10 years, and we must remember that a lot of BR debt was taken on by the companies.

The hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) and the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich referred to freight, which BR largely neglected. A 20-year decline in this country was reversed once English, Welsh and Scottish Railways took over. Less than 6 per cent. of freight in this country is transported by rail. On the continent of Europe, the figure is a more impressive 15 per cent. The evidence from EWS was that it was likely to triple its business within 10 years, and it is not unreasonable to suggest that, by 2010, 20 per cent. of freight will go by rail. That is 20 per cent. of a growing market.

There are a number of practical restraints on the further expansion of freight, and those need some attention. First, there is the problem of the restrictive loading gauge. If we are to see any significant increase in freight, we must ensure that high gauges are available. That will allow new international containers to be used, and it will also allow for the possibility of increasing the capacity of wagons by about a third. More importantly, it will allow piggy-backing of heavy goods vehicles. The last point was referred to by the Deputy Prime Minister as vital for haulage in the long term.

There is a considerable conflict between the needs of passengers and the needs of freight. Improvements for passengers—faster trains and more frequent services—often work to the detriment of freight. We must understand that there are environmental considerations, including noise problems. Much of freight is moved at night. I live about half a mile from a busy railway line, and I have noticed an increase in the amount of traffic in the past few months. Constituents who live closer to the track have started to complain—not unnaturally—about disturbed sleep.

We must remember that most of our freight is not time-critical; a load is sent off, but it does not matter whether it arrives the following day or a couple of days later. However, if we are to increase the amount of freight that travels by rail, we have to be able to carry time-critical freight, which means that people will be able to guarantee that a load leaving Aberdeen can be in Brentwood the following morning.

The Committee also gave consideration to the problems of international rail travel. The channel tunnel has not yet proved to be the catalyst in persuading road hauliers to switch to rail; in fact, the tonnage carried is roughly 40 per cent. of the predicted level. The cost of travelling through the tunnel and on continental railways is such that it starts to become economic only when there is the prospect of travelling through the Alps. Continental European railways are still heavily nationally focused, and it remains, peculiarly, easier to get a truck across a European border than it is to get a train across; trucks have to fill in fewer forms, and the process is quicker.

[Mr. Pickles]

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): Might not our concentration on the channel tunnel prove to be to the detriment of the 96 per cent. of British imports and exports that go through ports? In addition to the other measures that the hon. Gentleman suggests, it might be a good idea to follow a policy of ensuring that Railtrack improvements relate to movements in and out of ports, especially bottlenecks in freight movements immediately around ports.

Mr. Pickles: I do not take issue with that at all, but I believe that the channel tunnel plays an important part in the expansion of rail. I find it difficult to explain to constituents who are hauliers why it is considerably more expensive—three times more expensive, according to the Road Haulage Association—to take a heavy goods vehicle through the tunnel than to send it in the shuttle, which uses the same track and the same tunnel.

The report covers two controversial matters: the equity share in Railtrack and the British Rail Board competing for franchises. We received little evidence on that, except from Save Our Railways and the Labour Finance and Industry Group, both of which seemed to take a similar position on most issues of substance. To my way of thinking, the credibility of Save Our Railways was somewhat dented when it had to withdraw some exaggerated claims in front of the Committee, as hon. Members can read in the second volume at paragraph 197.

Mr. Gray: Is my hon. Friend aware that Save Our Railways' offices are in precisely the same place as the rail unions' offices and that it is, to a significant and majority degree, financed by the rail unions?

Mr. Pickles: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, of which I had not been aware, even though, at times when listening to Save Our Railways' evidence, it was like living on the last page of George Orwell's "Animal Farm", when it was no longer possible to tell the pigs from the people.

Although the strategic rail authority may care to consider whether the Government should take an equity share in Railtrack, it would be madness to do so. It would achieve nothing: not a single mile of track would be laid, nor an additional carriage purchased, nor a single station made cleaner; there would be nothing but the resonance of old clause IV.

As the report states, for the British Rail Board to compete on "a fair and transparent basis",

it would have to be in the private sector. If it were in the public sector, it would intimidate and prevent fair competition. Any analogy between BRB competing for a franchise and a local authority contracting out to a direct labour organisation is frankly ridiculous. There was no evidence to support that view, other than from Save Our Railways and the Labour Finance and Industry Group.

If the strategic rail authority becomes a hands-on authority, second-guessing commercial decisions, it will fail. If it takes away powers from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and remains truly strategic in nature, it may succeed. It needs to tackle that delicate and crucial balance between the needs of passengers and those of freight. Above all, in the words of the report, the SRA needs "to foster a climate that encourages private investment in the railways".

11.34 am

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): I wish to raise with the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) one point that I consider to be a significant factor in this debate. When the previous Government privatised the railway industry, the franchises given to many of the companies were so short that the companies now feel that it is not possible to invest in new rolling stock or the new materials that are required to ensure that they can meet the demand for passenger and freight services. The Conservative Government did not give sufficient thought to the way in which the privatisation should have taken place, and I hope that the Select Committee's report will address some of the deficiencies of the privatisation programme.

Mr. Pickles: May I ask the hon. Gentleman a simple question? Is he advocating that the franchises should now be extended and, if so, by how long?

Mr. O'Brien: I can advise the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions is now considering representations from some of the franchisees, particularly Great North Eastern Railway, which is suffering from overcrowded trains and having difficulty meeting demand. My right hon. Friend is rightly giving consideration to the circumstances of a very competitive line in an area that will improve considerably as time goes on. There is one proviso, which is that the companies keep fares at a level that people can afford; otherwise, there is a danger that we might have a railway system that is out of the reach of many of those who would like to use it. My right hon. Friend has to look at many factors when considering the extension of franchises, and I support his views on that issue.

I felt that I had to draw the attention of the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar to the deficiency in the hurried rail privatisation programme of the previous Administration, although I do not want to move away from the Select Committee report. There are pages of evidence from the various witnesses, who contributed well to the work of the Committee. In each case, there was general support for the introduction of the strategic rail authority and, with the support in the House and within the industry, there is a fair wind for the Committee's proposals. I make that point to my right hon. Friend the Minister because I consider that the Government must act on at least some of the recommendations in the report. Failure to do so would impede the programme for an integrated transport system, which the report could help to bring about.

That was the point that I made when I intervened on my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). We need to have the integration of road transport with rail transport to ensure that freight provision, which has been neglected for so long, can be improved. Although in the past rail freight has been moved during the night, there is evidence that some freight trains are being moved by day. That will help freight movements to take place within a reasonable time and, as a result, people will increasingly accept the possibility of moving freight by rail.

Hon. Members will have received briefing material from the Scottish, Welsh and English railways, setting out some of the anxieties that they expressed to the Select Committee—directly and in briefing material—about the introduction of the strategic rail authority. We are advised that they are introducing new locomotives and new wagons, which shows that greater capacity is needed to move freight by rail.

I emphasise that we must try to remove lorries from the motorways and, in many instances, from towns and cities, by transferring freight to rail, so that it may enter city centres without creating road traffic. I make a plea to the Minister to examine the evidence that has been submitted on overcrowding of some trains—especially on the east coast main line—and the evidence submitted by Lord Berkeley and his colleagues on the movement of freight.

I conclude my remarks because I know that my colleagues, who took evidence for many long hours, want to make a contribution. I believe that the Government should act on a significant amount of that evidence, and I hope that the Minister will take note of the contributions that have been made.

11.41 am

Mr. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): Although I welcome the opportunity to debate the report, I regret the fact that none of my party served on the Transport Sub-Committee, which considered this matter in so much detail. However, I have read the report, and there is much in it that the Liberal Democrats can support.

We welcome the fact that the report draws attention to failings in the regulatory system introduced by the previous Government in their headlong ideological rush to privatise the network. The report says that, under the Conservatives, the Rail Regulator was left with "no enforceable obligation on Railtrack to spend the cash from public subsidies on maintenance and renewal of the network".

That appears to be a major omission, as does the fact that the Rail Regulator was left without scrutiny powers over the rolling stock companies.

The Rail Regulator had to dismiss Railtrack's 1997 network management statement as unsatisfactory because of a significant backlog in investment. Earlier today, Railtrack had an opportunity to show that it took last year's red light seriously. I hope that it will be evident from this year's network management statement that Railtrack acknowledges that it has a role in the development of the country's infrastructure.

The results of biannual customer satisfaction surveys produced by the train companies, which must have been of great interest to passengers, remained unpublished for many years. I am sure that the volunteers who run the Bluebell railway could have run the railways better than the previous Administration did.

Looking to the future, many of the report's recommendations would have been implemented even if a strategic rail authority had not been established. We support more demanding train service quality targets. We strongly support the moratorium on the sale of land by the British Railways Board, which is a source of major concern. If one is trying to extend a network, it restricts one's scope if all the prime sites that can be used are being sold.

Mr. Gray: If the hon. Gentleman considers the report carefully, he will see that there is no question of a moratorium on the sale of land by the British Railways Board, but that there is a question of Railtrack being given the same opportunity as other bidders when land is sold. That is a different matter. There is no presumption in the report that the right of the British Railways Board to sell land will be interfered with.

Mr. Brake: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, but the report specifically mentions a moratorium.

We strongly support the retention of the fines and penalties levied on the train operators for immediate reinvestment in passenger benefits rather than the Chancellor's slush fund. We support the shift of responsibilities for safety matters from Railtrack to an independent body, although it is worth confirming that, as was said earlier, the safety record appears to have remained very good, even after privatisation. We support the relaunch of the rail user committees. Those organisations are supposed to represent passengers, but I am afraid that their profile appears to be no larger than the stickers that are stuck in train carriages.

Our support for the report is qualified. We question how strategic the strategic rail authority will be if all the report's recommendations are adopted. There is a great risk that, by taking on so many of the operational tasks performed by the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising and the Rail Regulator, the strategic rail authority will lose its focus and neglect key objectives, such as that of developing a vision for investment in the national rail network. The strategic rail authority should be about strategy and broad objectives; it should not be about the timetabling of the 7.23 am Connex South Central service from Carshalton Beeches to Victoria. Moreover, the creation of the strategic rail authority should not involve such an upheaval in the rail industry, or such a diversion of funds, that no progress is made in clearing the backlog of between 15 and 20 bottlenecks in the system.

We seek clarification of the funding arrangements for the strategic rail authority, especially as a sharp drop in subsidy is planned for the train operating companies—from £1.8 billion this year to £0.8 billion in 2002–03. It would have been preferable had greater consideration been given to the establishment of a strategic transport authority. That would, by necessity, have had a very restricted remit, to avoid the prospect of the operational overload that already worries us in relation to the smaller responsibilities of a strategic railway authority.

The Government have repeatedly stated their intention to produce an integrated transport policy. What better way is there of promoting such a policy than through the auspices of a strategic transport authority? For example, that strategic transport authority might take responsibility for devising the Government's programme of CO_2 reduction in relation to transport. That is an area where, if action is not taken almost immediately, the Government will not have a snowball in hell's chance of meeting the Prime Minister's commitment to a 20 per cent. reduction by 2010, or even the Deputy Prime Minister's more modest commitment to ensure that, in 2002, traffic does not exceed 1997 levels.

[Mr. Brake]

The Liberal Democrats approve of many of the measures in the report. We shall monitor the development of the strategic rail authority, but we shall pull the emergency cord if the authority grows into an inflexible, unwieldy beast, with an appetite for detail but no vision.

11.48 am

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): The importance of the report is that it is forward-looking.

The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles), spoke about a period of stability. If that means maintaining the status quo, with our railways not delivering what we want them to deliver, I would disagree with him. I suspect that many of the interests running our railways see stability in that way. The report is not about the stability of the status quo, because the status quo is not acceptable.

The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar also spoke about Railtrack's plans for investment—good: we live in hope, and we hope that those plans become reality. Heaven knows the amount of public money that was squandered by the previous Government on privatising the railways. It was billions. The amount of public subsidy has doubled since privatisation—a fact which I am sure the hon. Gentleman would acknowledge. One would expect some hard evidence of the improvements that we are promised. In the public interest we can demand that those improvements take place. We shall wait and see.

Mr. Gray: Evidence is in place already. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Railtrack's investment in the first six months of last year was 38 per cent. higher than in the first six months of the previous year?

Mr. Stevenson: I am also aware of the damaging criticism of Railtrack's record by the regulator and the Health and Safety Executive. That is not a political point that we need waste the time of the House debating, as the hon. Gentleman seems determined to do. Well-respected outside organisations are extremely critical of Railtrack's investment record. The report rightly concerns itself with that criticism.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) referred to the intention that the public subsidy should be reduced over the next few years. I know that that is the intention, but if it is reduced to £0.8 billion, it might bring us back to the level of public subsidy that existed under the dead hand of British Railways. If many more such dead hands are removed, the Treasury will have apoplexy, because every time a dead hand is removed, the public subsidy doubles. I am sure that that is not what the Government want.

The significance of the report is that it tells Government that we need to take a strategic view of our railway infrastructure and provision. That never occurred to the previous Government. They were concerned only with privatising and fragmenting the railway system, which is what happened. The report points out to Government that, if the railways are to play the economic, social and environmental role that the country wants them to play, a strategic overview is essential.

The Committee was of the unanimous view that we cannot achieve that strategic approach with the present fragmented system. It would be impossible, and the Government should not waste their time trying to do it. We therefore strongly support the concept of a strategic rail authority, which would have an over-arching responsibility to bring a strategic view to a critical provision in our transport sector. As the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar rightly observed, that provision brings not only enormous challenges but enormous potential. We want the strategic rail authority to play a central role in ensuring that that potential is achieved.

That is the first point that needs to be made to my hon. Friend the Minister, who is listening intently to the debate. That message is the factor of overriding importance that the Committee considered when we took evidence and deliberated on the contents of the report.

The second aspect that I would underline is the difficult but crucial concept of public confidence. It is true that there is no hard evidence to suggest that safety is being compromised by Railtrack and the train operating companies, but there is undoubtedly a public perception that the profit motive will ultimately override those considerations. We examined the matter carefully.

Public confidence is essential if the Government are to succeed in the enormously important task of reinvigorating our railways. In that regard, the report makes several recommendations, one of which is crucial—that we should no longer tolerate the responsibility for safety being left with Railtrack. There must be a separate, free-standing body to examine the issue dispassionately, far removed from the profit motive and commercial interests. The public interest must be its overriding responsibility. If, at the end of the debate, my hon. Friend will say that the Government will pursue that aim vigorously, they will have done the railway industry, the country and the public at large a great service.

My final point involves a different aspect of the public interest. How do we bring to bear the enormous influence—not interference, but legitimate influence—of Government, for which the report calls and which most of us want? How can we, for example, tolerate a situation where the rolling stock companies were given a licence to print money?

Mr. Gray indicated dissent.

Mr. Stevenson: It is no good the hon. Gentleman shaking his head. When the Angel leasing company was sold off, Nomura bank of Japan made a windfall profit of £750 million without lifting a finger. The report challenges the House and the Government to decide whether there is a legitimate public interest when public resources are milked away like that, producing no beneficial effect on the economic, social and environmental objectives in which our railways can play such a big part.

I am delighted that the report concludes that we can no longer tolerate the rolling stock companies being completely unregulated. Public interest demands that such activity be brought within the confines of positive and effective regulation so that we may see exactly what is happening. That is one example of how the public interest—which was our overriding consideration when we addressed these factors—would be well served by the Government.

I listened with interest to the points made by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington, who said that the strategic rail authority should not become a great amorphous body that is involved with the 6.30 train travelling from point A to point B. People will travel not on the strategic rail authority but on the 6.30 train from point A to point B. However, the strategic rail authority should have legitimate concerns about what is happening.

We cannot continue to tolerate the present situation: an individual turns up at a railway station and finds that the train to Euston is not running; he is told that the next train is scheduled to leave in an hour but, when he tries to book on that train, he is informed that there is no guarantee that it will run either; the individual then asks, "Well, what do you advise?", and a representative of the privatised rail company at the railway station tells him, "Our advice, sir, is not to travel by train."

Must we continue to tolerate a situation whereby an individual turns up at a railway station and sees a notice saying, "We are issuing tickets only for travel today"? What happens if that person wishes to travel tomorrow? When we ask about such matters, we receive no explanation. Is that serving the public interest? I guarantee that the information I have offered to the House is correct, because I was that individual.

The report is positive and forward-looking. It does not go over the entrails of the chaos created by the previous Government. We know all about that. I look forward to the day—in the not too distant future—when this Government, of whom I am so proud, enact the majority, if not all, of this report's recommendations.

12.1 pm

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): I begin by congratulating the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee on choosing this subject for its first report. The Deputy Prime Minister and his colleagues have made it clear that they intend to give transport a high profile in this Parliament. Therefore, it is right to address the issue at an early stage.

The Select Committee has made it clear that it intends to follow the debate closely. Under the wise stewardship of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), it will clearly be a robust debate. The hon. Lady has clear views about the type of transport system that she wants to see. With great respect to her, I think that the language she employed today is a lot stronger than that used in the report. The tone of the speech by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Stevenson) was also much stronger than that of the report.

I sense that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich may have wished for a more robust report. Her approach differs from my own, but at least we share the same objective. We want to achieve a satisfactory solution, although we differ about the means of securing that solution. From a reading of the Government's evidence, it is apparent that the hon. Lady's approach may be stronger than that of the Government. That will create difficulties for the hon. Lady and the Government, as I believe that they are on the same side.

Mrs. Dunwoody: So they tell me.

Mr. Ottaway: The report's central premise is that it welcomes the Government's proposals for a strategic rail authority. The Government have produced no firm proposals in that regard, but the nature of the report is immediately clear when it states that the SRA should be responsible for "strategic planning, co-ordinating and supervising the activities of the rail industry".

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich put her own interpretation on that statement—indeed, I believe that the statement is open to interpretation, and I suspect that the Government may interpret it slightly differently when they draw up their plans.

The report rightly does not recommend a strategic transport authority at this stage. I will go further and say that I hope that it does not recommend a strategic transport authority at any stage. I believe that the Government are the strategic transport authority: they have the powers, the funds—and, I hope, the vision—to embrace all community issues.

It is interesting to note that the report does not criticise the principle of rail privatisation. That is not surprising when one considers the effective role of Conservative Members on the Committee, including my hon. Friends the Members for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles), for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Gray) and for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). The report is full of constructive criticism, but it accepts the overall privatisation principle. I am delighted that, in its recommendations, the report states:

"The purpose of the Strategic Rail Authority should be to . . . foster a climate that encourages private investment in the railway".

That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar but not mentioned by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich. The conclusion is welcomed by Committee members, some of whom, I confess, I thought felt differently.

Mr. Gray: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is rather curious that the tones of old Labour have reverberated around the Chamber this morning more strongly than they resound in the report? The same applies to press coverage of the report last week. For example, a headline in The Times said, "Greater state control of rail urged by MPs". Does my hon. Friend agree that the report proposes a modest administrative change and in no sense attacks the principle of privatisation?

Mr. Ottaway: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Stevenson: If that is your story, stick to it.

Mr. Ottaway: The hon. Gentleman implies that he does not agree with my hon. Friend. I believe that the report is fairly balanced and that the Government will probably be rather pleased by its tone, which differs from the personal inclinations of some Committee members.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the goal of a Select Committee is to reach a consensus?

[Mrs. Dunwoody]

I know that it will come as a shock to the hon. Gentleman to learn that I hold different views from the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles). He is a most remarkable Member of Parliament, but not one with whom I agree on every point regarding the political development of this country. That means that the report will not reflect all my beliefs; nor will it reflect everything that the hon. Gentleman believes. Its tone is consensual and its strength comes from that very quality.

Mr. Ottaway: I am obliged to the hon. Lady. She confirms my suspicions that the report is welcomed neither by her side nor by my side of the Committee—although it will probably be welcomed by the Government.

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is not true.

Mr. Ottaway: The hon. Lady has just said that she does not believe in much of the report. I am sure that the whole House—and, indeed the whole country—has heard her words.

In reaching its conclusions, I have no doubt that the Committee was influenced by the evidence given by the passenger transport executive organisations, which were no particular friends of the previous Government but which are inclined not to condemn the policy. It is very early days in the privatisation of the railways and, although there is much justified criticism at present, I believe that it is wrong to take a snapshot of the railways as they stand in March 1998 and say that privatisation has failed. I do not think that privatisation will fail.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us when he will confirm that there is a problem?

Mr. Ottaway: I shall turn to that issue in a moment. Frankly, I think that the real effect of privatisation will not be felt for three, four or five years. When some of the investment comes on stream, I believe that the hon. Gentleman will defend railway privatisation like a good Tory. There will be a marked change of attitude in a couple of years.

I have a great deal of faith in franchisees' ability to improve services, and such improvements will result largely from the economic freedom achieved by privatisation. Privatisations over the past 50 years have all struggled initially. One of the first privatisations, that of British Telecom, was unpopular and passionately opposed by the Labour party. Newspapers and Labour Members gleefully reported on the number of telephone kiosks that were not working. The criticism was similar in style to that which is being heaped on the railways. People were right to criticise BT then, and they are right to criticise the railways now. However, no one in their right mind would say that privatisation of BT was a mistake. The company is a world beater of which Great Britain can rightly be proud. In four or five years, that will be the case with the railways.

Mr. Donohoe rose—

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) rose—

Mr. Ottaway: I give way to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South.

Mr. Donohoe: Why did a previous Chairman of the Select Committee call railway privatisation a poll tax on wheels?

Mr. Morgan: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with those—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway) should answer the first intervention before he deals with a second. He cannot take two at a time.

Mr. Ottaway: I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was dealing with them as a job lot.

I do not agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South about railway privatisation being a poll tax on wheels. It will come right in the long term. He has fallen into the trap of thinking that the position today will continue in perpetuity, and that railway privatisation has therefore failed.

Mr. Morgan: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with franchisees who argue that franchise periods are too short to make the necessary investment and that the Conservative Government got it wrong?

Mr. Ottaway: I shall come to that point in a moment.

Dr. Whitehead: Is not rail privatisation structurally different from other privatisations because the market relationship between carriage and track charges clearly acts against social policies, such as carrying more freight by rail? Labour Members have suggested that the structural institutionalisation of the possible failure of the system is a problem.

Mr. Ottaway: I think that I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but freight is a success story of privatisation.

BT is a world-beating company that we can be proud of, and in the long term we shall be proud of Railtrack, which is involved in discussions about the channel tunnel rail link, is a possible bidder for London Underground and announced today a £17 billion package which the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich churlishly did not to welcome. The strength of the company in the private sector justifies the privatisation. The old, nationalised British Railways Board would not have been able to match Railtrack's investment and its involvement in the channel tunnel rail link and London Underground.

We all know that the west coast main line is hugely unreliable, but Virgin proposes a £1 billion order for 130 tilting trains that will knock 90 minutes off the journey time from London to Glasgow and reduce the trip to Birmingham to 75 minutes. Labour Members should be patient: just as BT became effective, we will have effective railways in three or four years' time when the investment has been made.

I am the first to admit that, 18 months after the completion of privatisation, there are problems, some of which are becoming clearer. There is an important distinction between current railway operations and long-term investment plans. In the short term, the passenger service is everything. My constituency contains 11 commuter stations in the Connex South Central area. I watch developments closely; after an excellent start and increased services, the service has become unreliable and unacceptable. Trains do not have enough carriages, and conditions are squalid at peak times; but trains are becoming victims of their own success. Passenger numbers are increasing, and the forecast is that they will continue to rise.

The Deputy Prime Minister believes that that is largely explained by the well-established link between rail use and economic growth. However, it cannot wholly be explained by that link, and, not surprisingly, the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising took a different view and expected passenger growth of 24 per cent. over the next five or six years. I share that view, because improvements brought about by rail privatisation—better stations, improved services and falling fares in real terms—will make a heck of a difference to public attitudes, and will go a long way to achieving the strategic objectives of both the previous and the current Government.

There is a problem with continuity of investment as the end of the franchise periods approaches, as the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Forsythe) said. A weakness of the franchise system is that the Government of the day were so nervous that they took a number of precautions to deal with any failures, but the system is short on mechanisms to cope with success and a large growth in demand.

Although under no obligation to do so under the terms of the franchise, Great North Eastern Railways wants to improve its rolling stock, which is not old, but unexpected passenger growth is causing serious problems. As the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) said, short franchise periods make it difficult to fund further investment.

I am pleased that the Select Committee has strongly recommended that the strategic rail authority should have the power to offer guarantees to existing franchisees who propose to invest in new rolling stock, and that subsequent franchisees should be required to take over the lease for such stock. The tone of the recommendation is a little heavy, but the SRA should address the issue and I am pleased that it is a priority.

An interesting passage of the report deals with freight, which is an unambiguous success story of privatisation. The report does not quarrel with that. The nation's main freight mover is English, Welsh and Scottish Railways, which has about 90 per cent. of the market. EWS reports a 30 per cent. increase in freight train miles in the past 18 months.

The Select Committee suggests that the SRA should consider how to increase freight carrying, but companies seem to be doing well without the SRA intervening. The Minister appears restless. How much time does he need to make his winding-up speech?

The Minister of Transport (Dr. Gavin Strang): I need 15 minutes.

Mr. Ottaway: I shall conclude my remarks.

Although Conservative Members have reservations about the report, we have no difficulties with the thrust of it. Such a complex privatisation needs constant fine tuning. The previous Government would have concluded that a strategic rail authority was necessary during this Parliament. However, I urge the Government to adopt the lighter touch proposed in their evidence to the Select Committee, given that a strategic rail authority, not an executive rail authority, has been proposed.

12.18 pm

The Minister of Transport (Dr. Gavin Strang): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) and her fellow Select Committee members on their thorough and wide-ranging report on the Government's proposals for a new rail authority and railway regulation.

The Government welcome the report, and we shall consider its recommendations carefully when finalising our plans for the railways, which will be published in a few months.

The Committee's report is timely: it is almost exactly a year since rail privatisation was completed. In that year, the industry and its customers had to try to come to terms with the massive upheaval that was imposed on them by the fragmentation of the network. During that time, the shortcomings of privatisation have become all too obvious. Many passengers are not getting the service improvements that were promised by the previous Government. In that year, a few people have made fortunes from the railways, but many passengers have been short-changed.

Mr. Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley): Does my hon. Friend agree that the proposed acquisition of Great Western by First Group is an example of the rail privatisation leading to the creation of millionaires at the expense of the travelling public? The privatised railways are in danger of creating more millionaires than the lottery. Does he further agree that the franchising director should not let that acquisition go ahead until there has been proper consultation and proper equity among the franchisers? He should not use his position improperly to pass on some of the benefits to a franchise that is not involved in the takeover.

Dr. Strang: I agree with my hon. Friend that huge and unjustified private profits have been made from the resale of assets. The case that my hon. Friend cites looks like another example of that. He asks about the franchising director. Because of the shortage of time I shall not reply to that now, but shall write to my hon. Friend.

The Committee's report highlights well the shortcomings that we inherited from the previous Administration. We saw those problems coming, and that was why in opposition we consistently opposed rail privatisation. When we came to power in May we found a railway system that had been broken into a hundred pieces, and no strategic vision for the development of the network. Even the industry regulators acknowledge that the regulatory structure can be confusing. The railways were crying out for some leadership and direction.

[Dr. Strang]

Everybody acknowledges that the challenges facing the rail industry cannot be solved overnight. However, the Government have made clear their intentions. We aim to put the railways at the heart of a truly integrated transport policy; to win more passengers and freight to rail and, above all, to make sure that the railways are run in the public interest. That is why we are taking a long, hard look at the present regulatory structure, and why we have taken action within it where we can.

The House will recall that on 6 November I announced the first fruits of our review of railway regulation. We issued the franchising director with new objectives that deal with the issues that matter most to passengers—investment in decent rolling stock and stations, high standards of punctuality and reliability and the protection of passenger rights. We approved the franchising director's new planning criteria to provide an effective framework for developing and implementing worthwhile rail investment that will improve the range and quality of the services for rail users. We also agreed a voluntary concordat between Ministers and the Rail Regulator to give the regulator a clear sign of what the Government want for the railways.

We have also taken action on rail freight. We have revitalised the freight grants scheme and have increased its budget to encourage more rail freight. We have also secured commitments from the French Government and Eurotunnel that are designed to get a better deal for rail freight through the channel tunnel and beyond, not only by English, Welsh and Scottish Railways but by potential new entrants to the market.

Our measures on passenger and freight operations have been widely welcomed. Some train operators have played their part by taking steps to improve their services to passengers, but the overall picture is still unsatisfactory and there is much more to do. As the Committee's report states, the recent bulletin from the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising on the performance of the train operating companies in 1997–98 shows that punctuality and reliability on about half of the route groups surveyed were worse than in the preceding 12 months. The comments by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway) reflect that deterioration.

I shall now turn to the centrepiece of our proposals—the new rail authority. Our manifesto contained a commitment to create a new rail authority to provide a clear, coherent and strategic programme for the railways, so that passengers' expectations could be met. I am pleased to note the Committee's endorsement of that proposal and of our aim for more effective and accountable railway regulation. The Committee made some detailed recommendations about the authority's functions. Of course, we shall carefully consider those recommendations in drawing up the new authority's detailed functions.

It may be helpful to hon. Members if I outline the general areas in which we expect the new authority to operate. We said in our manifesto that the new authority would combine the functions of the franchising director and some functions of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. We do not necessarily regard those functions as the limitation of the new rail authority's remit. The likely areas of responsibility for the new authority, many of which are referred to in the Committee's report, will include managing and enforcing existing franchise contracts; developing a strategic vision for investment in the network; promoting integration between rail and other modes of transport; promoting voluntary action by train operators to win passengers; protecting the needs of disabled passengers; and balancing the needs of passengers and freight users.

In addition to those likely functions, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister stated in his oral evidence to the Committee that we shall also consider how consumers might be represented on the new authority. We envisage that the new authority will play an important role in encouraging more freight on to the railways.

Mrs. Dunwoody rose––

Dr. Strang: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, but should like to make progress.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Minister will look carefully at the role of customer services, will he not, because at the moment passengers are not being well served? That is an important matter.

Dr. Strang: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her intervention, but in the few minutes that are left I should like to comment on safety, which some hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke–on–Trent, South (Mr. Stevenson) emphasised.

The Committee's recommendation that transport safety regulation, should be focused on a single, entirely independent authority goes wider than railways. It would be a significant change in present arrangements for transport safety regulation, and would raise some complex issues. The United Kingdom's transport safety record is relatively good, and we would need to ensure that any new body would be more effective than current arrangements.

In terms of the railways, the Committee drew attention to mark 1 rolling stock and the installation of a train protection system. It recommended that Railtrack should be relieved of its role in safety regulation and that its safety and standards directorate should be transferred to an independent safety authority. The railway inspectorate's last annual report revealed that some operators have tried to reduce safety levels to the minimum that is allowed, saying that maintaining or improving on the status quo is too costly.

The Government are determined that no privatised railway company will be able to put private profit before public safety. I have already made it clear to the House that we look to the independent Health and Safety Commission as the safety regulator to ensure that standards are maintained and, where necessary, improved.

In the context of train protection and mark 1 rolling stock, I have written to the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission to make it clear that he should produce any formal proposals that he considers necessary, and I understand that Health and Safety Executive officials are working on such proposals.

The current arrangements for the present division of safety responsibilities were proposed by the Health and Safety Commission. Accordingly, we shall need to consult it before responding to the Committee's recommendations. When the commission proposed those arrangements, it said that in due course a full review should be carried out of the arrangements for setting and promulgating railway standards. I have asked the chairman of the commission to bring forward that review and to consider as part of it the extent to which Railtrack's current role in enforcing standards as well as in setting and promulgating them might be transferred. I am pleased to announce that the chairman of the commission has agreed and has said that the review will begin immediately.

The debate has been constructive. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich was characteristically forthright in introducing the debate, and lucidly set out the issues. In the time available to me, it has not been possible to cover all the Committee's detailed recommendations. However, it is already plain from the Committee's report and from representations that we have received that our proposal for a new rail authority has widespread support. It was striking that even the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Croydon, South, said rather lamely that, if the Conservatives had been elected to government, they would have proposed such a rail authority.

Passengers want the railways regulated in a way that is firm, fair and accountable. They should have a public service ethos, should not be driven solely by the profit motive and should be fit for the 21st century. Our proposals are a major step in the right direction and will help to create a climate in which the railways can flourish as part of an integrated transport system.

Adhesive Arachnoiditis

12.28 pm

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Last September, I visited a constituent of mine, Mrs. Spence, who lives in Kendal at the heart of my constituency, at her request. When I saw her, I found a lady in constant pain and completely bed-ridden, apart from access occasionally to a wheelchair, whose life had been ruined by the pain she suffers 24 hours a day. That was not always the case. In her younger years, she was a tennis player and ballroom dancer, and even marched on trade union marches when she lived in London. Today, her entire life has been ruined by the condition that is known as adhesive arachnoiditis.

In describing the condition to me, Mrs. Spence said, "It is like having a hot poker placed in your spine and spreading all over your body. It is like having a group of worms in your legs and feeling that they are wriggling around inside." She constantly feels that she has to punch her legs to try to stop the pain.

Mrs. Spence's husband, Brian, who has been a support to her throughout her life, sits up night after night looking after her, trying to control her pain and to help her. She is on constant medication. That includes a course of morphine tablets, but she has also been given liquid morphine; she often has to take it in liquid form when the pain breaks through the barrier of the tablets. She cannot put her feet on the floor without experiencing extreme discomfort. In 1980, she was told that, unless she used a wheelchair, she would be unlikely ever to leave her home again.

All that appears to stem from two occasions—one in 1971 and the other in 1973—when Mrs. Spence was injected in her spine with a chemical called Myodil. It is worth pausing to reflect on the purpose of the chemical. It is a radiopaque dye that is used when people have X-rays of their spines to enable all the substances within the spinal column to be shown more clearly on the X-ray. When she was given the chemical, she was placed on a table, injected and upended so that it sloshed up and down her spinal column. It appears that the chemical is a very sticky substance, and it bound together many of the nerve endings in the back of her spine. The consequence is constant discomfort and agony.

Mrs. Spence is not alone. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) for drawing to my attention the case of his constituent, Mr. Peter Crawford, who is also confined to a wheelchair and suffers continuous pain requiring 24-hour care. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) has told me of similar instances in his constituency. I believe that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have constituents who suffer from the condition.

In September, the Minister of State, Department of Health, Baroness Jay, wrote a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) in which she described adhesive arachnoiditis as "a rather uncommon . . . condition". To some extent, I wish that that was true, but none of us knows.

[Mr. Tim Collins]

I tabled a parliamentary question, which received an answer from the Under-Secretary of State for Health. I asked

"how many cases of adhesive arachnoiditis have been diagnosed in the last 20 years".

The reply was:

"The information requested is not available"—[Official Report, 12 January 1998; Vol. 304, c. 152.]

That was largely because adhesive arachnoiditis is not a notifiable disease. It is not infectious, and statistics are not kept, so, sadly, none of us knows how extensive the condition is. However, there are some world experts in the sector.

One in particular is Dr. Charles Burton, the senior medical director of the department of neuroaugmentive surgery in Minnesota, a department which he founded. He is a distinguished person. Among other things, he served as a panel chairman of the United States Food and Drug Administration and was a founder of the North American Spine Society. He is probably the world's leading expert on this condition.

Recently, Dr. Burton wrote a paper, in which he says:

"Despite the availability of a wealth of published scientific information on the subject, it has not been well appreciated by the medical profession that the advanced forms of arachnoiditis may be associated with incapacitating pain, disability, or even death. In addition, the global incidence of severe arachnoiditis has only recently become more evident owing to the formation of patient self-help groups in the United States, England, and Australia. These organizations have shown that arachnoiditis represents a worldwide public health problem of considerable magnitude."

He has said that the condition is as "bad as terminal cancer without the prospect of death to end the suffering."

The difficulty is that there is a history to that use of the chemical and its side effects. I have an article that appeared in January 1954 in The Journal of Bone and Joint Surgery, which was the official publication of the American Orthopaedic Association and the British Orthopaedic Association, and was printed both in Boston and London. The article is entitled "Arachnoiditis following the use of iodized oil." It starts:

"It is the purpose of this paper to present clinical and experimental data which suggested to us that pantopaque"—

the material that I am talking about—

"and other iodized materials may contribute to severe and disabling arachnoiditis."

An article in The Lancet as long ago as 1956 indicated similar problems relating to the chemical.

It is worth noting also that Dr. Burton points out in his paper:

"In Sweden and a number of other countries throughout the world (including the former Soviet Union) . . . on the basis of animal studies or clinical observation", these substances were

"removed from clinical practice . . . as early as 1948",

yet in this country Myodil was used as standard practice for many decades: from the 1940s to the 1980s. Indeed, Myodil was never refused a product licence of right under the Medicines Act 1968. It was always granted those licences every five years until the late 1980s, when its manufacturer, Glaxo Wellcome, decided for its own reasons to withdraw the product from use.

The difficulty is that Myodil is an extremely unpleasant substance. Glaxo Wellcome issued guidance on its use about 20 years ago, which said that it should not be injected with anything other than a glass syringe because it would melt the rubber or plastic of any other type of syringe. There is evidence of the chemical being spilled on to a laboratory floor and melting the tiles, yet, in this country, the chemical was regularly injected into the spinal column of people as a normal and accepted part of medical practice. That was against a pattern of well-known scientific research throughout the world showing that there were problems with it.

I am delighted to note that, last month, Baroness Jay, who I believe is responsible for these matters in another place, wrote to Mrs. Ursula Coxhead of the Myodil Action Group:

"The Department of Health does recognise the association between the use of Myodil in myelography and the development of arachnoiditis in some patients."

That is a very important statement, because it has taken a long time for the Government—whether Conservative or Labour—to accept any link between the two. She adds:

"Warnings about the possibility of post-myelography arachnoiditis were included in the product information for Myodil many years ago."

That may be true, but those warnings consisted largely of exhortations to medical practitioners to remove the chemical immediately after it had been injected. In many cases—certainly in that of Mrs. Spence—that was not done, but, even where the chemical was removed in some cases, the evidence is that it was not possible to remove it all and that it did sustained and long-term damage.

That is why I and many sufferers of the condition have called for an inquiry. It is clear that there is prima facie evidence of, at best, something dramatically wrong and, at worst, serious and consistent malpractice. It is also clear that there is a division in medical opinion, which the Minister may mention in her reply. I accept that there is not yet a medical consensus on the causes of the condition or its linkage with Myodil, although it is strongly felt by some leading global experts, and the evidence appears to be accumulating.

I was disappointed when the Minister replied to my written question of 5 November last year:

"We have no plans to institute an inquiry into this issue."—[Official Report, 12 November 1997; Vol. 300, c. 596.]

I hope that she will reconsider.

I pay tribute to a Newcastle newspaper that does not cover much of my constituency, but is significant in the north—The Journal—which has been running a sustained campaign on the issue. Let me quote briefly from an editorial last month which sets out the case very clearly. It states:

"This is not a small claim for a minor injury. Myodil has ruined lives. It is a case which must come to court, not only to fix compensation for sufferers, but also to throw some light on what happened when Myodil was being used.

This will have to emerge in the courtroom because of the Government's steadfast refusal to hold an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the drug's use.

This obstructive attitude is unforgivable. Those people enduring the daily agony from the Myodil treatment at least deserve to feel that lessons might be learned from what went wrong. Such an inquiry might also result in information about the extent of the problem. Health ministers admit they have no idea how many people are suffering from the problem they refuse to investigate."

Let me stress that it is not a partisan issue and that the current Government are taking exactly the same stance as their predecessors. In that respect, they are no worse—or better—than the previous Government. However, some of those concerned about the issue find it sad that, in opposition, the Government took a rather different view. In a press release issued in February 1993, under the heading "Blunkett calls for emergency action on arachnoiditis" the shadow Health Secretary, now the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, referred to

"needless tragedy" and

"the damage caused to innocent people's health" and the need for

"a clear statement of precisely what action has been taken".

He called for specific steps, including:

"No-fault compensation should be paid . . . A full enquiry should be established . . . All invasive procedures carried out in the course of spinal treatment should be immediately replaced with safer practices such as Magnetic Resonance Imaging."

That is what the then shadow Health Secretary, now a member of the Cabinet, called for in opposition. That is what those suffering from the condition seek from the Government today.

We are considering a chilling chain of incidents. There is scientific evidence, published as long ago as the 1950s, that the chemical has devastating side effects. There is also evidence of concealment within the medical profession. My constituent tells me that in 1994 she obtained medical notes dating as far back as 1973 which demonstrated that two separate doctors and a neurosurgeon diagnosed her as suffering from adhesive arachnoiditis, but she was not told until she obtained those notes that she was suffering from anything other than a variation of arthritis of the spine.

There is evidence that Myodil was a nasty chemical and that a very large and wealthy company has taken a hostile attitude. It takes the view that, as anybody needing a myelography had a back problem, all subsequent problems must have stemmed from that. There is also evidence that, sadly, successive Governments followed the advice of their officials that it would be too difficult to have an inquiry and get to the root of the problem.

I am sure that the Minister will have looked into the matter and that she has in front of her an elegant speech drafted by her hard-working officials—no doubt the same officials who advised previous Governments. After she has read her speech, I ask her not to dismiss the issue from her mind, but to search her heart and consider whether the impulse for justice that brought her and hon. Members representing all parties to the House, and which is the purpose and function of this place, would be best served by having an open, full and public inquiry to establish the medical facts, who knew what when and where blame lies and to address the issue of compensation for people whose lives have been blighted beyond belief. They will never recover, but they may be able to have a little more comfort in their dying years if they receive some compensation.

12.44 pm

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) on introducing the debate, on the elegance and eloquence of his speech, and on the care with which he is representing his constituent's interest in the matter.

Let me also make it clear to the House that my brother holds a senior position on the board of Glaxo Wellcome. In the context of my ministerial duties, I do not participate in discussions concerning the pharmaceutical industry. I raised the question of my having any conflict of interest in replying to today's debate with the permanent secretary, who feels there is no conflict of interest, and I have written to the hon. Gentleman accordingly.

The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to say that arachnoiditis is not a party issue. Members on both sides of the House have constituents who are raising precisely the same concerns as he has raised today on behalf of Mrs. Spence. Many such people afflicted with awful and chronic illness turn their own adversity to the advantage of others by highlighting through their circumstances the broader lessons to be learned. We pay tribute to their efforts.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that I have listened very carefully to the points that he has raised. Let me begin by putting the issue of the treatment of people who suffer from arachnoiditis into its broader context by setting out the Government's proposals for developing, strengthening and rebuilding our national health service that were clearly set out in the White Paper "The new national health service—modern and dependable" which made clear our concern to develop proper support and services for people who suffer long-term, life-limiting conditions and disabilities such as arachnoiditis.

Many people suffer from conditions that will never be completely cured. Therefore, it is important for the health service to ensure that they are properly supported. We shall focus on recuperation and rehabilitation, recognising that the management of chronic pain and other palliative care is an important part of enabling people with such conditions to live as independently and actively as possible. The Government will expect co-operation, not competition, in the planning and delivery of health and social care at local level.

As the hon. Gentleman made clear, co-operation will be crucial in providing the right support for people suffering from conditions such as arachnoiditis. I hope that he accepts that all the action that the Government are taking following the publication of the White Paper and the public health Green Paper make clear our determination to rebuild public confidence in the national health service as a public service accountable to patients, open to the public and shaped by their views and experiences.

It may help if I briefly summarise the issues that the disease raises for the Government. The hon. Gentleman has made very clear the extent to which arachnoiditis is an uncommon and distressing condition, characterised by chronic inflammation and thickening of the arachnoid membrane. That membrane apparently looks like a spider's web—hence its name. It covers and protects the brain and the spinal cord.

It is particularly distressing that arachnoiditis may be a subsequent complication of an earlier injury. It is a progressive condition, for which there is no known cure. It traps nerves as they leave the spinal cord, and at the lower end of the spinal canal; it may cause a great deal of low back, neck and leg pain—and in some cases, this becomes a neurological disability.

[Ms Tessa Jowell]

The sad fact is that a mercifully small number of people are seriously affected by arachnoiditis. We know, as the hon. Gentleman stressed in the case of Mrs. Spence—other hon. Members will testify to the experience of other constituents—that the pain from this condition can cause misery for the individual concerned and for his or her family.

The White Paper sets out our approach to service development in the context of evidence-based service frameworks which will focus much more strongly on the quality of care. That was often neglected by the previous Administration under the internal market. The election of a Labour Government, with our commitment to rebuilding a national health service, marks an important move away from focusing solely on quantity of treatment and towards a much greater preoccupation at every stage with the quality of treatment. Pain management is developing across the country and is supported by an increasing commitment by the professions to evidence-based pain services. Quality is absolutely integral to the effectiveness of those services. I hope that that will be good news for patients.

The National Institute for Clinical Excellence will actively contribute to the development of services across the NHS by co-ordinating programmes to improve clinical standards, by issuing guidance on the clinical and cost-effectiveness of clinical practice, and by supporting clinical audit development work, making sure that quality is measured at every stage of the process.

Effective pain relief, a key component of high-quality care for people with arachnoiditis, will be one of the topics that may in due course form part of the national institute's work. Attention has recently focused on the Audit Commission's report "Anaesthesia Under Examination", which highlighted the need for commissioners and trusts to obtain better data about clinical activity and service standards, so that resources can be matched more closely to need. The Audit Commission has made a number of extremely sensible recommendations for improving the efficiency of pain clinics—recommendations which I am sure managers and professionals throughout the NHS will take on board, because they are evidently of benefit to patients.

As I said, arachnoiditis is caused by injury to the arachnoid membrane. That may result from many causes, such as infection, haemorrhage, trauma, surgery, and the diagnostic procedure known as myelography. Patients with arachnoiditis may have more than one predisposing cause.

Myelography, the cause with which the hon. Gentleman is particularly concerned, is an X-ray of the spinal cord cavity involving a lumbar puncture to inject the contrast agent or dye used into the subarachnoid space. The contrast agent or dye may then be visualised by X-ray. Myelography is used to diagnose serious conditions such as spinal cancer or a prolapsed disc. It is not a procedure used on patients who are otherwise fit and healthy. As with many difficult clinical decisions, the risks of not being able to diagnose what may be a life-threatening illness have to be set against the risks involved in the procedure itself. It is never a clinical decision to be undertaken lightly; it is undertaken only after careful consideration of all the factors involved.

As the hon. Gentleman will be well aware, no clinical intervention is completely free of risk. That is why we look to doctors to use their knowledge, skill and experience to weigh carefully the likely benefits of any procedure, such as an X-ray investigation, against the anticipated risks for the patient. It is also why we support doctors' efforts to maintain those skills. There should also be discussion with patients so that they are aware of any risks that may accompany the treatment.

Mr. Collins: Of course the Minister is right to say that we must place our trust in the medical profession; equally, that profession is subject to public accountability. Will she deal with the case for a public inquiry, which her party supported when in opposition? Now that it is in government, does her party still support the idea?

Ms Jowell: I shall be coming to the case that the hon. Gentleman made for a public inquiry.

In the past, Myodil was linked to the development of post-myelography arachnoiditis in some patients, especially when there were technical difficulties in carrying out the X-ray procedure. Myodil was withdrawn by Glaxo from the market in late 1987 for commercial reasons. Arachnoiditis was a known, if rare, side-effect of Myodil, and the appropriate warnings were given in the product information, with the advice to remove as much of it as possible after the X-ray procedure. The number of patients who suffered from that complication is unfortunately not known.

Myodil is an old product which was available before licensing procedures were in place in the UK. Following the thalidomide tragedy, the Medicines Act 1968 was introduced, and implemented in 1971. Products already available on the market were given a product licence of right and were systematically reviewed by the Committee on Safety of Medicines for safety, quality and efficacy. Myodil was reviewed under those procedures, and a reviewed licence was given early in 1987. It was therefore handled under the normal procedures for the licensing of medicines.

Things have moved on; patients today are much more involved in discussions and subsequent decisions about their care. Like any medicinal products, the contrast dyes used in myelograms come with product information supplied by the manufacturer. All medicinal products are subject to stringent assessment of safety, quality and efficacy before being licensed, and are closely monitored after licensing to detect any previously unrecognised adverse effects or any change in the balance of risks and benefits. This post-marketing assessment of drug safety is known as pharmacovigilance.

Things have also moved on in the area of diagnoses. Today, many patients who require diagnostic procedures of this nature have to undergo a non-invasive magnetic resonance imaging scan instead of myelography. But not all patients are suitable for MRI scanning, so myelography is still an important procedure. For such patients, newer, water-soluble dyes are available and are less likely to be associated with arachnoiditis.

On the hon. Gentleman's call for an inquiry, I reiterate the parliamentary answer that I supplied some months ago: we have no plans to hold an inquiry, and I hope that he understands that it would not be proper for me to comment on matters that may yet become the subject of legal proceedings. I have, however, asked officials to set up a meeting with the Myodil Action Group. Baroness Jay, who has ministerial responsibility for this matter, has agreed to chair the meeting.

I hope that, having raised this issue in the context of concern for his constituents, the hon. Gentleman accepts the responses that I have given to his questions.

Rookery Footpath, Barrow-on-Soar

12.59 pm

Mr. Andrew Reed (Loughborough): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the issue of the Rookery footpath in Barrow-on-Soar in my constituency. Once in a generation, a Member of Parliament makes a great speech. Unfortunately, this morning is not the time for that great speech in my parliamentary career. Many issues that arise in our constituencies daily are just as important to local residents as the big issues that we discuss here, and I am humbled to follow the debate initiated by the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins), which dealt with a very important issue.

Hon. Members are driven into politics to discuss the big issues, to sort out major problems and to represent our constituents nationally, but every now and then a small event occurs which dominates one's postbag. This year, instead of receiving Christmas cards from the vast majority of my constituents, my postbag was inundated with 150 letters from the residents of Barrow-on-Soar about the temporary closure of the Rookery footpath in Leicestershire.

The footpath was supposed to be closed for six months, but it became clear from my discussions with local residents, the parish council, the county council and Railtrack that this was a saga: the temporary closure has lasted 12 years. On finding that a footpath is unsafe, the traffic authority—in this case, Leicestershire county council—can take out a temporary closure order under section 14(1) of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, as amended. Whenever such issues arise, hon. Members find themselves looking up pieces of legislation of which we were previously unaware. That Act was never high on my reading list, but since Christmas I have become increasingly aware of its effects.

I wish to explain what has happened in the case of the Rookery footpath. The action that I have taken so far has generated much local interest, and I am sure that it will lead to the footpath being reopened by the end of the year. I hope that this case will serve as a lesson throughout the country. Temporary closure orders that last 12 years or more are unacceptable, and I hope that we can ensure that they are not automatically renewed, as happens currently. When the county council asks for an extension of the temporary closure order later this year, I hope that a condition will be put on the order that the path be reopened.

This issue has generated a great deal of local interest. I congratulate the local press and the work of my constituents, particularly Dr. Earl, a parish councillor who has taken on this issue single-handedly and been a constant pain and threat to the county council.

I wish to declare an interest. Before 1 May last year, I was employed in Leicestershire county council's department of planning and transportation. I dealt with issues that were far removed from this one, as I was in the economic development unit and had no dealings with footpaths, so I cannot be blamed for the fact that the footpath has been closed for the past 11 years. I declare an interest because I know of the hard work and sincerity of all the officers at Leicestershire county council in dealing with this matter since I took it up.

It is always easy for Members of Parliament to criticise public servants for lack of action. When I go through the catalogue of disasters, delays and prevarications, hon.

[Mr. Andrew Reed]

Members will see why some members of the public are right to wonder what has been happening over the past 12 years.

The Rookery footpath is important for a number of reasons. It is a cut-through from Humphrey Perkins school in Barrow-on-Soar to the village where I live, Quorn. It was used by a number of elderly residents, who remember it well, and unfortunately it is still being used by many pupils from the school.

The first order for closure was taken out in June 1986 because a wall adjoining the footpath was deemed unsafe—part of the granite was in danger of falling off, presenting a danger to individuals using the footpath. The footpath cuts through from Cotes road alongside a number of houses and crosses a busy and dangerous midland main line railway track. I use the line regularly, so I have been underneath the bridge and know that trains travel along that track at well over 90 miles an hour. It is important to reopen the footpath as soon as possible for the sake of the pupils and others who are still trying to use it. We all know the consequences of young children trying to cross railway tracks in front of fast-moving trains.

When the footpath was closed on 27 June 1986, it was unclear who owned the wall. Twelve years later, it is still unclear, which is why the footpath has remained closed. The first order was an emergency measure, which was supposed to last for just 14 days. Later that year, an order for a further three months was secured. I have a catalogue of the dates, from 1986 to January 1994, when further orders and the consent of the Secretary of State were secured. The Government office for the east midlands, as it is now known, became so used to extending the order that it did so without being asked. In 1995, the Secretary of State granted an extension to the order without the county council asking for it, so it seems to have become a piece of correspondence that went out regularly and automatically.

Unfortunately, on a couple of occasions the order lapsed by mistake, and the county council has admitted responsibility for that—a new order should have been made early in 1997. We now appear to be back up to date with the temporary closure orders and to be covered until July 1998. I hope that the Secretary of State will then find a way to ensure that work is carried out so that the path can be reopened within a reasonable time.

Mr. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire): From what has been said so far, it is not clear to me whether the delays have been caused mainly by uncertainty about ownership, by a lack of funds for the repair of the boundary wall or by a lack of political will.

Mr. Reed: I was coming to that. Ultimately, the reason for the delay is the fact that the wall's ownership is in question; but the estimated cost of repairing the relevant part of the footpath is between £30,000 and £60,000. The county council—rightly, I suppose—does not want to be responsible for the repair of the wall and the reopening of the footpath at a possible cost of £60,000 if that proves to be the responsibility of some other body. Given the proximity of the footpath to the railway, it is felt that Railtrack and its former incarnation, British Rail's property arm, must bear some responsibility. The present reason for the continued delay is the fact that the county council is taking advice in order to ascertain the ownership of the wall and hence to establish when the footpath can be reopened.

As I have pointed out to constituents who have written to me, even if the county council is shown to own the wall, local councillors will have to decide how to find the £60,000 that is needed for its repair—and rightly so. If I may put it crudely, £60,000 equates to two teachers, or two or three social workers. It must be recognised that the county council has responsibilities. It has a financial responsibility, but it has another responsibility as well.

I am aware of the interest of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Taylor) in the right to roam and other issues relating to footpaths. I feel strongly that an issue here is the need to ensure that, where footpaths are provided, we make them available to the public. That applies particularly when public safety is involved, as it is in this instance. We rightly criticise farmers and others who cover and close footpaths, but in this case a democratically elected body—a county council—is doing that, entirely legally. I want to draw attention to the prevarication that seems to have taken place—although I am pleased to say that our actions are moving things forward.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend is right to say that I have a direct interest in the matter. There is a similar problem in my, neighbouring, constituency. Has it ever been established, as a result of investigation, whether the repairs could be carried out as part of a community project? That happened in the village of Thringston when I was a district councillor. Admittedly it was a larger project, but it seemed to resolve what had become an impasse.

Mr. Reed: We have not conferred about that, but the answer is yes. Dr. Earl, one of the parish councillors, has suggested that option. The county solicitor has said that the estimated cost of the work—£60,000—is so high because it will be done by hand. I am not sure by what other method the council envisages the wall's repair, but in my constituency—and no doubt that of my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire—such repairs have been done before. Similar walls have been repaired in Birstall, where I was a councillor, under Government schemes.

I am sure that today's debate and the action taken by the county council in the last week and a half have produced light at the end of the tunnel. I am convinced that, because of Dr. Earl's work and that of the parish council—and, as I have said, my brief airing of the issue today—more has happened in the past three months than has happened in the past 12 years. I am grateful for that. I know that the county council and Railtrack are now negotiating, and I think that the footpath may be reopened as a result.

I hope, however, that the Minister will be able to say something about the legal aspects of temporary closure orders. An extension requires the consent of the Secretary of State, but there is no limit to the number of extensions for which he can provide. If an order is extended, the local authority need only advertise that. Given the position relating to the footpath—which I am sure is repeated throughout the country—we must ensure that, in future, temporary closure orders are not extended without question.

I hope that, by the time the Minister is able to respond—by producing legislation, or in other ways—the footpath will have been reopened; but I also hope, for the sake of future generations of footpath users, we have gone some way towards dispensing with a ridiculous anomaly.

1.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Angela Eagle): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) on securing the debate.

Leicestershire county council's temporary closure of the Rookery footpath is clearly an important local issue, and I share my hon. Friend's disappointment about the length of time for which it has been closed. However—as my hon. Friend may have realised from my reply to his recent parliamentary question—responsibility for the closure rests squarely on the shoulders of the county council, and the Government's ability to exert influence is limited.

The Secretary of State's role is restricted to considering requests by the county council to extend the life of temporary traffic regulation orders closing the footpath. Such an extension was last granted on 19 February 1996, with an expiry date of 31 July 1996. The county council did not apply for a further extension, and the order lapsed. I understand that the council made a fresh order in February 1997, which was subsequently discovered to be invalid and was replaced with yet another order in January this year. That order will expire in July if it is not extended by the Secretary of State.

In considering a request for extension of the expiry date, the Secretary of State will look for evidence that the views of local users have been taken into account by the authority, but in a case such as this, in which there is a danger to public safety, those views will inevitably be given less weight. Having said that, I must emphasise that the 52 letters received recently by the Government office for the east midlands postdated the Secretary of State's consideration of the council's latest request for an extension.

The retaining wall alongside the footpath has not collapsed during the many years for which the closure has been intermittently in force, but that does not mean that its condition is without risk to the public. If the county council and its engineers have concerns about the safety of the retaining wall, it is right for the Secretary of State to take serious account of them.

There have been complaints about a lack of consultation by the county council. The legislation does not require such consultation to take place—although, given such a prolonged and sensitive closure, the council might well have benefited from explaining its proposals better rather than relying on statutory public notices.

I assure my hon. Friend that extensions to temporary closure orders are never made by Government offices unless requests are made for them to do so. I also assure him that, should the council apply for an extension of the expiry date of the current order, the Secretary of State will take full account of the points that have been made today and in letters from residents. If the Secretary of State decided that an extension should not be granted, the council would be at liberty to introduce a fresh order, but would be obliged to wait for three months before doing so.

I note the calls for the Secretary of State to intervene or to require the holding of a public inquiry, but there is no provision for that in the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, as amended by the Road Traffic (Temporary Restrictions) Act 1991. I suspect that my hon. Friend already knows that.

I am alarmed to learn of the risk to children who continue to use the footpath by climbing on the outside of the footbridge over the railway, but I understand that the county council has recently installed more and improved fencing and barriers to prevent such use.

I am pleased to hear that the county council has reopened a section of the footpath north of the railway to enable better access to properties on Cotes road. However, I note that, as the footbridge remains closed, that will not provide schoolchildren with the short cut they want to the south side of the railway.

I share the concern of my hon. Friend and his constituents about the use of temporary orders to close a footpath intermittently for 12 years, but I am encouraged by the fact that the Government office for the east midlands is taking a robust line with the county council. When, in February 1996, the most recent extension of six months was granted, the Government office asked the county council to consider promoting a permanent order, as that would enable objections to be heard and a public inquiry to be held.

I am disappointed that the county council seems to have disregarded that advice, and I express my dissatisfaction at the time that it is taking to resolve the problem and reopen the footpath. It is difficult to see how the delay can be consistent with the general duty on rights-of-way authorities under the Highways Act 1980 to maintain a public right of passage.

I am particularly disappointed at the prolonged closure of the footpath, as it flies in the face of what we want to achieve through an integrated transport policy. The Government recognise the flexibility that the car can bring and the fact that, for many people, the car has become a necessity, but the forecast growth in traffic is clearly unacceptable because of its environmental and economic effects. Forecasts suggest that, unless we change our travel habits, traffic levels will be between 36 per cent. and 57 per cent. higher in 20 years' time than they are now.

It is conceivable that some parents in Barrow-on-Soar are taking their children to school in Quorn by car following the closure of the Rookery footpath. The reduction in our dependence on the car through providing genuine alternatives and promoting walking, for example, is central to our achieving a more sustainable transport system. Consequently, failures to minimise the time during which footpaths are out of service do nothing to help, and much to harm, our collective efforts to bring about the changes that are necessary if we are to modify people's travel habits—we must work hard at that.

We shall set out the national policy framework for integrated transport in the forthcoming White Paper on transport, but delivery will rest with local partnerships. We very much hope that, across the country, schemes will be dealt with rather more effectively than has been the case in the unfortunate example that my hon. Friend has described.

I understand that the county council has now received advice from leading counsel about liability for the repair works to the retaining wall alongside the footpath.

[Angela Eagle]

The council's solicitor is now acting on that advice to ascertain who is liable for the repairs to the wall. I understand that the council hopes to complete those legal inquiries within the next month, after which it will meet Railtrack and the British Rail Property Board to take matters forward. In the meantime, the council's engineers are considering what measures could be implemented to reopen the footpath.

I can only hope that the county council's optimism is rewarded and that a solution is found quickly to the impasse that has resulted in the closure of the Rookery footpath for such an unacceptably long time.

Water Industry

1.22 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): I am delighted to have won the opportunity to debate the water industry in the House today. I thank the Minister for her presence, especially as she has just responded to the previous debate.

This is not the first time that the House has debated the industry. Indeed, I have over the years secured several Adjournment debates on the matter. However, this is the first time that I have been able to do so under a Labour Government, and I believe that the huge concern that the issue throws up justifies the use of the Minister's time.

This is a critical moment for water policy. Water pricing is undergoing its periodic review, and the Government are consulting on water abstraction licences and charging for water. Moreover, the BBC is in the middle of a specially themed water week, on which I congratulate it—I have been interested in the wide range of programmes that have been shown.

The water industry has changed beyond recognition since privatisation. This is not the moment to debate whether the industry should have been privatised—suffice it to say that the Liberal Democrats would not have taken it out of public hands. However, we must now look to the future, not the past.

There is no doubt that issues relating to the water industry are extremely emotive. Problems are all too apparent, and scarcely a day passes without a water story featuring prominently in the national press: fat cat pay-outs; water shortages; huge profits for the water companies; huge increases in bills; and environmental destruction as the search for new water increasingly drains rivers, lakes, wetlands and underground reserves. It is no wonder that people are worried and angry.

Profits across the industry have increased by some 130 per cent. since privatisation—they have more than doubled. Share prices and dividends to shareholders have, unsurprisingly, shot up as a result, despite supposedly tough regulation. To pay for that, water prices for domestic customers in England and Wales have increased on average by 39 per cent. in real terms—in other words, prices have risen by almost half.

In my constituency, and in the rest of the region served by South West Water, the price increase has been much greater—since privatisation, average water bills there have more than doubled. That is because people in the area have been forced to pay an unfair share of the costs of maintaining what is a natural resource. In the south-west, 3 per cent. of the national population are being asked to pay to clean up a third of the national coastline. Local pensioners who rely on the state pension are on average paying more than 10 per cent. of that meagre state pension on bills for which no help is available. Again, it is no wonder that people are angry.

Investment has increased since privatisation. There is no dispute about the fact that there has been necessary investment in water supplies and in environmental protection. However, whereas customers have borne much of the cost of investment, company shareholders have received most of the financial benefits. The Consumers Association concluded that more than 80 per cent. of the water companies' investment has been funded by increases in domestic consumer bills. That is despite the fact that we were told that privatisation was intended to allow greater access to private funds through borrowing and investment. Indeed, it was argued that privatisation would prevent big increases in customer bills, but that has clearly not happened.

As customers rather than shareholders have taken on most of the costs, it is little wonder that share prices and dividends have rocketed. Only a monopoly could get away with dipping into customers' pockets in such a way; in any other industry, customers would have left in droves. Water customers do not have that choice.

Water companies do not have an entirely positive record on investment either, and I hope that my earlier comments do not suggest otherwise. Perhaps most infamously, Yorkshire Water cut investment in preventing leakages, and left customers without water. Despite increased profits, water companies have largely failed to secure sustainable future water resources, and have not invested adequately in water conservation and distribution. Many of Britain's rivers, lakes, reservoirs and underground reserves have run dry through over-abstraction, which has caused major environmental problems and put at risk some of our best wildlife sites.

All too often, water companies present us with what they claim to be a stark choice—they say that they can stop increasing water bills, but only by scaling back investment in environmental protection. That is far too simplistic, and the water companies have got away with using that argument for far too long.

The regulator has struggled to get a hold on these slippery creatures; they have squealed against tough price regimes, but any so-called tough pricing formulas that have been agreed have led to further share and profit rises. Generally, as soon as the settlements have been announced, the share price has shot up, as the market has recognised that they are not tough at all.

The current review of water company prices will provide a key test. There is a danger that the review will turn into a debate about price cuts versus the environment. However, the review cannot be only about putting money into customers' pockets. It must be about setting water prices—and, perhaps more crucially, water company profits and share prices—at a level that will allow us to make good the environmental damage caused by the water companies in the first place at a cost that customers can afford. The regulator must in future consider a much broader range of issues.

Polling released by the Environment Agency shows that water consumers want environmental improvement to be funded from efficiency gains, and not necessarily price reductions. In fact, 95 per cent. of customers polled would prefer to receive the same water bill if that delivered improved environmental protection.

The water companies and the regulator should take note of that poll, as I am sure that water companies can afford to do much more for the environment. The Government must either make it clear that the regulator has a duty to consider environmental standards as well as prices—which could be effected in the current review of utilities regulation—or tighten environmental standards and make them part of the context in which the regulator has to work. He argues consistently that it is not for him to set standards, but he must recognise the standards that have been set. Let us ensure that the House and Ministers set the standards correctly.

English Nature has identified 80 sites of special scientific interest that need urgent action to protect them from the devastating effects of abstraction and sewage effluent. Almost half have been proposed as internationally important sites. Without action now, damage will be permanent.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has released a list of what it believes are some of the most important of those sites, which I think it has made generally available. The sites range from the Yare broads and marshes in Norfolk to the River Avon in Hampshire and Wiltshire, where there is a decline in salmon stock, a general decline in the quality of the habitat and low flows, which are especially a problem on its tributaries. The list also includes Hewell park lake in Hereford and Worcester, highlighting serious concern about problems arising mainly from over-abstraction.

Other sites identified are the River Eden in Cumbria, Swanbourne lake in Arundel park in west Sussex, the River Kennet in Berkshire and Wiltshire, the River Wye in Gloucestershire, and the River Axe in Devon. The list is far too long to cite fully in the time available.

The status of an SSSI should in theory be enough to protect a site. The designation means that the Government have said that the site's preservation is vital to the UK's biodiversity. Indeed, the definition is that there should be no erosion of the sites—it is not that no erosion would be ideal, but that something less would be all right. In reality, though, an SSSI classification is simply not enough, as we know from the erosion that is taking place.

Worse still, in the most recent guidance to the water industry, the Environment Agency split the sites into two groups: core sites, which are of international importance and protected by European Union legislation—the so-called special areas of conservation—and non-core sites, which are protected by UK legislation. That division implies that the Office of Water Services and the water companies can give lower priority to protecting non-core sites. That split has never appeared in previous guidance, and is a backward step for environmental protection.

There is specific concern about the designation of SACs not being conterminous with SSSIs. I know from discussions with English Nature staff that, at one stage, it was suggested that all SSSIs should simply be nominated as SACs, but the previous Government were reluctant to allow that. In terms of protecting British biodiversity, there is no differentiation between the importance of sites.

The Minister must intervene to insist that money is spent to protect threatened sites. Thousands of millions of pounds are to be invested by the water companies in return for huge profits. The RSPB calculates that just £230 million more would be enough to protect all vital but threatened environments. That investment was always described as necessary—until the new guidelines came out. I hope that the Minister will find a way of getting the Environment Agency to withdraw the guidelines for water companies that differentiate between core and non-core sites. That would be a practical way of fulfilling the often-quoted Labour aim of putting the environment at the heart of Government.

The periodic price review will always be a necessary method of ensuring adequate funding for treating detrimental environmental impact, but that is really treating the symptoms, not the causes, of degradation.

[Mr. Matthew Taylor]

Many environmental problems caused by the water industry involve abstraction in one form or another. A proper system of abstraction licensing would mean that many such problems would not occur in the first place. I know that the Government are undertaking a review of the issue.

The abstraction licensing system is inflexible and economically inefficient, and has resulted in huge environmental damage. It is clearly in need of reform. We must start managing water resources in such a way as to encourage more efficient use of water. That is the only way in which to reduce pressure on our rivers and wetlands. There is no point in spending a fortune putting right what is wrong, if we can avoid it being wrong in the first place.

One reason why the system is so bad is that it is based on what was considered important 30 years ago, when the environment was not under the same pressure, and overall demand for water was very much lower. Consequently, the Environment Agency inherited a backlog of abstraction permissions that have no proper place today.

The system operates on a "first come, first served" basis, and, in addition, many licences have been granted in perpetuity. Many were granted to allow more water to be taken than was required. In some cases, they allow more water to be taken than exists. The agency has to compensate abstractors if it revokes or varies a licence, which can be costly and time-consuming. The net effect is that many licences are effectively cast in stone, and as many as 200 wildlife sites are threatened with legal abstractions.

It is worth pointing out that the abstraction licences system is, furthermore, extremely inefficient economically. Charges are set at a level that recover only the administrative costs of regulating the system. Little attempt is therefore made to reflect the true costs of abstraction, which include enormous environmental damage.

In such circumstances, water is invariably undervalued. Without clear economic signals, those seeking to abstract have little or no incentive to use water effectively, and water is not efficiently allocated between users. Any new system must combine meeting essential water needs while ensuring sufficient water in the natural environment to protect and maintain biodiversity. I should like to suggest a few key elements that should be included in the Government's conclusions.

First, licences of right should be phased out, and existing licences should be required to meet current environmental obligations. That would bring the abstraction licences scheme into line with the system of granting consents to discharge effluent into the water environment, which already builds in a periodic review of consent without compensation, precisely to avoid the problems to which I have referred.

Secondly, the regulatory regime should be expanded to take into consideration abstraction from any form of irrigation, historic abstraction, de-watering operations and abstraction for navigational purposes. Thirdly, applications for new abstractions should include consultation with all interested parties and an assessment of the environmental impact of the proposal and the need for water. All licences should be clearly time-limited. Fourthly, I should like incentive charging in order to encourage efficiency in the use and allocation of water. Revenue from incentive charging should be directed into projects of environmental benefit.

All those measures would be fairly easy to introduce—if the political will is there. I believe that Ministers want to take action. That will is far more likely to be apparent if the Government also have the will to reform the way in which everything is paid for. Water bills are likely to fall under the price review; the regulator has already made that clear. However, huge regional differentials in domestic bills are likely to remain, because each region will face different challenges in coming years. Unreasonable costs should not be imposed on regions with high infrastructure costs and major environmental challenges. If that were so, people would simply increasingly rebel against necessary environmental measures.

I have already mentioned the problems faced by the people in the South West Water region—but problems do not occur there alone. Customers of North West Water, and those served by Wessex Water and Yorkshire Water, will face particularly high costs of meeting the urban waste water directive. Lead will be a major concern in the north-west, and nitrates will have an impact on areas such as that covered by Anglian water. As time goes by, differential environmental impacts will hit customers very unfairly in some parts of the country, under a bills system that does not allow them any help.

The cost of cleaning up such regional problems will fall almost exclusively on local consumers, so the first change I advocate is the establishment of a new independent water services trust, funded by a 2 per cent. levy on excessive continuing water company profits, which would help to reduce unfair differences in water charges. It should be used to subsidise water projects of national environmental importance, and to encourage more efficient use of water.

Secondly, all customer bills could be cut if the industry relied more on long-term financing and less on customer price rises. There must be a requirement to fund more investment from borrowing and equity raising, rather than by dipping into customers' pockets through endless price increases. I agree with the regulator that excessive profits must be returned more quickly to customers. None of that will help share prices, but we should not be worried about that: shareholders have made a fortune.

The water rates system is unfair and out of date. Valuations date back to the 1970s, and there is no help for those on low incomes and no discount for those living alone. As a first step, moving to the council tax banding system would be far fairer.

For too long, environmental concerns have been seen as expendable—something that we can put aside while we concentrate on bringing down water bills. That does not have to be so. The recent Environment Committee report on sewage treatment, which I hope the Minister has seen, reached exactly the conclusion that ever-rising share prices of water companies prove that more could be done without increasing bills. My proposals would ensure both fairer prices and a cleaner environment.

The Conservative privatisation of water has failed to deliver. People look to Labour to do better. I hope that the Minister can brighten the proceedings at the end of our Adjournment debates this morning with some good news.

1.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Angela Eagle): I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor) on securing this wide-ranging debate, even if we have only a short time for it; clearly, we cannot begin to do justice in the time available to the many complex issues that he has raised, but I welcome the opportunity to respond.

At the water summit last year, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister made it clear that we want a world-class, water-efficient and environmentally sustainable water industry. We should recognise that water is a necessity of life, and that that marks it out from any other commodity. We must take into account the need to give special attention to vulnerable households and the less well-off in our policy making.

I note and agree with many of the hon. Gentleman's points about privatisation, but I hope that he recognises that, as a new Government, we must work with what we have inherited from the previous Administration.

In the 1990s, there has been a sustained improvement in river quality, with a net upgrading of more than 25 per cent. of the total monitored length of rivers and canals in England and Wales; but we want improvements in quality to continue. A regulatory approach to prevent pollution or to enforce controls will often be needed, but there is a mix of measures that may also be relevant. We must get the best mix to realise our aims, be they regulatory, voluntary or economic.

We said last year that we want to explore water pollution charging. We issued a consultation paper in November on economic instruments for water pollution that sought views on a range of possible instruments, and set out in some detail a series of issues relevant to whether instruments could in practice be designed and could operate successfully. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in his Budget statement, we are continuing that exploratory work.

The potential advantages of economic instruments are considerable, in that they can encourage more cost-effective improvements in water quality objectives as well as giving greater effect to the "polluter pays" principle; but to judge whether those advantages can be realised in practice, and what the wider consequences of a change would be, requires consideration of a set of complex issues.

Indeed, an acceptance that this is a difficult area is one matter on which responses to our discussion paper were consistent across the board. To provide answers to those questions requires considerable detailed work, and that work is continuing.

The periodic review of water company price limits for the period 2000-05 is already well under way. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman referred to it several times. As I said, water is not only a commodity but an essential for life, and it raises issues of public health. Water charges should be fair and affordable, particularly for the most vulnerable.

I am aware that the variation in charges to customers by water companies is a long-established concern, especially in the south-west.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): The Minister will appreciate that there are five Liberal Democrat Members from the south-west present, and that, although my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor) referred to the national situation, there is a marked discrepancy between areas in the impact on households of water charges.

Under the previous regime, we were constantly told that the privatisation of the water companies had restricted their possibilities of obtaining European Union funding for major infrastructure projects, including the clean-up of beaches in the south-west. Is there likely to be a renewed attempt under the Labour Government to obtain outside grant support to cushion the impact of major infrastructure improvements?

Angela Eagle: That is a technical question, requiring a detailed knowledge of European Union funding regimes. As I had no notice of it, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman, so that I can give him an accurate answer.

The current water charges are largely shaped by the present system of economic regulatory control. We are reviewing the underlying system of utility regulation. The review has been considering the structure of utility regulation across all the main privatised utilities, with a view to establishing a system of regulation that is seen as fair by all, but particularly by the consumer. Consumers have long seen the regulatory system as favouring the companies, and we want to redress that balance.

In examining water prices, Ministers will consider the level not only nationally but in terms of differences between companies. The Director General of Water Services will seek guidance from the Secretary of State on broad priorities, in the form of an open letter to the Deputy Prime Minister at the end of April. We hope that the accompanying material will give an idea of how specific issues bear on individual companies, as well as the broad national picture.

In the south-west, for example, we might expect the protection of coastal waters to continue to be an important, perhaps the paramount, issue, even allowing for the major investments that are being made in the current price period.

In considering what guidance to give the director general about broad priorities at national level, we shall certainly consider the implications for individual companies, not least in terms of the effect on water bills. Some of the ideas of the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell would have implications for bills, but I shall come to that later. Higher-quality water has to be paid for by somebody, and we must get the right balance of who should take the hit.

The process will be followed up in the autumn by more detailed work to assess the financial implications for individual companies. The Deputy Prime Minister's guidance will be drawn up after he has invited public consultation on the director general's letter. We hope that as many people as possible will make their views known, because water prices and the way in which the money is spent are clearly issues for lively debate. We want to know what people think.

The companies are consulting their customers, my Department has commissioned independent research into customer preferences for environmental improvements, and the Environment Agency is conducting its own research through its regional advisory committees. We hope that those processes will provide a valuable input to the debate, and let us judge where people's priorities lie.

[Angela Eagle]

In the current periodic review of water prices, we shall consider the prices not only at national level but as they differ between companies. I hope that that provides some reassurances to hon. Members.

As we get further into the review, I am conscious that the environmental agenda is uppermost in many people's minds. Last autumn, my Department was involved in the process of identifying possible future obligations on water companies for investment to improve environmental quality. Companies were asked to cost those obligations on the basis of detailed guidelines issued by the Environment Agency.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether I could get the Environment Agency to withdraw the core and non-core guidelines that he was worried about. I can reassure him that those are a device to help with data gathering, and have no implications for lesser or greater protection of special sites, be they identified under European legislation or under our own. There is no need to withdraw them, because they are not as meaningful as he seems to think.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: That comment is extremely helpful. I know that most of those concerned will read the debate and accept what the Minister says, but it would be helpful if she could write to me to clarify that position and put it formally on the record.

Angela Eagle: I am happy to do that, but I hope that my assurance is worth the same whether it is given in the House or in a letter.

There are very real concerns about the need to protect all sites of special scientific interest. The Environment Agency guidelines asked water companies to cost the protection of any site of special scientific interest that was on the priority lists drawn up by English Nature and the Countryside Council for Wales and was affected by discharges from sewage treatment works or by water abstraction in the vicinity. It was especially important to distinguish the sites that are also special areas of conservation or special protection areas.

There is an important role for the conservation agencies in advising the regulators and the companies themselves on what needs to be done to protect the sites. It is vital that conservation objectives are properly established. Those objectives need to identify the habitats, plants and animals whose favourable conservation status is significantly influenced by water quality.

The conservation agencies will also need to identify the nature of the link between the water quality of the site and the conservation objectives. That is important because, if we are to ask water companies to make substantial investments to provide extra treatment, or to pay for it, we need to be as sure as we can that the treatment provided will be effective in providing the protection that such sites need.

There has been some debate about the nature of the legal responsibility placed on water companies, the Director General of Water Services and Ministers in relation to the protection of sites of special scientific interest. My officials are considering that. We are considering particularly the points made by English Nature and the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds.

In a sense, however, that is not the real issue. Protection of SSSIs is a key matter to which we must give serious consideration as part of the environmental agenda in the periodic review. However, it is only fair to point out that the Government are likely to have to make some difficult decisions to balance legitimate aspirations for environmental improvements against acceptable water bills for customers. Coming from the south-west, the Liberal Members who are here know that only too well. We must take a sensible view of how much can be done now, and how much we can plan for the future. To do that, we need clear objectives and a demonstrable expectation that the action we contemplate will prove beneficial in protecting these precious environments.

Protecting SSSIs and the environment in general is a continuing task. The pressures and responses do not come and go with each periodic review. Moreover, they change in nature over time. In future, a major pressure is likely to come from climate change and its impacts on water resources and water environment. Just as pressures on the water environment have changed and are likely to change further, it is necessary that the legal and administrative arrangements governing abstraction from it are sufficiently flexible to allow an appropriate response.

That is why we launched, as part of our water summit 10-point plan, a review of the water abstraction licensing system. The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell had much to say about abstraction. The system was put in place in the early 1960s. Although it placed a framework of controls on abstraction, it was fettered from the start by what was perceived as the need to give all the abstractions that then existed what was called a licence of right, regardless of the effect that they were having on the environment. Much as we might wish that that had not been done, the fact is that it was.

Not only those licences but most licences for new abstractions granted since, right up to the present, were granted until revoked. Granting an abstraction licence without a time limit allows no account to be taken of our improved understanding of how the water environment works or of climate change effects on the availability of water for abstraction. It hampers redistribution of that resource among other abstractors who may be able use it more wisely, and encourages the notion that the water belongs to the abstractor, even though that has never been the legal position.

We are having to consider that aspect of the licensing system very carefully. The solutions of the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell sounded simple and logical. If they were legally possible, I would be much happier. We are trying to be as creative as we can, but we are having to take careful legal advice about the implications of changing the abstraction system. We will produce the result of the review when in a position to do so. His seemingly logical solutions are not always deliverable without considerable costs in compensation, which are likely to be legally unavoidable.

We recognise that abstractions under a small proportion of existing licences are damaging sites specifically protected under the European Union habitats and birds directive or by designation as an SSSI. We have found that voluntary variation or revocation by the licence holder cannot be negotiated. If there is no negotiation, the Environment Agency should use its existing powers, on a clearly prioritised basis and on grounds that will stand the scrutiny of public inquiry, to vary or revoke the offending licences. Unfortunately, in those circumstances, the agency must be prepared to pay compensation where necessary. That is the legal position.

We are addressing compensation arrangements in the short and longer term as part of the review. We expect abstractors to behave responsibly towards the environment, and to seek voluntary solutions wherever possible. We expect such proposals to come forward in the water companies' periodic review submissions.

Since taking office, we have encouraged a new spirit of co-operation between the Government and the water companies, based on firm regulation and the changing nature of regulation. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's water summit marked the beginning of that. We recognise the positive way in which the companies have responded to the challenges set them. They have not just opposed us all down the line: they have co-operated, for which we are grateful. We recognise, as do they, that there is further to go. I hope that the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell also recognises it, given the number of reviews and the system that we inherited.

With the Government's firm encouragement, we are confident that the water companies will achieve the level of care for all their customers and for the environment that is our vision, taking into account the elements of social justice and fairness that are so important in considering what, after all, is a necessity of life, not simply a commodity.

It being before Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Sierra Leone

1. Mr. Savidge: What plans she has to provide assistance to Sierra Leone. [34626]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short): In the last two weeks, we have provided £1 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross for humanitarian and protection work in Sierra Leone.

The Foreign Office has provided substantial funds for peacekeeping. We have also funded £1 million of emergency equipment and technical advice to help President Kabbah's Government become operational as quickly as possible. We will continue to play a full and active part to support the restoration of democracy and help rebuild the shattered economy.

Mr. Savidge: The House will unite in congratulating Her Majesty's Government on acting so swiftly and effectively. What are the Government's plans to provide continuing, long-term assistance to Sierra Leone as it emerges from its dreadful nightmare, and to involve other countries and international agencies in that process?

Clare Short: Britain has historical responsibilities in Sierra Leone, and it was only right that we did everything we could to restore democracy. The fighting has not finished everywhere, and we must be ready to move in quickly with food and medicines to help the Government restore their competence throughout the country. We must particularly help to get seeds and tools into the hands of people so that they can grow their own food. We are talking to the World bank and other donors to make sure we act together.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: Will the Secretary of State join me in congratulating the commanding officer and ship's company of HMS Cornwall on their work in bringing relief to the people of Sierra Leone during the recent troubles? Does she agree that conflict is a serious cause of poverty, and that the work of the Royal Navy and the other armed services has been vital in the humanitarian relief efforts, not only in Sierra Leone, but in other parts of the world? Can she assure the House that those efforts will not be vitiated in future by the outcome of the current defence review?

Clare Short: It was fortunate that HMS Cornwall was in the vicinity and was able to bring in supplies and assistance to Sierra Leone to bolster the returning Government. We were able to use Ministry of Defence helicopters cheaply, because the MoD charged only marginal costs to quickly provide food and supplies to people who otherwise would be in difficulty.

I agree very much that, in the post-cold-war world, war is more a feature of poorer countries and is more likely to break out within poor countries. It is caused by poverty and, in turn, it exacerbates poverty. The strategic defence review must take account of that change, and we must have the capacity to intervene rapidly to serve the UN, where necessary, and to learn the lessons of our dreadful failure in Rwanda. The right hon. Gentleman can be satisfied that the defence review will take account of all these changes and the need for our armed forces to continue to make a contribution.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the Secretary of State accept that in addition to the excellent work done so far, some of the needs include making sure that the areas out of the capital become peaceful and stable as soon as possible, and we may be able to help there; that the external borders are secured, so there can be a sense of security within which people can rebuild; and that rebuilding of key buildings and plant is done quickly so that the system can get up and running, and the Parliament—which, I gather, met yesterday—can begin to do its work properly in conjunction with the President?

Clare Short: I know of the hon. Gentleman's long-standing interest, and that of his constituents, in the situation in Sierra Leone. I agree with him. As I said, fighting is not finished everywhere, and we must bring assistance—food and medicines—as rapidly as we can to bring a return to normality. We must get the seed and the capacity to grow their own food into the hands of the people of Sierra Leone, as well as work hard—as we are doing—to get the capacity of the Government up and running, so that the people of Sierra Leone can take charge of their own country and its future. We have to learn from past failure about the demobilisation of those who have been involved in fighting and ensure proper management and civilian accountability of the armed forces, so that there is never again a coup that destroys democracy and does as much harm as has been done to the people of Sierra Leone.

Education Projects

2. Mr. Pike: If she will make a statement on her Department's expenditure in 1998–99 on education-related projects. [34627]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): We expect our Department's expenditure on education projects in 1998–99 to be more than £100 million, which will be directed to achieving the key international targets of universal primary education by 2015 and gender equity in primary and secondary education by 2005. We shall spend more on education as new programmes are agreed with our partners.

Mr. Pike: My hon. Friend will know that in South Africa the system of education inherited from the apartheid system has left major problems. Bodies such as the Canon Collins Educational Trust for Southern Africa have pointed out the problems in that country. What discussions are being held with South Africa to try to ensure that all the people of South Africa have the best possible opportunity for education, so that the pace of progress can be speeded up in that country?

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his question. I visited South Africa last year and had some discussions about the matter. I am pleased to say that South Africa, along with Pakistan, Malawi, Kenya and India, have had new basic education projects approved by the new Labour Government, amounting to £100 million in the last year. We are now developing projects in Bangladesh, Ethiopia, Ghana, Tanzania and Uganda, because we believe that primary education is one of the best means of enabling poor people to climb out of poverty and have better health and better lives.

White Paper

3. Mr. Gray: What representations she has received from non-governmental organisations about the White Paper on International Development. [34628]

Clare Short: NGOs have warmly welcomed the Government's White Paper on international development, particularly our commitment to the international poverty eradication strategy.

Mr. Gray: Of the 148 clauses in the White Paper, only two deal with the voluntary sector. The Secretary of State describes the NGOs' welcome as warm, but how does she reconcile that with the comments of Save the Children, which described its treatment as "perfunctory, incomplete, and a little confusing"?

Is it not the case that her disregard of the NGOs in the White Paper is indicative of a longer-term intention to use national Governments to deliver aid, rather than NGOs?

Clare Short: I think that, if the hon. Gentleman talks to the more thoughtful NGOs, he will find that they would say—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman should allow me to answer his question, instead of hectoring before I have replied. He will find that they would say that the White Paper concedes lots of what they have been demanding for a long time, which requires change of everyone. When one has been battering on a door that was closed and it then opens—the Government are more sympathetic and proactive in the field of development and are anxious to work with other Governments where they are keen to do so, because in that way it is possible to achieve much more in terms of the universal provision of basic health care, education and so on—there has to be an adjustment in the role of NGOs.

The welcome for the White Paper has been very strong among NGOs. There has been some carping on the sidelines such as the hon. Gentleman tries to put forward, but not from Save the Children as an organisation. The hon. Gentleman may try to find one mischievous quote—

Mr. Gray indicated dissent.

Clare Short: The hon. Gentleman does not have to act out his part—I heard what he said previously. If he listens to the reply, he might learn something—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had an opportunity to put his question, and he should listen to the answer.

Clare Short: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

As I said, the NGOs are all, in turn, rethinking their role in terms of working with a Government who have a stronger commitment to international development and who are seeking to work with other Governments with a stronger commitment. There is still a very powerful role for NGOs, but it is a changed role in changed circumstances.

Ann Clwyd: Although the White Paper's focus on eradicating poverty is very welcome, will my right hon. Friend pay special attention to Rwanda? The Select Committee on International Development has just returned from a visit to that country, which I know she has visited. It is the third poorest country in the world, fighting to recover from genocide, fighting to rebuild its education and health service; yet, with a crippling debt around its neck, it is impossible for Rwanda to survive and pay back that debt. Will my right hon. Friend give it very special attention?

Clare Short: I agree very much with my hon. Friend that the situation that confronts the Government and people of Rwanda is intolerable, and I have a lot of admiration and respect for what they are trying to do. They are recovering from genocide after the international community let them down badly and breached our agreements in international treaties always to intervene to prevent genocide.

Rwanda is a desperately poor country. It has very many people in prison, accused of genocide, and a large number of people trying to survive genocide. A million people have returned. The country has a high debt burden, and yet the Government of Rwanda are determined to make progress. We are committed to doing everything we can to work with the Government of Rwanda to achieve reconciliation, to rebuild the economy and to help with debt. It is not easy, but we are determined to do all that we can.

Dr. Tonge: Also in the context of the White Paper, and Rwanda in particular, have the Government any plans to bring pressure to bear on the European Union to help with the judicial process in Rwanda? Following the genocide, there are so many prisoners in Rwanda who need to be tried and dealt with.

Although the White Paper focuses largely on primary education for all, will the Secretary of State also consider helping with university and higher education in Rwanda, because so many skilled and educated people were lost in the genocide?

Clare Short: The question regarding the criminal justice system in Rwanda is not just a resource question, but a question of trying to build systems and promote speedier trials in a highly traumatised country, but the hon. Lady is right. I visited Kigali prison, which is absolutely full of people accused of horrendous crimes. There must be a system to speed up trials. Then, in the case of some of the more trivial offenders, it may be possible to promote truth and reconciliation, in a style similar to that adopted in South Africa. We have offered help to the Government of Rwanda, and I believe that they are ready to move soon.

On higher education, in Rwanda and elsewhere, we are reviewing all our scholarships and other support programmes to focus on the essential skills needed to build the capacity of poor countries to take control of their own future. Universal primary education is the key to the progress of a whole generation. Next, one should consider the high-level skills that are needed to give a country the capacity to make progress. It is not enough to put a sprinkling of resources into higher education in a way that promotes the interests of an elite, and does not promote development in the country.

Mr. Bayley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that NGOs based in developing countries provide a terribly important way of delivering aid to the poorest people? Has she been seeking feedback on her White Paper from NGOs abroad?

Clare Short: I agree with my hon. Friend that NGOs in the South need strengthening. They are part of the democratic capacity and governance capacity of a country, and we need to devote more support and effort to strengthening them. I continue to believe that, on universal public services such as education and health care, it is best if there is a willing Government with NGOs supporting, criticising and demanding quality services, because then one gets universality. However, there is a case for NGOs, as part of civil society, to stand up for the poor and for quality of services, and one must look to NGOs to provide services where Governments are unwilling. It is less good, but it is the way to go. Strengthening southern NGOs is a major objective of our policy.

Mr. Faber: I listened carefully to the right hon. Lady's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray). She must accept that the criticism by renowned organisations such as Christian Aid and Save the Children is more than carping. Even the Select Committee felt that the role of NGOs had been dealt with too briefly in the report.

If the right hon. Lady is keen to accentuate the positive and turn to what is good in her relationship with NGOs, as I am sure she is, can she tell us about the progress of the consultation process that she promised in her Department's reply to the Select Committee report? When does she intend to publish a more detailed response on the role of NGOs?

Clare Short: Up until today, Question Time on this subject has been genuine, but today there is clearly a theme to the questions. Hon. Members are trying to pretend that there is a conflict between the Government and NGOs in the field of development. That is an untruth. I am sure that, if the hon. Gentleman met some of the NGOs as often as I do, he would know that it was an untruth.

It is true that the step change that is reflected in the White Paper requires a change of strategy for British NGOs. They are engaged in much detailed thinking, and some of them have spoken to me about their change of role, arising from the fact that the Government are making a much more active and determined effort to promote international development. The consultation with NGOs about this change, which comes out of the more informal discussions that we have had and which I announced at Question Time a month ago, will start shortly.

Literacy (Developing Countries)

4. Mr. Boswell: What steps she is taking to encourage literacy in developing countries. [34629]

Clare Short: As our White Paper makes clear, we are strongly committed to the international target of achieving universal primary education in all countries by 2015. We see this as the most important step in increasing literacy worldwide. We are funding a large number of substantive primary education projects in Africa and Asia, all of which will contribute to the eradication of illiteracy. We also support adult basic education in many of our programmes.

Mr. Boswell: I thank the Secretary of State for her answer, and acknowledge that that is essentially a job to be carried out by nationals of the countries concerned. Will she acknowledge that universal literacy is the absolute basis of all economic and social progress? In particular, will she have regard to the fact that there is a marked gender imbalance in a number of developing countries, and that mothers are the best first educators of their own children?

Clare Short: The hon. Gentleman is right. A newly published paper from the World bank looks at what we must do to achieve the international poverty eradication targets throughout the world, especially in sub-Saharan Africa, where there are such high proportions of very poor and illiterate people. The finding is that the education of a generation of children, including the girls, who tend to be excluded in poor countries, is the biggest indicator of development. When that generation grows up, those girls as mothers and income earners transform the lives of the next generation. They are more able to earn a living, they are more likely to control their fertility and their own children are more likely to be educated. If there is one single indicator of development, education of all children, including girls, is it.

Mrs. Fyfe: I am sure that there is unanimity throughout the House about my right hon. Friend's last comments. Has she considered how to overcome the difficulty in countries such as Afghanistan, where the ruling authorities are opposed to literacy for girls and women?

Clare Short: My hon. Friend is right. It is universally recognised—it is not a matter of taste or preference—that there cannot be development unless women are empowered and girls are educated. That is a precondition of development. All agencies and donors throughout the world, including all United Nations agencies, are desperately worried about the situation in Afghanistan, which not only holds back development, but is a breach of the fundamental human rights of women and the universal declaration of human rights. There is an agreement across all the major agencies that we cannot and will not provide support and help in the Taliban-controlled areas of Afghanistan unless equal provision is made for girls and women.

Mr. Wells: Does the right hon. Lady agree that the single most important need in Jamaica is to reduce the level of illiteracy, which for many years has been running at 50 per cent.? Would she support through the aid programme the introduction of compulsory primary education to reduce illiteracy in Jamaica?

Clare Short: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting question. On the statistics, Jamaica and the Caribbean have virtually universal primary education, I believe, but there is a high drop-out rate and a serious quality problem. In the past my Department has been engaged in trying to improve the quality of secondary education in Jamaica. I have just been considering the matter. We know in my own city of Birmingham that it is better to pick up a child who is slipping back at primary level than to try to put things right at secondary level. I share the hon. Gentleman's analysis and am looking into the question now.

Strategic Defence Review

5. Ms Church: What discussions her Department has had regarding the strategic defence review; and if she will make a statement. [34630]

Clare Short: My Department is engaged in the defence review process. I have recently given evidence to the Defence Select Committee, and have had useful and interesting meetings with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and the Chief of the Defence Staff to discuss the review.

Ms Church: I know that the Secretary of State shares my view that ridding the world of the scourge of land mines will be a crucial contribution to international development objectives. Does she agree that those objectives will be best achieved if there is a co-ordinated strategy with other Departments? Will she pursue that matter with other Ministers?

Clare Short: My hon. Friend knows that we are doing all we can in that area. We are increasing our efforts to support land mine clearance and to strengthen the capacity of countries with many land mines to do their own clearance work so that we may speed up the process. My hon. Friend is correct: the post-cold-war world is different, and so is the challenge to our armed forces. As I said earlier, the risk of war is more prevalent in poor countries, the victims are increasingly civilians and there are more refugees than ever before. The room for more collaboration between the Ministry of Defence, my Department and the Foreign Office to try to prevent and resolve conflict is very great in the current historic circumstances.

Mr. Blunt: This morning the Defence Select Committee took evidence from Saferworld, among other bodies, as part of its inquiry into the strategic defence review. That organisation mentioned Pakistan, which is the recipient of one of the United Kingdom's largest bilateral aid programmes. It pointed out that Pakistan spends 25 per cent. more on military expenditure than on health and education combined. Pakistan has a missile programme and is developing weapons of mass destruction. It is also suspected of supporting terrorism in other countries. Will the Secretary of State review her policy of granting to Pakistan one of our largest bilateral aid programmes?

Clare Short: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern about Pakistan. He has tabled written questions about that country and the Government's strategy in that regard. Both India and Pakistan are nuclear-capable, have high defence spending and high levels of poverty. They are in unresolved serious conflict over Kashmir, and the situation is a danger to the people of India and Pakistan, and indeed the people of the world. We must see how we can engage most positively in order to promote development, encourage a reduction in defence spending and remove the causes of conflict.

I am certain that it would not be right simply to disengage before we have tried everything else. When a country spends too much on defence and has high levels of poverty there is much suffering and many causes of instability. However, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we cannot keep supporting the Government of Pakistan if they continue to spend disproportionately on defence.

Mr. Hoyle: In the context of the defence strategic review and the discussions that are taking place, will my right hon. Friend consider abandoning the joint funding of retraining for Russian officers, as Russia is not a third-world country and because that would be a major financial saving to her Department?

Clare Short: I am happy to inform my hon. Friend that my Department does not fund the retraining of Russian military officers. However, I shall ensure that his suggestion is passed to the appropriate Department.

Interestingly, my Department has been very unwilling to engage in military restructuring in the past. We have never gone further than demobilisation, because we obviously do not wish to become involved in the organisation of armed forces. However, we believe that that might have been a mistake in the case of Sierra Leone. Perhaps, if we had done more to make the armed forces in that country accountable to the civilian power, the last coup would have been avoided. We are examining our work in that area, but we shall not go as far as training Russian military officers.

China

6. Mrs. Ann Winterton: What steps she is taking to prevent funds from her Department supporting coercive abortion in China. [34631]

Clare Short: No funds from my Department support coercive abortion in China now or under the previous Administration. I am very surprised and disappointed that organisations and individuals who claim to have high standards of integrity continue to propagate this untruth. All our funding for reproductive health is contingent on respect for the principles of free and informed choice upheld at the international conference on population and development in Cairo in 1994. The work that my Department supports in China has the purpose of reducing the number of coercive abortions and giving Chinese people the freedom to control their own fertility.

Mrs. Winterton: Will the Secretary of State raise the issue of forced abortions in China with the United Nations Commission on Human Rights? Will she explain to a sceptical public how using United Kingdom taxpayers' money to fund such repugnant practices through the United Nations Fund for Population Activities is consistent with an ethical foreign policy?

Clare Short: Anyone who is serious knows that money given to the UNFPA by the Government and by the previous Government does not subsidise coercive abortion in any way. On the contrary; it is used to end those abusive practices and to give the people of China control over their own fertility. It is deeply unfortunate that hon. Members propagate untruths.

Afghanistan

7. Ms Roseanna Cunningham: When she last met aid agencies to discuss the situation in Afghanistan. [34632]

Mr. Foulkes: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not received a request from aid agencies to hold a meeting on Afghanistan specifically. However, officials are in regular contact with organisations providing assistance there, and they keep Ministers informed. My right hon. Friend and I have also discussed the situation in Afghanistan with Emma Bonino, the European Commissioner responsible for assistance in Afghanistan.

Ms Cunningham: The Secretary of State mentioned literacy. A recent written answer states that 17 British-based aid agencies working in Afghanistan are funded by the Department. What steps have been taken to ensure that aid is delivered non-discriminatorily, especially health and education aid? Given the outrageous plight of women in Afghanistan, they are virtually without a voice.

Mr. Foulkes: My right hon. Friend was a prominent supporter on international women's day of the campaign for the women of Kabul. The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) may like to know that we recently announced £7.5 million for UN agencies, for the Red Cross and for non-governmental organisations working in Afghanistan. Next month, I shall chair a meeting of the Afghan donors group, which will consider what further action could be taken. I shall bear in mind the points made by the hon. Lady.

Sudan

8. Rev. Martin Smyth: What representations she has made to the Government of Sudan on obstacles to non-governmental aid programmes. [34633]

Mr. Foulkes: We take every opportunity to press the Government of Sudan on the need for non-governmental organisations and other humanitarian agencies to have full access to vulnerable people. The United Nations, acting on behalf of all donors involved in the international relief effort in Sudan, exerts similar pressure.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Although I welcome the Minister's answer, does he agree that aid has not always reached its destination at the right time, and that some has been blocked, which causes great hardship? Does he also agree that, in other spheres of life, that would be called misappropriation or even stealing?

Mr. Foulkes: We now channel our aid through a number of organisations in which the hon. Member for North Wiltshire might be interested—Oxfam, CARE, the Red Cross and Save the Children. They are effective in getting aid to the poorest and most vulnerable people. We applied pressure about the stopping of flights to the south, and I am glad that they have been reinstated, which will help to get aid to people who face the severest threat.

Mr. Flynn: Hon. Members owe members of the Select Committee a great debt of gratitude for visiting Rwanda. Is it not extraordinary that, despite extraordinary carnage, there have been fewer deaths there than in Sudan over a slightly longer period? Should not we and the non-governmental organisations redouble our efforts to assist the two halves of Sudan, where murder and slavery exist, and every kind of atrocity takes place?

Mr. Foulkes: I assure my hon. Friend that we are doing everything possible to find a political solution. We support regional efforts to find a lasting solution to the conflict through the Intergovernment Authority on Drought and Development. The lives of the poor people who are suffering will be improved only when such a lasting solution is found.

Palestine National Authority

9. Mr. Burden: If she will make a statement on the Marin memorandum and EU aid to the Palestine National Authority. [34634]

Clare Short: The European Community aid programme for the Palestinians is due to expire in December 1998. It has helped the peace process survive under very difficult circumstances. We fully support the Council conclusions calling for renewal of this assistance, and shall be seeking to ensure that lessons learned about quality and effectiveness in the current programme are fully taken into account in the future.

Mr. Burden: While the Marin memorandum shows the value of EU aid to the Palestine national authority, does it not also make the clear point that aid without a comprehensive and just political settlement simply cannot work sufficiently? Are not the efforts of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary totally in line with the Marin memorandum in ensuring a leading role for the European Union in promoting such a just settlement? Is he not right to say to all parties in the middle east conflict that none of them is above, or immune to abiding by and respecting, the international agreements to which it is a party?

Clare Short: My hon. Friend is right. Despite large programmes of assistance to the Palestine authority from the European Union and our own bilateral efforts, the people of Palestine are getting poorer because of the political situation, the closing of Gaza and their inability to work. I agree that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary was right to draw attention to the failure of the Israeli Government to promote the peace process. We should all support my right hon. Friend and the European Union in all their efforts to get the peace process back on track. That is the only way to bring peace and development to the middle east.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [34656] Mr. Gareth Thomas: If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 25 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I shall have further such meetings later today and shall speak at a dinner this evening of leading members of the Asian community, both to celebrate the enterprise of the Asian community and to reiterate our total opposition to racism in all its forms.

Mr. Thomas: Following his successful visit to France, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is time to administer the coup de grâce to the law-making powers of the hereditary peers? Has he received any sign from the Opposition party in the other place that it will co-operate in this long-overdue reform of the ancien régime?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted that we are back on English today. I think that we shall stick with that. It is absolutely essential that we end up with a situation where we do not have people making the laws of this country on the basis of being hereditary peers. I think that that reform is long overdue and I hope very much that the Opposition will now tell us whether they support the principle of hereditary peers in the House of Lords because we could get this reform done more quickly with their consent. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition can tell us what his position is.

Mr. Hague: Does the Prime Minister agree that today's European Commission report fudges the criteria for entry to a single currency?

The Prime Minister: We are obviously considering the report that has been presented, but, no, I do not agree with the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Hague: The Maastricht treaty lays down that countries joining the single currency should have debts of under 60 per cent. of their national income or should be rapidly approaching it. On the Commission's own figures in this morning's report, eight of the 11 countries that are to join the single currency have a higher level of debt. Two of them have twice that level. Can he honestly tell the House that that is not fudging the single currency?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, a range of criteria are taken into account. We shall make our decision as president of the European Union and we shall do it on the basis of the report that has been submitted and also on the basis of the legislation that is set out in the treaty.

Mr. Hague: One of the countries has not only twice the recommended level of debt, but a higher debt level than at the time the Maastricht treaty was signed. The Commission says that the tendency is in the right direction. That is more ostrich than emu. Does the Prime Minister agree at least that it is essential for the success of economic and monetary union that there is genuine convergence, without any fudging?

The Prime Minister: The answer is that I do believe that, but, as I say, we take into account a range of different criteria and we will apply the treaty properly. I had understood that the position of the right hon. Gentleman's party was to oppose it altogether.

Mr. Hague: Whether Britain is in or out of a single currency, people of all parties have previously been able to agree that jobs and investment are at risk from a fudged single currency. The Prime Minister is president of the European Council at the moment. Does he not have a duty to Britain and to Europe to insist, and at the very least to argue, that only countries that clearly meet the criteria should join the single currency?

The Prime Minister: I agree that it is important for the single currency to work for Britain, whether we are in or out of it. I also agree that it is our duty as president of the European Union to ensure that the criteria are properly obeyed. We shall do so. All I am saying is that, if the right hon. Gentleman reads the report carefully, he will see that a range of criteria are set out. A judgment has to be made on that basis. We shall make it according to the report and to the criteria. We shall, in other words, carry out our duties under the treaty faithfully.

Mr. Hague: All the Prime Minister's answers this afternoon suggest that he will go along with the fudge. This will be one of the most important decisions that the European Council has ever made. People's jobs and businesses are at stake in countries inside and outside a single currency. If he would stand up for strict adherence to the rules, he would have wide support across the House, but is not the truth that, now that the crunch has come, he is not willing to make the hard choices?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not agree with that. Without repeating everything that I have already said to the right hon. Gentleman, yes, I believe that it is important that we adhere to the criteria, which is exactly what we shall do, but the worst thing for this country would be if it lurched into the type of anti-Europeanism that characterises his party. It is only as a result of the change in attitude since 1 May that we have a Government with any influence in the European Union at all.

Q2. [34658] Mrs. Ellman: Do not Labour's Budget decisions to increase child benefit by a record 20 per cent., to fund a national child care programme for the first time and to concentrate financial help on the poorest families and children, demonstrate Labour's commitment to equality and opportunity? Does the Prime Minister contrast that situation with the record of 18 years of Tory Budgets, which intensified inequality and division—[Interruption.]—trebled the number of poor people and produced the social exclusion that this Government are committed to tackling? [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: I find it extraordinary that Conservative Members should shout at my hon. Friend when she is raising issues such as child care and help for the poorest families, which are precisely what government should be about. As a result of the changes that we have made in the Budget, child benefit is going up, there is greater help for people with their child care, there is obviously a cut for everyone on national insurance, and there is extra money for health, education and transport. The changes mean that the poorest households with children will gain an extra £490 a year on average and that 3.8 million children will benefit. I should have thought that that was a series of recommendations and policies that would command support across the House.

Mr. Beith: Bearing in mind the serious difficulties that are being faced by British exporters because of the exchange rate, does the Prime Minister think that the pound is either stable or competitive?

The Prime Minister: I am well aware of the problems that exporters have over the pound, which has a high value at the moment, but the Budget could take the pound down only if it engaged in revenue-raising measures that everyone would find totally unacceptable and that might not work in any event. We have to provide the right balance between fiscal and monetary policy. We have tightened fiscal policy considerably and, as a result of giving the Bank of England independence over the setting of monetary policy, we have also succeeded in that long-term interest rates are at their lowest for more than 30 years. That stability is precisely what British industry needs in the long term.

Mr. Beith: Does the Prime Minister not recognise that there is one thing that he could do in present circumstances—give a clear and unambiguous commitment that he will promote British membership of the single currency and that he intends Britain to be in the premier division, not the second division, to which the Leader of the Opposition would condemn us?

The Prime Minister: I cannot think of a worse reason for taking a decision of such fundamental importance for the future as monetary union on the basis of the level of sterling at a particular time. That would be foolish indeed. The right hon. Gentleman appears to be advocating getting the pound down by dropping interest rates. Monetary policy has had to be tightened since the election because inflation is back in the system. There is no way in which we should take any risks at all—in terms of either financial prudence or monetary stability—of going back to boom and bust. If we do that, we shall return to the end of the 1980s and the early 1990s, with interest rates at 15 per cent. and record borrowing, bankruptcies and repossessions. Those were the Tory years, and we are not going back to them.

Q3. [34659] Mr. McNulty: Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the impending publication of the White Paper on the London assembly and the London mayor and the apparent conversion of the Tories to campaigning for a yes vote in the referendum, depending on which Tory one is talking to? However, will he strongly resist the extremely tempting offer from Lord Archer, who has promised to give up writing books if he is elected mayor? Although that may be an appropriate contribution to British literature, the alternative—an Archer mayoralty—would be a complete and utter disaster for London.

The Prime Minister: Our proposals for a mayor for London now have widespread support across the House. I am delighted that the Conservative party has come round to the idea and will campaign for a yes vote. Personally, I think that it will be a good thing for London and, combined with the highly imaginative proposals for London Transport by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, at least now, after years of neglect, we have the chance for a new start for London.

Q4. [34660] Mr. Collins: Why did the Prime Minister refuse to admit yesterday that he had interceded with the Italian Prime Minister on behalf of Mr. Rupert Murdoch, especially given that the British Embassy in Rome has now confirmed that that is exactly what he did?

The Prime Minister: What I said—I shall repeat it to the hon. Gentleman now—is that conversations between myself and the Italian Prime Minister, as conversations between heads of Government, should remain private. I have made it clear that BSkyB will be treated no differently from any other company.

Q5. [34661] Jacqui Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, as part of its work on implementing the new deal, the employment service in Redditch is already working with local agencies on training, enterprise, housing and welfare advice? It is also implementing a new deal guaranteed to continue working with young people until they have permanent work or training. Does he agree that such work is to the credit of the Employment Service in Hereford and Worcester and that it shows that we now have a Government who are keen to promote jobs, training and opportunity for all, as opposed to policing a burgeoning benefit bill and inefficiency, as we saw in the past 18 years?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the work that has already been done under the new deal and the numbers of people who now have the chance to get back into the labour market. Already, more than 1,000 lone parents have moved from benefit to work. Hundreds of young people are taking advantage of the scheme and thousands more will do so in the next few months. It is a great tribute to the Employment Service, employers and those who, for far too long, have not had the opportunities that they need. I hope that tomorrow's Green Paper will take the process one stage further. It is important that we have a welfare state in which there is work for those who can, security for those who cannot and opportunity for those who are denied it.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I congratulate the Prime Minister on the honour paid to him yesterday by the French Parliament, but will he explain why we see so little of him in the British Parliament?

The Prime Minister: During these Question Times, the hon. Gentleman gets precisely the same chance to question me as there used to be under the old system—it is just a shame that the questions from the Opposition are so poor.

Q6. [34662] Mr. Prosser: Does my right hon. Friend remember being in my Dover and Deal constituency before the general election and visiting the highly successful trust port of Dover, which the Tory Government were ready to sell off to the French? With the economic policies of this Government and the confidence that they engender, the port of Dover now handles one third of European trade, and is planning to build a second terminal. Last week it signed contracts that will create 1,600 new jobs. Is it any wonder that my constituents will never vote Tory again? [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: I think that I heard the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) say, "Bring back David Shaw." I think that, when my hon. Friend won the Dover seat, he probably united both sides of the House.

I am delighted at the good news from the trust port: it shows exactly what can be done—new jobs, stronger service and a great sense of the future. That is precisely because we put the interests of the service before the dogma of privatisation.

Miss McIntosh: As a pro-European, does the Prime Minister accept that one of the criteria for joining a single currency is a two-year membership of the exchange rate mechanism? Can he envisage a time when it would ever be right for Britain to rejoin the ERM?

The Prime Minister: First, we have no plans to rejoin the ERM, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made clear on many occasions. Secondly, what is important is exchange rate stability. Those matters will be decided in the same way as I explained earlier to the Leader of the Opposition—according to a range of criteria. The hon. Lady will find that that is what a report from the Commission, published today, says.

Q7. [34663] Mr. Plaskitt: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the lobby held yesterday against the Child Support Agency reflects growing concern that the agency has failed many families and children? Will he assure the House that the Government review will be completed as speedily as possible; and that it will concentrate first and foremost on the interests of children?

The Prime Minister: It is important that the review concentrates first and foremost on the interests of children. It will be published later this year. We believe it important to undertake fundamental reforms of the system, since most people now accept that the Child Support Agency is neither administratively satisfactory nor, often, fair and just in its decisions. That is why we undertook the review; as soon as it is ready, we shall bring it before the House.

Mr. Wigley: As the European Commission's new proposals for structural funds leave Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland with no objective 1 status, will the right hon. Gentleman make a determined effort on the part of the Government to ensure that the newly defined western and coalfield region of Wales, whose GDP per head is 72 per cent. below the threshold for objective 1 status, enjoys objective 1 status under the proposals for the years 2000 to 2006?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the publication of the Commission's proposals for structural funds marks the beginning of the negotiations. We shall negotiate the best deal we positively can for Britain. I cannot give guarantees for particular areas, but we have said that the Commission's proposals are unacceptable because many of our areas would lose out. The purpose of the negotiation is to prevent that from happening. The last time that the Commission made proposals, we went through the same process of negotiation.

It is important to see this in the context of the enlargement of the European Union. Changes will have to be made to the structural funds, and it is important that they should be fair as between all the countries—hence our objection to the proposals as they are now. Change to structural funds is a necessary part of enlargement. If we want the end—enlargement—we must also will the means. We shall get the fairest deal that we can, but change there will be.

Q8. [34664] Mr. Clapham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, towards the end of the previous Government's term in office, the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1996 went through, restricting the backdating of disablement payment in cases such as asbestosis and mesothelioma cancer? Those diseases can be caused by exposure to white asbestos, a considerable amount of which still enters this country and is in many materials used by the construction industry. Will he therefore ensure that the current DSS review considers backdating payment to the date of development of those diseases? Will he press ahead unilaterally with a ban on white asbestos if the EU does not go ahead with a European ban?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has raised this issue a number of times. A standard time limit on backdating those benefits is designed to ensure fair treatment for all citizens. There would be a problem if particular benefits were picked out and longer backdatings were allowed for some rather than others. However, we accept the special circumstances of people affected by asbestos. From April 1997, industrial injuries disablement benefit has been available where the disease has been caused by any exposure to asbestos at work, and the usual waiting period has been waived to pay benefits to sufferers as soon as possible.

On the second point, we have already toughened up the restrictions and regulations on the use of all types of asbestos in the workplace. We are presently working with European colleagues to get a Europewide directive on this, as we believe that that is a better way to proceed. It is important, however, that the action we take is matched by action elsewhere in Europe.

Q9. [34665] Mr. Ruffley: Why is the national tax burden increasing from 38.1 per cent. of gross domestic product last year to 40.1 per cent. of gross domestic product in five years' time?

The Prime Minister: Actually, if the hon. Gentleman compares our Budget proposals in the Red Book with those of the previous Government, he will see that, under both sets of proposals, the tax burden is set to rise.

Dr. Iddon: Last year, the Deputy Prime Minister asked the water companies to stop water wastage by investing some of their profits in infrastructure. All they have done is produce higher dividends for shareholders and, even more seriously, reduce water pressure, thereby endangering lives throughout the country, according to fire brigades. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is an insult to the Government? Will he assure the House that more action will be taken?

The Prime Minister: Within the powers available to him, the Deputy Prime Minister is seeking to ensure that the problems to which my hon. Friend draws attention are dealt with. Dealing with water leakage was one of the initiatives taken straight after the election. It is regrettable, especially given that profits in the industry have been so high, that those complaints are still being made. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will keep the matter under review.

Q10. [34666] Mr. Tyler: Do not the BBC's proposals for political and parliamentary reporting not only undermine its reputation for public service broadcasting but blow sky high its charter obligations? Would it not be better to be honest, to dumb down completely and sell off channels to Rupert Murdoch?

The Prime Minister: Those are matters for the BBC, but it must act in accordance with its charter. It is the Government's job to make sure that it does, and we shall do that. I am sure that a lot of pressure will be exerted on the BBC by the hon. Gentleman and many others in the House who feel the same way.

Dr. Whitehead: I am sure that the Prime Minister agrees with me about the amazing all-purpose funding properties claimed for the Liberal Democrats' magic penny. After last week's Budget, does the additional money that the Government have put into the national health service now stand above or below the magic penny standard measure?

The Prime Minister: The extra money put into health, education and transport comes to far more than could possibly be raised by 1p on the standard rate of income tax. Indeed, the Government are putting more money into hospitals and schools this year than the Liberal Democrats ever asked for. However, according to the Liberal Democrats' broadcast on the Budget, that 1p is apparently no longer necessary—the "p" has dried up! They now say that it should all come out of what they call the "Chancellor's war chest". The fact that the Liberal Democrats are now pursuing tax-and-spend policies that are only spend policies simply demonstrates the complete incredibility of their economic policies.

Q11. [34667] Mr. Rendel: In February, the Government announced that the jobseeker's allowance cuts that were part of the Conservatives' spending plans would be reconsidered as part of the welfare state review. In the light of that, does the Prime Minister agree that it would be best also to reconsider, as part of that review, the lone parent and council tax benefit cuts?

The Prime Minister: No, I do not agree with that. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made it clear in his Budget statement that we would not go back to benefit for lone parents. [Hon. Members: "Shame."] I do not think that it is a shame; I think that it is right. I think that, pro rata, lone parents and couples should be treated in the same way. However, as a result of the help given in the Budget to all families with children, they are much better off than they would be either under the Conservative plans that were published before the election or under the Liberal Democrats' plans.

Dr. Stoate: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, although the Government pledged to stick to the Red Book targets of the last Government, we have invested significant extra money in the economy for health, education and the new deal for young adults? Will that not make a huge difference to the economy?

The Prime Minister: There is the £3.5 billion that has gone into the welfare-to-work programme, which, as I have said, is the largest programme of its kind that any Government have ever introduced. There is—as I have also said—the additional money for schools, hospitals and transport, and there is the additional money for child benefit.

The priorities have changed, but yes, it has always been necessary for us to keep a tight grip on public spending. Under the Conservative Government, the national debt doubled. This year, we shall spend more on interest payments on debt than we spend on our whole school system. It is to restore faith in public finances that the Chancellor has presented the measures that he has presented—but, within the public finances, the priorities will be Labour priorities, not Tory priorities.

Q12. [34668] Mr. William Ross: Does the Prime Minister recall that, when the body of Mr. Keys was discovered in the Maze prison, the first statement issued by the Northern Ireland Office was to the effect that his death had been due to suicide, although it was blatantly obvious that the man had not only been murdered, but had been tortured beforehand? Can the Prime Minister give us a guarantee that in future he will ensure that any statements that are issued are accurate? Can he also give a guarantee that the Government will now protect the lives of those in the prison, and that no more inmates will be murdered?

The Prime Minister: To the best of my knowledge, the report and the statement were correct in terms of what people believed on first finding the body. It is true that the findings then changed, and that the statement changed as a result. I cannot guarantee that every statement will always be accurate if the perception of the facts changes; what I can guarantee is that we shall do our best—as we have—to tackle any such problems, in the Maze prison or elsewhere.

As for what happened in the Maze prison, the regime there—which has been operating for some time—is, as the hon. Gentleman knows, under review. There is the report from Sir David Ramsbotham, and there is also the Narey report. We have agreed to publish those reports, so that people can make up their own minds. Of course the situation is desperately serious, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that the statement made by the Minister at the time was made in good faith, even if it subsequently turned out to be subject to change.

Q13. [34669] Mr. Timms: When the last Government left office, was not unemployment still considerably higher than it had been in 1979? Youth unemployment was more than twice the overall level, yet there were large and growing skill shortages in key parts of the economy, particularly in information and communications technology. What steps will the Government take to ensure that the enormous new opportunities for work in information and communications technology will be available to young people in my constituency, many of whom would have been abandoned to unemployability by the last Government's policies?

The Prime Minister: Some £200 million additional finance was provided in the Budget, and that money can go towards tackling skills shortage problems. It is absolutely necessary that we deal particularly with the computer and technology problems that will arise as a result of the millennium bug, which is why the Government have singled out for more resources computer and information technology. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the large numbers of people—the 3.5 million workless families—who will, for the first time, have the opportunity to work and to earn a decent living.

Mr. Jenkin: How does the Prime Minister reconcile his grand words about rooting out corruption in Labour councils with the continuance in office of the Lord Provost of Glasgow, Pat Lally?

The Prime Minister: That is a quite bizarre question, because the Labour party has taken disciplinary action against that individual, who is, of course, perfectly entitled to go to the court, which is what has happened.

I contrast the actions of the Labour party on any allegations of impropriety—we have always acted, and acted straight away—with those of the Conservative party, which has to its discredit the scandal of Westminster. The Conservative party took no action against any of the people involved in that scandal, exactly as, before the general election, it took no action against Members of Parliament who breached the proper rules of conduct. The last people from whom we will take lessons on corruption or impropriety are the Conservatives, whose record is shameful.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I take points of order after statements.

London Governance

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. John Prescott): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to made a statement about our proposals for a Greater London authority.

Last July, we published a consultation paper setting out our proposals for an elected, strategic authority for London. More than 1,200 individuals and organisations responded, and we have listened carefully to their views.

Today, we are publishing our detailed proposals for a radical new type of local government. For the first time in the United Kingdom, people will have the opportunity directly to elect their mayor—the mayor of London. Londoners will also be able to elect a small, streamlined, strategic assembly. The new authority will have new powers devolved from central Government. It will work with the boroughs and not duplicate their work.

This is another step in our programme of constitutional reform. We are establishing new devolved assemblies in Scotland and Wales, with the full consent of the people of Scotland and Wales. We are now taking a significant step in the decentralisation of government by establishing these new arrangements in London.

The proposals fulfil our manifesto commitment to restore democratic, citywide government to London. It is almost 12 years since the Greater London council was abolished by the previous Government. There was no consultation then—no Green or White Paper, and certainly no referendum. Public opinion polls at the time showed overwhelming opposition to the abolition of the GLC; indeed, it was sheer arrogance on the part of the Government to abolish it without the consent of Londoners.

However hard people have tried to fill the gap, there is no substitute for democracy: no voluntary committee, no consultants' reports, no Cabinet Committee can substitute for London democracy. London needs leadership with a clear mandate from the people to tackle the problems that have built up over the years, such as traffic congestion, decaying infrastructure, air pollution, crime and social exclusion.

The Labour Government have decided to give Londoners the choice to have a voice. Londoners will vote on our proposals in a referendum on 7 May—if they vote yes, as I believe they will, we shall introduce the necessary legislation.

Many of the world's great cities have thrived on powerful, directly elected mayors—cities such as New York, Toronto, Cologne, Wellington and Rome. Now, for the first time, a local authority in Britain will have a directly elected mayor and a new form of assembly, which will act as a check and balance on the mayor. Uniquely in this country, there will be a separation of powers between them.

I intend to bring arrangements for policing in line with those in the rest of the country. Since the days of Robert Peel, the Metropolitan police have been responsible only to the Home Secretary. The time has come for that to change; we must make the police accountable to Londoners. We are therefore establishing a new police authority. The mayor will appoint 11 assembly members to the board of the new Metropolitan police authority.

The mayor of London will be a powerful figure, with an electorate of more than 5 million voters—more than any other individual politician in the country. They will expect the mayor to deliver real improvements in their quality of life. The mayor will therefore need considerable powers. The mayor will directly control two powerful new organisations responsible for transport and economic development in London, control large resources—currently more than £3 billion—and be a powerful voice for London at home and abroad.

To balance the powers of the mayor, there will be a new type of council and a different role for its members. The new assembly will think and plan strategically for the benefit of all Londoners, examine and test the mayor's policies and performance, and be able to approve or amend the mayor's budget. The assembly will also have a wider role; it will have wide-ranging powers to investigate issues on behalf of Londoners.

We believe that this new form of London government demands a new type of voting system, tailor-made for London. We want the mayor to have a clear mandate. With an electorate of 5.5 million people and a potentially long list of candidates, we must have a system that ensures that the mayor has the backing of the largest possible number of people. The Government believe that the supplementary vote system—known as SV—for the election of the mayor will achieve that. It allows voters to mark their first and second choice of candidate, and will therefore give the mayor a strong mandate to implement his or her manifesto.

The assembly will have a different role, and the way in which it is elected will need to reflect that difference. It needs to ensure a direct link with local constituencies and broad representation of all Londoners. We believe that the system must also enable women and members of ethnic minority groups to be more fairly represented. The assembly will therefore be elected by a system similar to the one being used for the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh assembly: the additional member system. That means that 14 of the assembly members will be directly elected from 14 constituencies by a first-past-the-post system, and that 11 others will be drawn from Londonwide lists to reflect the proportion of votes that the parties receive.

The GLA will have eight significant areas of responsibility. It will develop and manage an integrated transport system; create jobs and promote economic regeneration; tackle crime; ensure that Londoners have adequate fire and emergency services; improve London's environment; devise a strategy for land use planning; promote London's arts, sport and tourism; and improve the health and quality of life of Londoners. Each of those has an impact on the others, so it will be essential for the mayor to tackle London's problems in an integrated and sustainable way. A number of important organisations under the mayor's control will assist in that task.

We will create a new London development agency, which will implement the mayor's economic and regeneration strategy. It will have powers to attract new investment, create jobs and tackle the problems of rundown areas. It will also be one of nine similar regional development agencies that we are creating across the English regions. It will be responsible to the mayor and not the Secretary of State. As the first democratically accountable development agency, it will be a trailblazer for the other regional development agencies.

An efficient, integrated, transport system is essential to the capital's health and prosperity. Transport for London will be responsible for the underground, London buses, taxis, most main roads, river transport and the docklands light railway. It will also have a say in how other commuter railways are run. The mayor will appoint the chair and board, set its budget and be responsible for its strategies and performance.

I have already set out our proposals for an accountable police authority. We want to ensure that, in tackling crime, we bring together all those London organisations that have a part to play. Londoners have confirmed that they would expect the mayor to oversee the fire service. The mayor will therefore appoint assembly members and London borough councillors to a new fire and emergency planning authority.

The state of London's environment is an important element in its competitiveness, and is crucial to the quality of life and health of those who live in, work in and visit London. The mayor will have substantial new powers and responsibilities, working with the boroughs and others, to improve air quality, tackle noise and London's growing waste problem and improve Londoners' quality of life in other ways. That will contribute to improving the health of Londoners, and will encourage tourism and inward investment.

Matching economic regeneration, social and environmental needs will require the best use of the resources available. The mayor will be responsible for drawing up strategic planning guidance. Boroughs will continue as local planning authorities, but their development plans will have to conform to the mayor's strategy.

Culture, tourism and media and related leisure services are the second biggest component of London's economy, currently totalling £9 billion. London's culture acts as a magnet to visitors both nationally and internationally. It is essential that the quality and diversity of the capital's cultural achievements should be maintained and improved.

A new forum to be established by the mayor will include existing cross-London cultural and sports organisations. It will play a major part in developing the mayor's strategy. Government funding for tourism in London will be channelled through the mayor.

It will be understood from what I have said that we are creating new and radical institutions to give London the means to solve its problems and maximise its potential. We will also require new ways of working, to ensure that the GLA is genuinely accountable to the community that it is elected to serve.

The GLA will be an open and accessible authority: the assembly will meet regularly and in public; the mayor will have to notify the assembly of all major decisions and give reasons; each month, there will be a question time, when the assembly questions the mayor and senior officials; twice a year, there will be a people's question time, when the mayor and assembly can be questioned in public and by the public. [Interruption.] I do not understand why Conservative Members consider it so important for parliamentarians, but not for the people of London, to be able to question representatives. Every year, the Mayor will deliver a state of London address, which will be debated in an open, public forum.

That is just the starting point. We expect the GLA to develop other imaginative ways in which to consult and to involve people in its decisions.

Our aim is also to simplify the structure of governance in London. A number of organisations will be absorbed wholly or in part into the GLA. That will mean change, but we will work closely with the affected organisations. I would like to reassure staff that transfers will be within the public sector, and will be on existing terms and conditions. We will examine the pension arrangements, with a view to ensuring that the GLA offers broadly comparable arrangements within the public sector.

The financing of the GLA will come from a range of sources. It will inherit existing funding for the services that it provides for Londoners. The grant, council tax, business rates and credit approvals currently amount to about £3.3 billion. The mayor will decide how the money is to be spent. The assembly will approve the mayor's budget, and there will be safeguards to protect service standards.

The greater part of the authority's funds will be spent on transport, economic development, policing and fire services. The mayor and assembly and their small staff will cost about £20 million a year—less than 1 per cent. of the GLA's budget. The Government will also spend up to £20 million in preparation for the GLA, including the provision of its headquarters.

These are exciting and radical proposals, which I am proud to present to the House. They are a significant part of the Government's programme of constitutional reform, and they correct one of the previous Government's most foolish, undemocratic and reckless acts. They secure the role of the boroughs, placing responsibility for taking decisions at the right level. London will have an elected mayor for the first time in British history.

Above all, the proposals provide a choice and a voice for London, and return government to the people of London.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we believe that the public of London should have been allowed two separate questions in the May referendum on whether they want a mayor and, separately, on whether they want a directly elected assembly. We greatly regret that the Government did not agree to that, and we regret it even more having seen the White Paper proposals, which profoundly affect the 32 boroughs of London. Although we will say yes in the referendum, because of our support for the mayor, we do not accept many of the proposals in the White Paper. In particular, we do not accept the devaluation of the role of borough councils that is implicit in virtually every page of the White Paper, but was hardly mentioned in the Secretary of State's statement.

Is it not a fact that the Government are proposing layer after layer of administration and bureaucracy for London? There will be a mayor for London, a new assembly for London, a development agency for London, a transport authority for London, and a Government office for London, as well as the prospect of junior executive mayors throughout London. Only then do we get to the borough councils. Is not one of the White Paper's fundamental faults the fact that, although the borough councils are nearest and most directly accountable to the public, their powers are being curtailed? They are being sidelined.

[Sir Norman Fowler]

Let me give the example of planning. On page 14 of the White Paper, the right hon. Gentleman sets out his planning plans. He says:

"The Mayor would set the overall framework for the development of London. The boroughs would continue to deal with small and local planning matters but major developments in the boroughs should fit in with the Mayor's overall scheme."

Does he not recognise that many London residents will be greatly concerned if that means that decisions on vital local issues such as the green belt and the development of green-field sites are handed over to a new central authority?

Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise also that there will be concern about the new authority's cost and its taxing powers? Is it not the case that it will be able to raise money by top-slicing proceeds from council tax? Will he confirm clearly—it is anything but clear in the White Paper—that the Government are considering giving the new authority the power to impose taxes on cars coming into London and to put new taxes on car parking by offices and shops?

Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance on the Metropolitan police? The Home Secretary has been the police authority since 1829. It should be emphasised that the Metropolitan police has served the public well over the past 170 years. It has a local policing role, but will the Deputy Prime Minister give an assurance that nothing will be done that could conflict with its role in fighting terrorism or its other national roles?

At the end of his statement, the Deputy Prime Minister talked about returning government to the people of London. How does he square that with the electoral system that he proposes? Does not the first-past-the-post part of proposals mean that 14 assemblymen will have constituencies of more than 500,000 people to serve? How is that close to the people of London? Does not the proportional representation part mean that the remaining assembly members will be on a list system, answering first to their party organisation? How is that close to the people of London?

The Secretary of State referred to the May referendum, but let me remind him that there are also borough elections on that day. I hope that the public will use that opportunity to register a protest against the proposals in the White Paper, which have the undoubted effect of reducing the power of the boroughs, to the disadvantage of the people of London.

Mr. Prescott: When a complaint is made that there will be one question rather than two questions, I say that no question was asked by the Tory Administration when they abolished the Greater London council. It is one question rather than two, because we are proposing a new form of local government. The mayor is an integral part of the assembly system. There are checks and balances. It is a radically different form of local government. That is why we have asked people in London to endorse it. On 7 May, we will see the answer. Nevertheless, the Opposition have done a U-turn and decided to support the proposals. The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) draws this distinction: "I support the principle, but I do not like the White Paper." The issue will be decided on 7 May.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to certain bodies and organisations, but the London borough authorities have welcomed the White Paper. There are many matters that they will want to discuss with us and, now that the White Paper has been published, we will be able to have discussions with them. The general principle involved in the discussion and consultation groups might be unusual to the right hon. Gentleman—it is called consultation. In consultation, one gives a reasonable idea of the sort of thing one wants to do. Our proposals have been warmly accepted, and they are embodied in the White Paper. That is why the authorities are able to say that they agree generally with the White Paper and with the new form of London government. We will enter into proper discussions with them on these matters.

We are not changing a great deal of the activities of the borough authorities; the strategic example of that is roads. For example, 95 per cent. of roads are relevant to the activities and traffic management of borough areas. Some 5 per cent. of London's roads carry something like one third of the traffic. Those are the strategic routes which cross borough boundaries, and it makes a lot more sense to have a strategic approach. That is what the GLA is doing with roads and all forms of transport.

The right hon. Gentleman complained about the organisational structure, but we are recommending a bonfire of a number of the quangos that the Conservative Government set up. They did away with the elected representation. As for the financing and the available resources, we have said that the cost is equivalent to about 3p on band D council tax. As with all local authorities, about 80 per cent. of funding comes from central Government, with 20 per cent. raised through council tax, and so on. There is not a great change in the way in which local authorities will be financed, although the scale of the resources in total is considerably different because we are dealing with the capital city.

As for our consideration of raising finance through charges for non-residential parking, we have said that we will deal with that in the White Paper on transport. The principles in the White Paper will apply to all local authorities. London is a different type of local authority, but it is a local authority, and the rules we introduce will apply to all.

With regard to the police authority, I echo the right hon. Gentleman's words on the work of the Metropolitan police. I welcome the fact that the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has welcomed the White Paper. He is in a good position to make a judgment on whether the extra powers that we are giving him will strengthen or weaken him in tackling crime. I assume that it is fair for me to say that, if he welcomes the White Paper, it must strengthen his position. That is another mark of the success of the White Paper.

As for the electoral system, we have said that this will be a different form of local government. Fourteen of the assembly members will be elected by direct election, and we have decided that the remaining 11 will be elected from a list system, because we believe that that will give a wide representation of the various groups in London. That principle has been followed in Scotland and Wales, and the House has debated it. We think that it will provide better representation, which is important in getting support for the new London authority. It is my view that on 7 May there will be an overwhelming endorsement of the radical approach to London government taken by the Labour Government, and a total rejection of the carping and U-turns that are the Conservative party's history on London local authorities.

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): May I congratulate the Deputy Prime Minister on putting before Londoners an exciting and radical new job opportunity? I wish to raise two small points of concern. Listening to his account, I felt that he has come down against those Londoners who argued that we needed more powers for the assembly and fewer powers for the mayor—a case that has been reflected strongly in opinion polls. On finance, if there are to be no direct tax-raising powers, can we expect that Londoners will be allowed to keep a greater share of the £6 billion more that we pay into the national Treasury than we get back? The worst problems in Britain are here in this city.

Mr. Prescott: The judgment made in the White Paper is to get a proper balance of powers, checks and balances between the assembly and the mayor. I think that it is a proper balance and that we are right to do so, but we shall leave it to the electorate to make that decision. The arguments regarding resources are more on a national level than internal to London. That is a debate which is on-going in the House and, no doubt, my hon. Friend will have a chance to make more of those points in coming days in what I think is a rather nationalist fervour.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): May I thank the Government for being clearly committed to restoring democratic government to London, which is much appreciated, and for the process of Green Paper, White Paper and referendum, which is clearly the proper way to proceed? I also thank the Deputy Prime Minister, as a northerner, for being clearly committed to London, London's causes and London's success.

First, what are the things on which, as a result of consultation, the Government have changed their mind between the Green Paper and the White Paper—not just clarified, but changed their mind?

Secondly, given that, as I understand it, the financial regime for the Greater London authority will allow the Government to fix a spending ceiling and a spending floor, and, therefore, it looks as though the GLA will not have a huge amount of independence if the Government do not wish it, is that not inadequate for a capital city, which deserves and needs to be able to raise and spend its own resources?

Lastly, given the change of electoral system proposed, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it would be better to have a system for both the assembly and the mayor that allows independent candidates to have a chance of making progress, not just party political nominees? In any event, can we have the elections next year and not in 2000?

Mr. Prescott: We have not yet decided exactly when the elections will be, but the House will want to ensure that the London authority is well established before the next general election, and we intend to achieve that. We need to embark on discussions with various people about the date and time, and we hope to make a decision in the summer.

One example of a change from the consultative document is the payment of assembly members, which we thought was an important change to make. In view of many of the things that we have heard in the past few years, that was an important step, and it is proper that it be done in a properly accountable democracy.

The independence of these bodies and the question whether the powers will change are a matter of balance. We are creating a very powerful body and a high-profile one—

Mr. Hughes: But not an independent one.

Mr. Prescott: Well, I do not think that Governments totally control such matters at the end of the day. We are giving powers and resources, and giving these bodies tremendous opportunities to speak on behalf of London. That will provide a powerful pressure, not only to the good of London, but perhaps towards effective change in constitutional and political terms. That is what we are doing here; such matters arise during the coming debates.

I think that we have basically got the right balance in electoral change, and I wait to hear people's responses in the coming months. We shall introduce legislation based on the proposals in the White Paper.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): Speaking as a son of the last chairman of the London county council, which was destroyed by the Tories in the 1960s, and remembering also the Greater London council, which was destroyed by the Tories in the 1980s, may I ask whether my right hon. Friend agrees with me not only that this is an important and historic day for those of us who are proud to be Londoners, but that we must urge all Londoners to turn out in their millions to vote yes in the referendum, so that the passion for democracy among Londoners speaks so loud and clearly that the Conservatives will never dare to destroy democracy in London again?

Mr. Prescott: Many hon. Members will remember my hon. Friend's father who, as its chairman, was a powerful and effective influence on the authority of that time. It will be an historic day for Londoners and for the constitution itself, because we are making significant constitutional changes.

The hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) made some kind remarks about my commitment to London; that commitment is to decentralisation of power, whether in Scotland, Wales or the English regions. London is the first step, and I am hopeful that there will be many more, but this is about the decentralisation of power.

A London authority is something which we should welcome; every one of us should take the opportunity to get everybody to turn out. Democracy is about turnout, it is about mandates and it is about endorsement, so we should be encouraging as many people as possible to vote on 7 May.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Will the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that, under these proposals, the status of the City of London, as determined by the conclusions and recommendations of the Herbert commission, will be maintained, subject to changes in the City's franchise, which I understand the Government have approved?

[Mr. Peter Brooke]

Mr. Prescott: The City corporation is not dealt with in the Bill. It has said that it will undergo specific changes in its democratic processes, internal procedures and voting practices. I hope that that is the case, and the House may be sure that I shall review matters as they progress.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Will the Deputy Prime Minister agree with me that the abolition of the Greater London council was one of the most spiteful and undemocratic acts of the previous Administration, and that Londoners of all parties will welcome the restoration of democracy to London? A great capital city deserves an elected authority.

As for the matter of the police committee, apparently Opposition Members are unaware that, for a long time, the Metropolitan police Commissioner has supported the idea of a police committee for London, because he realises that it can play a constructive role in involving communities in the fight against crime.

Mr. Prescott: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. It was undemocratic and spiteful, as I said in my statement. The Metropolitan police Commissioner has confirmed that view, not only in relation to the White Paper; it was previously his view. He is only confirming what, generally, the rest of the country accepted a long time ago—but in London there was always an exception. I do not believe that that exception was justified. I am glad that the Commissioner does not believe that it is justified. That is one of many changes which will come about as a result of the White Paper.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Who will prevail if there are conflicts between the mayor and assembly on budgetary matters, or the mayor and the boroughs on planning matters?

Mr. Prescott: The procedures in all these matters are to be decided, in the sense that there will be a strategic plan that is determined by the mayor, and if the borough plans conflict with it, he will be able to call the matter in. That is exactly like what happens now. Ultimately, in the case of all planning cases, if there is a conflict it will be for the Secretary of State to call the matter in if he decides that that is right. We are not suggesting that London is any different from any other local authority.

One of the advantages that will come from the Bill is that the London assembly people and the mayor will take a decision about safe taxis and not be subjected to the curious behaviour that we have seen in the House, which has denied passengers that safety.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): My right hon. Friend will be aware that some of us have strong and deep reservations about the proposals for a directly elected mayor. Having said that, I pay tribute to the work that has been done over the years by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who have kept the flame of the prospect of a restoration of democracy alight in London.

One of the tests of the new authority will be that eventually it achieves an unfettered right to raise a level of taxation in London from Londoners to enable it to tackle the problems that we now face. I also urge my right hon. Friend to think seriously about bringing the elections forward to next year, so that we can restore democracy that much more swiftly.

Mr. Prescott: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. Many hon. Members with London constituencies have worked long and hard to bring about proposals of this type. I have had the good fortune to arrive in this job and to be able to introduce the White Paper, but I very much endorse my hon. Friend's remarks about those who, for a long time, have attempted to bring back government to London. Regarding the elections, I assure him that I shall do as much as I possibly can to ensure that we have those elections as soon as possible, so that Londoners can have some influence on decisions that affect them.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The additional member system of election is alien to this country, and there is no evidence, in any sense or form, that it is more democratic. The representative democracy that we have enjoyed over the years ensures that there is a direct personal connection between a locality and the elected representative.

I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that, if he is seeking, by manipulating the list members of the assembly, to ensure particular representations of ethnic minorities or of women, he could be in breach of the Race Relations Act 1976 in one case and the Sex Discrimination Act 1986 in the other. Is it not also true that local people can have no confidence in the mayor, who will have unprecedented powers over budget and patronage unless the assembly is able to replace or remove the mayor and unless local people can ensure that, in relation to development plans, their specific interests, especially concerning the environment and the green belt, are safeguarded?

Mr. Prescott: Obviously, I fundamentally disagree with most of the hon. Gentleman's comments. We have agreed that the additional vote system should apply to Scotland and Wales. Therefore, we are not creating a precedent, although the system is new to English local government. The point about additional representation will be relevant to the 14 constituencies in which members will be directly elected. That is an important principle.

In a modern democracy, one must take into account the serious under-representation of women and ethnic minority groups. If we want their support for local government, they must have some stake in it. Representation is an important part of that. I am not sure that the directly elected system is not open to persuasion, change and the other pressures that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but we all know the role of party politics in such matters. We have struck the proper balance, so we have presented our proposals to the House.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): May I express my appreciation to my right hon. Friend for his decision to press for the use of the supplementary vote—a system which was invented in my home in Keswick and worked on for more than 12 months in my office in London—for the election of the mayor of the new authority? I believe that it is the system which should finally be used for the election of Members of Parliament. It is a thoroughly democratic system, which I am sure will please the people of London and, ultimately, the wider nation.

Mr. Prescott: I recall that my hon. Friend gave evidence to the Plant committee on that very point. The plans that we have adopted with regard to the mayor are right. It is important that there should be a popular mandate—that as many people as possible agree to support a mayor. This is the best way of ensuring that, which is why we have adopted it.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley): The Deputy Prime Minister made much of checks and balances. Will he correct me if I am wrong in my impression that a developer could submit a plan to the local authority, it could be called in by the mayor, who, on checks and balances, would have the Greater London authority involved in the decision at that level, the development agency would also be involved, and the plan could then be called in by the Secretary of State through the Government office for London?

Mr. Prescott: That is an important point, which was raised by my hon. Friend. I explained that not every planning decision by the borough can be called in by the mayor, but he can have a role in regard to decisions taken in boroughs, which are of strategic significance. He must develop a strategic plan to achieve that and to show where those differences can be established. At the end of the day, it will still be the Secretary of State who will make the planning decision in regard to these matters.

Mr. Jim Fitzpatrick (Poplar and Canning Town): May I offer my congratulations to the Deputy Prime Minister on the statement that he has just made, and echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Mr. Wicks)? This is indeed a proud day to be a Londoner, whether one has a classic cockney accent like mine or a south London accent like my hon. Friends.

I refer to a matter on which my right hon. Friend did not comment—the siting of the new mayoralty and the elected assembly. I have previously pointed out that, as the centre of gravity of the capital has been moving eastwards for the past 20 years, docklands may be an appropriate home for the new elected assembly.

I recognise that space is still available at county hall, that the City corporation has offered accommodation at the Guildhall and that other premises may be available in the capital. Given the experience of Scotland and the competition between Glasgow and Edinburgh—a decision which I consider has been inappropriately concluded—and the difficulty between Swansea and Cardiff, may I ask the Deputy Prime Minister who will make the decision on where the mayoralty will be sited? Will it be the Government office for London or the mayor, and when is that decision likely to be taken?

Mr. Prescott: That could be a very controversial decision. The Government will make a decision initially so that we can get on with London government, but, after that, the elected authority can make its own decision.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Will the new London transport board be responsible for planning air transport in London, and particularly for the configuration of airports that serve the London area?

Mr. Prescott: That is a very interesting point. The strategic question of aviation and the siting of airports will affect London and its development. That decision will be considered as part of the national transport plans; we shall say more about it in the White Paper. The mayor will clearly want to be consulted about the matter. For example, he may have an opinion about the expansion of London City airport and the effects on Heathrow, and so on. Such issues will affect London, and the mayor will have an important voice in policy development in that area. However, the mayor will not make the decisions.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): As the former leader of London's largest borough, I add my support to the initiative. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the proposal will add value to local boroughs because, instead of floating around in an isolated individualistic manner, there will be an holistic approach to economic development, transport and the environment? Will he confirm that the subsidiarity principle will apply to planning and that individual boroughs will have a unitary development plan set within the wider framework of the evolution of an economically successful and environmentally sustainable capital for Britain?

Mr. Prescott: A grievance expressed by many London authorities is that, with the abolition of the GLC, they have had no influence over those strategic decisions apart from some consultation now and then with a Government Department. We must develop a strategic plan in consultation with the boroughs. The GLA will be a strategic authority and it will have a close relationship with the boroughs, which will have influence on the boards.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Does the Deputy Prime Minister echo my enormous welcome for the political vigour of the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), but does he share the concern about the early direction of the hon. Gentleman's campaign for mayor? Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware that the official publication "London Facts and Figures 1995" reveals that public spending per head in London in that year was 20 per cent. higher than public spending per head in Scotland? In the light of that, is it altogether wise for the hon. Member for Brent, East to make public spending in Scotland an issue in his campaign in London—particularly given the fact that he might want some expatriate Scots to vote for him?

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. No doubt he and my hon. Friend can meet outside this place and discuss the facts of the case.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that this is a great day for Londoners like me, who were born in London, and for the millions of Londoners who have come from all over the world to live in this great city? Does he recognise that a great advantage of his proposal will be that we shall at last be able to rid this city of the residuary bodies and the quangocracy and begin to have some democratic accountability regarding the governance of Londoners and this city?

[Mr. Mike Gapes]

Mr. Prescott: Yes, I do. That is right at the heart of what the White Paper is about. Not only Londoners but people all around the country will welcome the introduction of democratic accountability to their capital city. I am Welsh by birth and I represent a Yorkshire constituency, and I am delighted to advance proposals for democratic accountability in London.

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): May I ask the Deputy Prime Minister to enlarge upon an answer that he gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), as I think that his reply may have gone rather further than he intended? What right of appeal will there be to the Secretary of State against decisions of the mayor and, in particular, what rights will be vested in borough councils or other organisations or individuals? While such a right would be very welcome, how does the Deputy Prime Minister square it with his alleged attempts to decentralise power?

Mr. Prescott: I may have made a mistake, although I do not think at this stage that I did. I shall examine the matter carefully and write to the right hon. Gentleman. As I said before, the London authority will develop a strategic plan. It will allow for appeals to the Secretary of State, who will be the final arbiter.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the current position of the Conservatives in London? Who represents them? Is it the Tweedledum who has just rubbished the White Paper, the Tweedledee who was dancing around on the bus for the yes campaign the other day or the funny little man from the other place who likes to give £2,000 to people he does not even know?

Mr. Prescott: That is an interesting point, but I usually keep out of such controversial issues.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): I am an expatriate Scot. As the assembly and mayor will have some tax-raising powers, who will collect the tax—the boroughs or the mayor and the assembly?

Mr. Prescott: Council tax will be collected by the boroughs.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. Does he agree that the new London development agency must consider the development of Wembley, our national stadium? It should be fitting and appropriate for a national stadium, and of a standard that one expects of national stadiums throughout the world, especially as we hope to welcome the World cup and the Olympic games to this country in future.

Mr. Prescott: Yes, I very much agree with my hon. Friend, who has made that point often. The planning and development of the national stadium and of the roads and transport that serve it will have considerable implications for London. The development of Wembley stadium is a good example of how accountable strategic planning in London will benefit his constituency.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware that the borough of Reigate and Banstead and the constituency of Reigate lie within the Surrey county council area, but are cut in half by the boundary between the Metropolitan police and Surrey police areas? In the interests of accountability, and so that local people are aware of which police force is theirs, will he support the position of all political parties in the borough of Reigate and Banstead and change the boundaries of the Metropolitan police area to those of the Greater London area?

Mr. Prescott: We have no proposals at the moment to change those boundaries, but we recognise that democratic accountability in London applies to people outside the Greater London area. We shall be seeking an agreement about representation on the police authority between authorities that are outside the Greater London area but within the Metropolitan police area.

Mr. William Thompson (West Tyrone): I welcome developments in London, especially the election of a mayor for the city and the increase in democracy in the London area, but will the Secretary of State contrast and compare that with the lack of local government democracy in Northern Ireland? Will he use his influence as Deputy Prime Minister to persuade the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to restore proper, accountable local government in Northern Ireland so that we, as equal citizens of the United Kingdom, can enjoy the same privileges there as Londoners will have in London?

Mr. Prescott: The House listens with concern to the hon. Gentleman's comments. The current discussions, which are led by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, are geared to achieving a normal situation in Northern Ireland, which is an essential prerequisite to proper democratic accountability.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): The Deputy Prime Minister talked about respect for people and for Parliament. Given that much of what he has said appeared on the internet this morning on the BBC's website and others, will he undertake to show less contempt for the Greater London authority than he has apparently shown for Parliament?

Mr. Prescott: Everyone is concerned when documents are leaked. I gave the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) a White Paper a short time before I made my statement—before the time that is considered usual—and that was all that I was involved in. It is proper for such a document to be considered by the Opposition.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I deplore the fact that the information appeared on websites and in the Evening Standard. I played no part in that, and should like to have prevented it. What has happened is most frustrating, because I strongly believe in reporting to the House at the earliest occasion, and shall always try to do so. I am sorry about what has happened and offer my apologies, but I cannot guarantee that it will not happen again. It is demeaning to the House that the statement was reported in the paper before it was made to the House. I shall continue to do whatever I can to stop that.

Points of Order

4.18 pm

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It has been brought to my attention that the hon. Members for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. White) and for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) have urged residents of Milton Keynes to canvass for the Labour party and have sent them invitations in franked House of Commons envelopes to attend a social event, which has apparently been organised by the Labour party, to discuss local elections with Members of Parliament from the region.

You will be aware, Madam Speaker, that I provided you with some documentation on the subject and said that I would raise it as a point of order because I seek your advice and guidance on it. It seems to me that what has transpired is a scandalous abuse of taxpayers' money for a party political purpose in which the two hon. Members are engaged. I think that the Serjeant at Arms' office has had something to say about the matter, but I should be grateful for your ruling.

Madam Speaker: Let me tell the hon. Gentleman and, indeed, the House that if any hon. Member thinks that others are abusing the use of stationery in that way, the matter should not be raised in the House. Our procedure is to go directly to the Serjeant at Arms who will resolve the matter. The two hon. Members concerned are here. I will not allow a debate on the point of order, but they have been challenged and it is their right to be heard.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. It is true that my staff sent invitations to party members and supporters. The vast majority of them were sent in Labour party envelopes. Unfortunately, when they were finished, a member of my staff used some House of Commons envelopes by mistake. When I heard about that, I went to the Serjeant at Arms on Tuesday and offered to reimburse the House for the misuse of those envelopes. I apologised at that time and I apologise now. It was a genuine error.

However, the comments by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) will not stop me standing up for the people of Milton Keynes and campaigning on their behalf.

Madam Speaker: Thank you, Mr. White. That resolves the problem.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sorry that the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) is no longer in his place. Earlier this afternoon, the hon. Gentleman accused the Lord Provost of Glasgow of corruption. At no time was that person charged with corruption and it is disgraceful conduct for any hon. Member to accuse an elected member of a local authority of that, because it besmirches the local authority. I know that hon. Members are free to say things in the House that they dare not say outside, for fear of being sued, but the hon. Gentleman's conduct was deplorable, and it ought to be discouraged.

Madam Speaker: I am not responsible for what hon. Members say in the House. I have always urged that when hon. Members use the privileges of the House what they say should be tempered by responsibility. I heard the comments and I heard the Prime Minister's response. I think that he dealt with it very well.

Local Exchange Trading Schemes

4.22 pm

Mrs. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend social security regulations with respect to local exchange trading schemes; and for connected purposes.

I am grateful for this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House what has been described as the most significant new community development tool of the decade. The scale of this country's voluntary sector is immense. It involves 23 million people—more than the number of people who operate in the economy's formal labour markets. People seek to be stakeholders in myriad ways, combining individual purpose and collective responsibility through a mix of voluntary, community and business activity.

In our manifesto we said that an independent and creative voluntary sector that was committed to voluntary activity as an expression of citizenship was central to our vision of a stakeholder society. One of the most imaginative and popular innovations to emerge from the voluntary sector is the local exchange trading scheme movement, or LETS as it is becoming commonly known. LETS are community-based exchange networks that inspire local people of whatever means to pool their skills, imagination, time and resources to create a supportive community of self-help and mutual aid. They do it through a system of community credits, valuing what is given or received in terms of local units of exchange.

Community credits, which are known in their various forms as local or community currencies, time dollars, service credits or service hours, have captured the public imagination and fascinated the media. Each local exchange trading scheme adopts a local name for its unit of exchange: from ideals in Bristol to readies in Reading, from groats in Stirling to exes in Exeter. The names of the units often have strong local connotations. In my constituency, they are called plums after the plum tree from which some people say Plymouth gets its name.

Most LETS involve only up to several hundred members. They bridge the gaps between voluntarism, the market and public sector provision. Like a well-known beer, LETS have the capacity to reach the parts that neither the state nor the formal market economy can reach.

By creating an intermediate, grass-roots social market with their own intermediate social currency, such schemes empower people who are socially excluded to feel that they can make a difference to their lives and to their communities in 101 different ways. They are the essence of social inclusion, valuing people as responsible contributors: as producers rather than passive recipients. They empower people to create their own means of obtaining a hand up rather than a handout.

Exchanges through LETS reflect people's abilities and express their needs. Women often form a majority of members. The most common services involve child care, preventive and remedial health and care services, home produce, arts and crafts, do-it-yourself repairs, gardening, shared transport, personal education and the development of skills through mentoring and peer group support. Exchange of health care services represents 20 per cent. of all exchanges, and in many areas general practitioners refer patients to LETS.

The growth of co-operative projects, including food co-ops and tool banks, and the involvement of local voluntary agencies is expanding. There are multicultural projects. About 25 LETS have been established specifically for mental health user groups and for people with disabilities.

LETS renew the social fabric of communities, creating a framework in which everyone's contribution is valued. They enable people to tackle for themselves poverty, community breakdown and social isolation. It is for those reasons that LETS have been hailed by community development professionals as "the most significant new community development tool of the decade".

Some of the most far-reaching studies on social exclusion have identified that poverty reduction is by no means solely a matter of income. Fewer chances to hear of work because of reduced social networks, deterioration of skills, lack of ability to acquire new skills—or, having acquired them, to use them—and low self-esteem are all addressed by LETS.

LETS offer a social network that includes people from diverse backgrounds, within which exchange takes place. They offer skills development through those exchanges. They offer recognition of worth and value from receiving credits, which demonstrate that what has been done is of value to someone else in the community. People often receive a huge boost to their confidence when they receive LETS credits for their service.

The wide-ranging appeal of LETS arises most fundamentally from that general longing that many people have in today's world for a return to a real sense of community. More than 1,000 LETS have appeared throughout western Europe, with 450 in local communities throughout the United Kingdom covering most towns, cities and rural areas. Most follow the British self-help community development model of LETS that was pioneered by the national voluntary agency LETSLINK UK, which has just been awarded national lottery charity funding to maintain its support of groups nationwide.

LETS are recognised in key policy recommendations in reports of the Commission on Social Justice and the Commission on Environmental Health. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the Local Government Association and the Local Government Management Board also recommend that LETS should be nurtured as "core rather than fringe activities."

More than 100 local authorities and a growing number of health authorities have embraced LETS and are investing in them as an important new anti-poverty, health promotion and community development tool.

Hon. Members may be asking themselves why, given such friends and recognition, LETS need a Bill to promote their interests. There is a growing fear among LETS members whose income derives from benefit—as well as among groups that support and encourage their development—that the DSS may apply inappropriate earnings rules to LETS, treating the credits as though they were money.

Many of the most disadvantaged, who have the most to gain from participating in LETS, depend on incapacity or disability benefits, lone parent benefit or jobseeker's allowance. The possibility that, in gaining credits with very limited purchasing power, they may as a result of local DSS discretion lose the basic cash benefits that are essential for their living expenses has for some time been deterring a large number of people from joining LETS.

That fear has been heightened by a recent DSS circular underlining the possibility that LETS may result in housing benefit deductions. We must take note of the early warning signs that people on benefit who are already members may withdraw from LETS in large numbers if the housing benefit circular is not quickly amended. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Welfare Reform is considering the issue, and I am hopeful that the immediate threat can be dealt with through the simple means of straightforward administrative clarification.

The most cursory examination of LETS will reveal that, in terms of what it will buy, the local credit is patently not the same as money. At face value, the unit may be loosely related to the pound, but it bears no comparison in spending terms and cannot be exchanged for sterling.

LETS operate on a relatively small scale. Unlike the formal market, they do not supply day-to-day goods and services on a regular basis—99.5 per cent. of exchanges are between individuals and the remaining 0.5 per cent. offer only non-regular goods and services for a percentage of LETS. At least 30 independent surveys of LETS bear that out, including two conducted by the Rowntree Trust, and call for amendments involving a blanket disregard of LETS in the DSS regulations.

The recognition of LETS-type community credits has already prompted clarification of the benefits rules in the USA, Australia, New Zealand, Holland and Ireland, where Governments are now proactively supporting their development and promoting them for the unemployed through jobcentres. In America, time dollars are not only exempt from benefit clawbacks: they are guaranteed by the US Government as an intermediate form of supplementary pension entitlement. Over the past two years, the active participation of unemployed people in a time-dollar scheme has been even further enshrined as one condition, for those still seeking work, of entitlement to remain on benefit.

The Commission on Social Justice, a report for the Rowntree trust and leading think tanks, including DEMOS and the Institute for Public Policy and Research, have recognised the potential of LETS for tackling social exclusion and creating a new infrastructure of community support and have been advocating clarification of the benefits rules. My Bill would bring LETS back into the main stream, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mrs. Linda Gilroy, Mr. David Drew, Mr. David Lepper, Mr. Paul Goggins, Mr. Andrew Love, Ms Patricia Hewitt, Mrs. Joan Humble, Mrs. Louise Ellman, Mr. Andrew Miller, Mr. Mike Hancock, Mr. Cynog Dafis and Maria Eagle.

Local Exchange Trading Schemes

Mrs. Linda Gilroy accordingly presented a Bill to amend social security regulations with respect to local exchange trading schemes; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 24 April, and to be printed [Bill 159].

GOVERNMENT OF WALES BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Order [15 January],

That paragraph 2 of the Order [15th January] be amended by inserting at the end '; and on the first allotted day paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business) shall apply to proceedings on the Bill for two hours after Ten o'clock.'—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Question agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF WALES BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 82 (Business Committee),

That the further Report [24th March] from the Business Committee be now considered.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 82 (Business Committee),

That this House agrees with the Committee in its Resolution.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

The House divided: Ayes 277, Noes 136.

Division No. 230] [4.34 pm

AYES

Ainsworth, Robert (Cov'try NE)
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Baker, Norman
Ballard, Mrs Jackie
Barnes, Harry
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beard, Nigel
Beckett, Rt Hon Mrs Margaret
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Stuart (Middlesbrough)
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Benton, Joe
Best, Harold
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blair, Rt Hon Tony
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brake, Tom
Brand, Dr Peter
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burgon, Colin
Burnett, John
Butler, Mrs Christine
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Cann, Jamie
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Cohen, Harry
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corston, Ms Jean
Crausby, David
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dafis, Cynog
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, Rt Hon Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Drew, David
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Fearn, Ronnie
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flint, Caroline
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Goggins, Paul
Golding, Mrs Llin
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hall, Patrick (Bedford)
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Heath, David (Somerton & Frome)
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, Alan (Newport E)
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Dr Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kirkwood, Archy
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Linton, Martin
Livingstone, Ken
Lock, David
Love, Andrew
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
Mackinnon, Rt Hon Robert
McNulty, Tony
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Norris, Dan
Oaten, Mark
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
Olner, Bill
Öpik, Lembit
Organ, Mrs Diana
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Rendel, David
Robinson, Geoffrey (Cov'try NW)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Savidge, Malcolm
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Southworth, Ms Helen
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Steinberg, Gerry

Stevenson, George
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Straw, Rt Hon Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Tonge, Dr Jenny
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Twigg, Stephen (Enfield)
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Woolas, Phil
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. John McFall and
Mr. Jim Dowd.

NOES

Ainsworth, Peter (E Surrey)
Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Arbuthnot, James
Atkinson, David (Bour'mth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Beggs, Roy
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Mrs Virginia
Brady, Graham
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Cash, William
Clappison, James
Clark, Rt Hon Alan (Kensington)
Clark, Dr Michael (Rayleigh)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Collins, Tim
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cran, James
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davies, Quentin (Grantham)
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Day, Stephen
Donaldson, Jeffrey
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Duncan Smith, Iain
Evans, Nigel
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Flight, Howard
Forsythe, Clifford
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Dr Liam
Fraser, Christopher
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Goodlad, Rt Hon Sir Alastair
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Hague, Rt Hon William
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hayes, John
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Horam, John
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Key, Robert
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lidington, David
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Madel, Sir David
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Norman, Archie
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Roe, Mrs Marion (Broxbourne)
Ross, William (E Lond'y)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
St Aubyn, Nick
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shephard, Rt Hon Mrs Gillian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Smyth, Rev Martin (Belfast S)
Soames, Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Townend, John
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Trimble, Rt Hon David
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Walter, Robert
Wardle, Charles
Waterson, Nigel
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Whittingdale, John
Willetts, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Oliver Heald and
Mr. John M. Taylor.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Orders of the Day
Government of Wales Bill

[1ST ALLOTTED DAY]
As amended (in the Committee), considered.

4.45 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Hon. Members will be aware that, in the regional lists set out in clause 4, the Bill provides for elections for a registered political party, defined in that clause as "a party registered under any enactment providing for the registration of political parties."

Hon. Members will also be aware that a Bill for the registration of political parties will shortly be introduced and that it will govern not only this Bill but the Scotland Bill, the European Parliamentary Elections Bill and—if the statement that we have just heard about the White Paper is correct—the London Bill.

We are to debate a clause and an amendment—amendment No. 183—about an aspect of registration on which the registration of political parties Bill could have a crucial effect, either in remedying a fundamental flaw that we have identified and raised earlier, or in failing to remedy it. To make any sense of today's debate, which is crucial to the integrity of the Bill that we are considering, it is necessary to have detailed sight of the forthcoming legislation.

I have already asked for that formally. On 2 March, I said:

"So central is the question of registration to the proper working of the electoral roll system that it is unconscionable that the legislation could complete its passage through this place without full sight of, and discussion about, the statutory criteria by which registration will operate . . . I make that point very seriously at this stage in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take steps to ensure that, when we return to the Bill on Report on the Floor of the House in due course, we shall be fully apprised of the details of the forthcoming legislation".

The Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), led me to believe that he had some sympathy with my view, although he qualified what he said. He said:

"I am not in a position to give a guarantee about when the details on registration will emerge."

He could, however,

"assure Opposition Members that we want to see whether it will deal with these issues."—[Official Report, 2 March 1998; Vol. 307, c. 803-5.]

The hon. Gentleman also accepted that the matter was crucial and central.

The point is that we have not had sight of the legislation. I have made inquiries of the Table Office and the Library, but I have been told that it is not ready even in draft. It is not possible for the House to see it, although—as the Government have acknowledged—whether the fundamental flaw that I have mentioned would be remediable is central. Surely the House has a right to information that would allow it to understand the implications of a vital element of legislation such as this Bill before it completes its passage.

I do not believe that today's debate on the proposed electoral process should take place until hon. Members have had a chance to give proper consideration to the details—even if only in draft—of the registration of political parties Bill. Without a sight of it, we will be asked to complete our consideration of this Bill in the dark. At the very least, we need to debate this extraordinary situation, which has been caused by the Government's failure to provide crucial information.

I therefore ask whether you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will accept a motion, That further consideration of the Bill be now adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have listened with care to what the right hon. Gentleman has said. I appreciate the notice he gave of his concerns and his arguments, but I have to tell him that I am not prepared to accept such a motion. However, I understand that amendment No. 183, to which he referred—which is tabled in his name and those of his hon. Friends—is broadly connected with the matter that he raised. I would be prepared to permit a separate Division on that amendment. However, I must tell the right hon. Gentleman that, in terms of the programme motion, I will not be able to do that if the amendment cannot be moved before 11 o'clock.

Mr. Ancram: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful for your ruling. I shall take on board what you said about amendment No. 183.

On another point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you will be aware, we are proceeding in this business on the basis of a uniquely agreed programme, which was agreed among all the parties at the beginning of the Committee stage and which settled on a given number of days for Committee and Report.

As you will understand, such an agreement is based on the time that Opposition parties believe they need to do justice to important legislation being taken on the Floor of the House. In this case, it was agreed that there would be seven days for the Committee stage—now completed—and two days for Report and Third Reading.

If, on Report, the Government bring forward substantial new clauses and amendments in the knowledge that they will take precedence over any other business—thereby reducing the time available to the Opposition parties to discuss matters that they wish to discuss—should there not be a duty on the Government to allow extra time, as provided for under the original business agreement?

As the protector of Back-Bench rights in this House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope that you will understand my concern that, unless this is resolved as a matter of principle, future agreements of this sort could be defeated by Governments effectively hijacking Report stages, in the way that the Government have sought partially to do on this occasion.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is a most serious matter. I for one have long advocated the timetabling of very important Bills such as this. This is the second occasion on which we have encountered problems during devolution debates. A few weeks ago, a very important debate on the West Lothian question was seriously curtailed because the Government chose to make a very long statement—as, indeed, they have done again today.

Another problem, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) has not mentioned, is that, because the many amendments before us were tabled so late on Monday, it has been impossible for us to table amendments to those amendments. That is surely a very serious matter. The House is being held in contempt by the Government not allowing a proper debate on these important matters.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair cannot rule on agreements made between the usual channels. If an agreement is made but then becomes unsatisfactory to one or other of the parties, that matter must be pursued through the usual channels once again. The responsibility of the Business Committee was to consider the matter, and it did so in the way laid down. Now, the House has approved the Business Committee's motion, so we are encased in that motion for our consideration of the rest of the Bill.

I am sure that everyone recognises that we are on a learning process on programmed Bills. Satisfactory progress in the way the Select Committee on the Modernisation of the House of Commons wants obviously relies on good will between all the parties, through the usual channels, and ensuring that adequate time is made available so that all parts of a Bill receive the scrutiny that is thought right for each of those parts—if this practice is to be applied more widely in future.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are all grateful to you for those wise words, but you are the Chairman of the Business Committee. Although I fully appreciate that what you can and cannot do there is carefully circumscribed—and, as you rightly said, the House has approved the motion—we are most anxious that programming should work.

We have tried to show that in every way—but today the programme has been turned into a guillotine. We find that utterly unacceptable and we cannot guarantee that, on future controversial Bills, we shall want to co-operate as we have sought to do on the Bills in question if adequate flexibility and injury time are not allowed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Again, I must tell the hon. Gentleman that we are on a learning curve with such matters. I am sure that, so long as there is sufficient good will across the House, if the situations that have arisen in respect of Bills that have been programmed so far appear to one or more parties to be unsatisfactory, that will be examined. That would be in the spirit of the report of the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons.

The Committee was anxious that the House should accept the idea, and an attempt has been made to use the programming system for two very complex and important Bills, which may for that reason have been more likely to throw up difficulties. I hope, however, that we can overcome those difficulties, so that what is seen as a useful initiative can still be employed in future.

Mr. Ancram: Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not want to take up any more of the House's time, but what my hon. Friend said relates in particular to Government new clause 31, which was, I understand, tabled late on Monday. It was starred yesterday, and we sought to amend it but, obviously, our amendment is starred today and is therefore not eligible to be considered for selection.

I raise that matter because what you have just said reminded me that, on 26 February, the Home Secretary and the shadow Home Secretary had a short interchange on the European Parliamentary Elections Bill—their words are recorded at column 546 and I shall not bother the House by quoting them in full—in which they both made it clear that they felt it right for amendments and new clauses to be tabled in sufficient time for amendments to them to be tabled by Opposition parties. That has not been the case in this instance, and I hope that you can tell us that the process outlined between the Home Secretary and the shadow Home Secretary should form the basis of good manners for such proceedings in future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that we will all learn from the experience that we now have of the Bills that have been programmed. The Business Committee has tried to foresee the difficulties and ensure that adequate time is available, but sometimes, of necessity, contingencies arise. Important Government statements may have to be made or late amendments may be tabled, and those may cut across the perfectly well-intentioned views of the participants in the Business Committee. Perhaps we will learn from that and try to ensure more flexibility in future; I hope that that aim will be pursued through the usual channels.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ron Davies): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether you would allow me to make one or two brief observations in response to the points raised—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What the right hon. Gentleman says must be expressed as a point of order. If he wishes to raise a point of order or a further point of order, he may, but this is not an opportunity for a general statement.

Mr. Davies: I understand that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and was about to ask whether you would allow me to make one or two points arising from the observations made by right hon. and hon. Members and from your replies. Therefore, I want to do that as a point of order.

Can you confirm that the Opposition had every opportunity to discuss with the Government the terms of the time made available? Can you also confirm that the Government made available all the time requested by the Opposition to facilitate the debate that was required?

Perhaps you would further confirm, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the first three hours of today's debate will be on a subject initially raised by the Opposition, on which the Government agreed in Committee to table amendments on Report to fulfil the Opposition's request—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State is engaging in argument rather than making a point of order. He must know that the Chair cannot confirm those things. The Chair is not a party to discussions among the usual channels and cannot know what is agreed. The Chair will understand only what is produced in terms of resolutions and discussions in the Business Committee.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

New clause 20

ASSEMBLY FIRST SECRETARY AND ASSEMBLY SECRETARIES

'.—(1) The Assembly shall elect one of the Assembly members to be Assembly First Secretary or Prif Ysgrifennydd y Cynulliad.

(2) The Assembly First Secretary shall appoint Assembly Secretaries, or Ysgrifenyddion y Cynulliad, from among the Assembly members (and may at any time remove a person from office as an Assembly Secretary).

(3) The standing orders must specify the maximum number of Assembly Secretaries that may be appointed.'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.59 pm

Mr. Ron Davies: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment (c) to the proposed clause, in line 5, after 'Secretary,' insert

'subject to the approval of the Subject Committee of which that Assembly Secretary is a member.'.

Amendment (a) to the proposed clause, in line 5, at end insert—

'(2A) The Assembly First Secretary shall appoint—

(a) one Assembly Secretary as the Financial Secretary; and

(b) one Assembly Secretary as the Business Manager.

(2B) The Assembly First Secretary shall not appoint the same Assembly Secretary as Financial Secretary and Business Manager.'.

Amendment (d) to the proposed clause, in line 5, at end insert—

'(2A) Any appointment under subsection (2) above shall not have effect unless it is confirmed by a decision of the Assembly as a whole.'.

Amendment (b) to the proposed clause, in line 6, leave out from (3) to end of line 7 and insert—

'There shall be no more than eight Assembly Secretaries in addition to the Assembly First Secretary.'.

Government new clause 21—Executive committee—

'.—(1) There shall be a committee of the Assembly whose members shall be—

(a) the Assembly First Secretary, who shall chair it, and

(b) the Assembly Secretaries.

(2) The committee shall be known by such title as the standing orders may provide (but is referred to in this Act as the executive committee).

(3) The Assembly First Secretary shall allocate accountability in the fields in which the Assembly has functions to members of the executive committee so that, in the case of each of those fields, accountability in the field is allocated either to one of the Assembly Secretaries or to him.

(4) The Assembly First Secretary need not make an allocation under subsection (3) to every member of the executive committee; but the number of Assembly Secretaries to whom no such allocation is made shall not exceed such number as may be specified in, or determined in accordance with, the standing orders.

(5) For the purposes of this section and section (Subject committees) "accountability", in relation to a member of the executive committee and a field, means that he is the member of the executive committee accountable to the Assembly (in accordance with standing orders under subsection (7)) for the exercise of the Assembly's functions in that field, except the exercise of functions by the executive committee (or by the Assembly itself).

(6) The Assembly First Secretary is accountable to the Assembly (in accordance with standing orders under subsection (7)) for the exercise of functions by the executive committee.

(7) The standing orders must include provision for allowing Assembly members to question (orally or in writing, as Assembly members prefer)—

(a) each member of the executive committee about the exercise of the Assembly's functions in the field or fields in which he is accountable, except the exercise of functions by the executive committee (or by the Assembly itself), and

(b) the Assembly First Secretary about the exercise of functions by the executive committee.

(8) In this section—

(a) references to the exercise of functions by the executive committee include the exercise of functions by a sub-committee of that committee or by members of the Assembly's staff in pursuance of a delegation to the Assembly's staff by either that committee or such a sub-committee, and

(b) references to the exercise of functions by the Assembly itself include the exercise of functions by members of the Assembly's staff in pursuance of a delegation to the Assembly's staff by the Assembly itself.'.

Amendment (a) to the proposed clause, in line 4, after 'known', insert

'as the Assembly Cabinet or'.

Amendment (c) to the proposed clause, in line 7, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (d) to the proposed clause, in line 10, leave out from '(4)' to end of line 13 and insert—

'The Assembly First Secretary shall make an allocation under subsection (3) to every Assembly Secretary except that no such allocation shall be made to the Financial Secretary or the Business Manager.'.

Amendment (e) to the proposed clause, in line 11, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (f) to the proposed clause, in line 15, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (g) to the proposed clause, in line 16, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (h) to the proposed clause, in line 18, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (i) to the proposed clause, in line 22, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (j) to the proposed clause, in line 25, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (k) to the proposed clause, in line 27, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (l) to the proposed clause, in line 29, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Amendment (m) to the proposed clause, in line 32, leave out 'executive committee' and insert 'Assembly Cabinet'.

Government new clause 22—Subject committees—

'.—(1) The Assembly shall establish committees with responsibilities in the fields in which the Assembly has functions.

(2) The committees established under this section shall be known by such titles as the standing orders may provide (but are referred to in this Act as subject committees).

(3) There shall be the same number of—

(a) subject committees, and

(b) members of the executive committee to whom the Assembly First Secretary allocates accountability in any of the fields in which the Assembly has functions.

(4) The division between the subject committees of the fields in which those committees have responsibilities and the division between members of the executive committee of the fields in which accountability is allocated to members of that committee shall be the same; and the member of the executive committee who has accountability in the field or fields in which a subject committee has responsibilities shall be a member of that subject committee.

(5) The Assembly shall elect a number of Assembly members to be a panel from which the members who are to chair the subject committees are to be selected; and the members of the panel shall be elected so as to secure that, as far as is practicable, the balance of the parties in the Assembly is reflected in the membership of the panel.

(6) The number of members of the panel at any time shall be equal to the number of subject committees at that time; and each member of the panel shall be selected to chair one (but not more than one) subject committee.

(7) A subject committee shall have such number of members (in addition to the person who is a member of the committee by virtue of subsection (4) and the member who chairs it) as the standing orders may provide.

(8) Those other members shall be elected by the Assembly from among the Assembly members so as to secure that, as far as is practicable, the balance of the parties in the Assembly is reflected in the membership of the committee (including the person who is a member by virtue of subsection (4) and the member who chairs it).'.

Amendment (a) to the proposed clause, in line 3, after 'known', insert 'as Select Committees or'.

Amendment (c) to the proposed clause, in line 7, leave out 'subject' and insert 'select'.

Amendment (d) to the proposed clause, in line 11, leave out 'subject' and insert 'select'.

Amendment (e) to the proposed clause, in line 15, leave out 'subject' and insert 'select'.

Amendment (f) to the proposed clause, in line 16, leave out 'subject' and insert 'select'.

Amendment (g) to the proposed clause, in line 18, leave out 'subject' and insert 'select'.

Amendment (h) to the proposed clause, in line 22, leave out 'subject' and insert 'select'.

Amendment (i) to the proposed clause, in line 23, leave out 'subject' and insert 'select'.

Amendment (j) to the proposed clause, in line 24, leave out 'subject' and insert 'select'.

Government new clause 23—Delegation of functions—

'.—(1) The Assembly may delegate functions of the Assembly (to such extent as the Assembly may determine) to—

(a) any committee of the Assembly, or

(b) the Assembly First Secretary.

(2) Any committee of the Assembly, apart from the Audit Committee, may delegate functions of the committee (to such extent as the committee may determine) to a sub-committee of the committee.

(3) In addition—

(a) the executive committee may delegate functions of the executive committee (to such extent as the executive committee may determine) to the Assembly First Secretary or an Assembly Secretary, and

(b) a subject committee may delegate functions of the subject committee (to such extent as the subject committee may determine) to the member of the executive committee who is a member of the subject committee by virtue of section (Subject committees)(4).

(4) A sub-committee of the executive committee may delegate functions of the sub-committee (to such extent as the sub-committee may determine) to the Assembly First Secretary or an Assembly Secretary; and a sub-committee of a subject committee may delegate functions of the sub-committee (to such extent as the sub-committee may determine) to the member of the executive committee who is a member of the subject committee by virtue of section (Subject committees)(4).

(5) The Assembly First Secretary may delegate functions of his (to such extent as he may determine) to an Assembly Secretary.

(6) In delegating a function under any provision of this section the Assembly, a committee of the Assembly or a sub-committee of such a committee may limit or prohibit its further delegation under this section or section (Exercise of functions by Assembly staff) (or both).

(7) Where a function has been delegated to the Assembly, this section applies to the function subject to the terms of the delegation to the Assembly.

(8) The delegation of a function under this section shall not prevent the exercise of the function by the body or person by whom the delegation is made.'.

Government new clause 24—Exercise of functions by Assembly staff—

'.—(1) Each of the following—

(a) the Assembly,

(b) any committee of the Assembly, apart from the Audit Committee,

(c) any sub-committee of a committee of the Assembly,

(d) the Assembly First Secretary, and

(e) any Assembly Secretary,

may delegate functions to the Assembly's staff.

(2) Where a function is delegated to the Assembly's staff it is for the Permanent Secretary to the Assembly to make arrangements as to which member or members of the Assembly's staff is or are to exercise the function; and in this subsection "the Permanent Secretary to the Assembly" means the person appointed in accordance with section 35(1) and (3) to be the head of the Assembly's staff (whether or not that person is known by the title of Permanent Secretary to the Assembly).

(3) Where a function has been delegated to the Assembly, this section applies to the function subject to the terms of the delegation to the Assembly.

(4) The delegation of a function under this section shall not prevent the exercise of the function by the body or person by whom the delegation is made.'.

Amendment (a) to the proposed clause, in line 7, after 'may' insert 'not'.

Amendment (b) to the proposed clause, in line 7, at end insert 'other than administrative duties.'.

Amendment (c) to the proposed clause, in line 8, leave out 'function' and insert 'duty under subsection (1)'.

Amendment (d) to the proposed clause, in line 10, leave out 'function' and insert 'duty'.

Amendment (e) to the proposed clause, in line 14, leave out 'function' and insert 'duty under subsection (1)'.

Amendment (f) to the proposed clause, in line 15, leave out 'function' and insert 'duty'.

Amendment (g) to the proposed clause, in line 16, leave out 'function' and insert 'duty under subsection (1)'.

Amendment (h) to the proposed clause, in line 17, leave out 'function' and insert 'duty'.

Government new clause 25—Categories of staff—

'.—(1) There shall be three categories among the staff of the Assembly.

(2) The categories shall be—

(a) staff who assist members of the Assembly of all registered political parties in performing their functions in the Assembly and its committees, who shall be known as the parliamentary staff,

(b) staff who assist members of the Assembly of one registered political party only, who shall be known as the political staff, and

(c) staff who perform executive functions on behalf of the Assembly or its committees, who shall be known as the executive staff.

(3) The Assembly shall make provision in respect of—

(a) the numbers of staff in each category,

(b) the transfer of staff from one category to another, and

(c) the designation of functions referred to in subsection (2).

(4) Nothing in this section shall prevent executive staff from providing services for other categories of staff where it appears appropriate to the Assembly First Secretary and the presiding officer of the Assembly.'.

New clause 29—Codes of practice—

'The Minister for the Civil Service shall consult the Assembly on any codes of practice or procedure relating to or applicable to staff appointed by the Assembly who serve in Her Majesty's Home Civil Service.'.

New clause 32—Assembly corporate body—

'—(1) There shall be a body corporate to be known as "The Welsh Assembly Corporate Body" (referred to in this Act as the corporation) to perform the statutory functions conferred on the corporation and any functions conferred on the corporation by resolution of the Parliament.

(2) The members of the corporation shall be—

(a) the Presiding Officer; and

(b) four members of the Assembly appointed in accordance with standing orders.

(3) The corporation shall provide the Assembly or ensure that the Assembly is provided, with the property, staff and services required for the Assembly's purposes.

(4) The Assembly may give special or general directions to the corporation for the purpose of or in connection with the exercise of the corporation's functions.

(5) Proceedings by or against the Assembly shall be instituted by or (as the case may be) against the corporation on behalf of the Assembly.

(6) Any property or liabilities acquired or incurred in relation to matters within the general responsibility of the corporation to which (apart from this subsection) the Assembly would be entitled or subject shall be treated for all purposes as property or (as the case may be) liabilities of the corporation.

(7) Any expenses of the corporation shall be payable out of the Consolidated Fund.

(8) Any sums received by the corporation shall be paid into that Fund.

(9) Schedule (Welsh Assembly Corporate Body) (which makes further provision about the corporation) shall have effect.'.

New clause 33—Clerk of the Assembly—

'.—(1) There shall be a Clerk of the Assembly.

(2) The Clerk shall be appointed by the Assembly Corporate Body (established under section (Assembly Corporate Body).

(3) The Clerk's functions may be exercised by any Assistant Clerk if the office of Clerk is vacant or the Clerk is for any reason unable to act.

(4) The Clerk may authorise any Assistant Clerk or other member of the staff of the Parliament to exercise functions on his behalf.'.

Amendment No. 250, in clause 1, page 1, leave out line 11.

Government amendments Nos. 122 and 123.

Amendment No. 231, in clause 35, page 21, line 20, after

'(2), insert—

'Subject to paragraphs (2A) and (2B) below,'.

Amendment No. 232, in page 21, line 21, at end insert—

'(2A) The Assembly may appoint staff to be called Officers of the Assembly who shall be not more than ten in number and who shall not be in the service of Her Majesty's Home Civil Service.

(2B) Officers of the Assembly shall be paid out of monies received by the Assembly from the Secretary of State.'.

Government amendment No. 83.

Amendment No. 233, in page 21, line 34, after 'staff', insert

'but not including officers of the Assembly.'.

Government amendments Nos. 124 to 130, 164, 131 to 136, 139, 88, 141, 150 to 152, 142 and 143.

Amendment No. 198, in clause 149, page 69, line 38, at end insert

'"executive committee" means the Assembly Cabinet,'.

Amendment No. 199, in page 69, line 40, leave out ', and' and insert

'"subject committee" means a Select Committee of the Assembly, and'.

Government amendments Nos. 144 to 149.

New schedule 1—ASSEMBLY CORPORATE BODY—

Membership

1. A person appointed under section (Assembly Corporate Body) (2)(b) shall hold office until another member of the Assembly is appointed in his place, unless he previously resigns or ceases to be a member of the Assembly otherwise than by virtue of a dissolution.

Property

2.—(1) The corporation may hold property.

(2) Subordinate legislation may provide—

(a) for the transfer to the corporation of any property to which this sub–paragraph applies, or

(b) for the corporation to have such rights or interests in relation to any property to which this sub–paragraph applies as the person making the legislation considers appropriate (whether in connection with a transfer or otherwise).

(3) Sub–paragraph (2) applies to any property belonging to a Minister of the Crown which appears to the person making the subordinate legislation to be property which is or may be required wholly or partly for the purposes of the corporation's functions.

(4) Subordinate legislation under sub–paragraph (2) in relation to any property may provide for the transfer to the corporation of any liabilities relating to the property to which a Minister of the Crown is subject and which subsist immediately before the subordinate legislation comes into force.

Staff

3.—(1) The corporation shall appoint assistant clerks and may appoint other staff.

(2) The Clerk and other persons appointed by the corporation are referred to in this Act as the parliamentary staff of the Assembly.

(3) It is for the corporation to determine the terms and conditions of appointment of the parliamentary staff of the Assembly, including arrangements for the payment of pensions, gratuities or allowances to, or in respect of, any person who has ceased to be a member of the staff.

(4) Accordingly the corporation may—

(a) make contributions or payments towards provision for such pensions, gratuities or allowances,

(b) establish and administer one or more pension schemes.

Powers

4.—(1) Subject to sub–paragraph (3), the corporation may do anything which appears to it to be necessary or expedient for the purpose of or in connection with the discharge of its functions.

(2) That includes, in particular—

(a) entering into contracts,

(b) investing sums not immediately required in relation to the discharge of its functions, and

(c) accepting gifts.

(3) The corporation may borrow sums in sterling by way of overdraft or otherwise for the purpose of meeting a temporary excess of expenditure over sums otherwise available to meet that expenditure.

(4) The corporation may borrow money only under sub–paragraph (3) and may borrow under that sub–paragraph only in accordance with the special or general approval of the Assembly.

Delegation

5. The corporation may delegate any of its functions to the Presiding Officer or the Clerk.

Proceedings and business

6.—(1) The validity of any proceedings of the corporation shall not be affected by any vacancy among the members, or by any defect in the appointment, or qualification for membership, of any member.

(2) The corporation may determine its own procedure.

(3) The Presiding Officer shall preside at meetings of the corporation, but the corporation may appoint another of its members to preside if the office of Presiding Officer is vacant or the Presiding Officer is for any reason unable to act.

Crown status

7.—(1) Her Majesty may by Order in Council provide for the corporation to be treated to any extent as a Crown body for the purposes of any enactment.

(2) In particular, the Order may for the purposes of any enactment provide—

(a) for employment under the corporation to be treated as employment under the corporation as a Crown body,

(b) for land held, used or managed by the corporation, or operations carried out by or on behalf of the corporation, to be treated (as the case may be) as land held, used or managed, or operations carried out by or on behalf of, the corporation as a Crown body.

(3) For the purpose of this paragraph, "Crown body" means a body which is the servant or agent of the Crown, and includes a government department.

Mr. Davies: If accepted, the new clauses would replace clauses 52, 55, 56, 57 and 58. I know that the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) is concerned about the Opposition's ability to scrutinise the whole Bill in the absence of precise details on the Bill on registration of political parties. Perhaps it would assist him if I told him that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has invited him and the shadow Home Secretary to discuss the Bill.

I can confirm the assurances given in Committee, that we accept the validity of some of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments. I share his concerns, and I certainly want to make sure that the registration Bill, when it is eventually introduced, takes account of the points he has raised.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the Secretary of State, and I hear what he says, but the process in the House is not between the two Front Benches: it is for all hon. Members to take part in debates on legislation. When crucial areas require detail—of the kind to which I have alluded and that he has acknowledged—and that detail is not available, that is a serious matter for the whole House. That is what I am asking him to cure.

Mr. Davies: The flaw in the right hon. Gentleman's argument lies in the fact that the House accepted the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, which contains a reference to registration, and Conservative Members did not raise the question of the registration of political parties Bill at that time.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): We did.

Mr. Davies: In which case, the House has accepted the precedent that we can proceed to deal with such matters without the registration Bill before us.

Mr. Jenkin rose—

Mr. Davies: I will not give way, because I suspect that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would rule me out of order if I did not proceed to deal with the amendments.

Mr. Jenkin rose—

Mr. Davies: If the hon. Gentleman can ensure that any intervention is in order, of course I will give way.

Mr. Jenkin: I am sure that it is in order, because otherwise you would soon rule it out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Under this Bill, and in the Scotland Bill, people will cast two votes. Under the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, they will cast only one, so the double-ticket voting does not apply, and that is where the problem with registration is especially germane to this Bill and to the Scotland Bill in a way in which it is not so germane to the European Parliamentary Elections Bill.

That is why it is inadequate to proceed on the basis on which the Secretary of State has forced us to proceed by the sheer numbers—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not necessarily germane to the amendments now under discussion.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have listened in bewilderment for the past 10 minutes. In the light of what has happened, could you possibly raise with Madam Speaker exactly what the position of the rest of us is in all this? The House as a whole has some rights in these matters.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows—I do not want to repeat myself too much—that the procedures that have been employed for the consideration of this and other Bills have been on the basis of recommendations from the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons. Those recommendations have been accepted in terms of the composition of the Business Committee.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

I am well aware, as is Madam Speaker, of the concern that all Back-Bench and party interests should be represented. The hon. Gentleman would be well advised to make representations to the Modernisation Committee if he feels that the procedures that it has recommended so far are defective in the sense he suggests.

Mr. Davies: The purpose of the amendments is to enable the assembly more easily to establish a Cabinet-style process of decision making. They come forward, as the right hon. Gentleman will recall, in response to arguments advanced by Opposition Members, including the right hon. Member for Devizes and the leaders of other Opposition parties, and in the light of advice from my national assembly advisory group.

The House will understand from the motion before us that we have some three hours available to discuss these relatively non-controversial amendments. The Government have generously provided another two hours injury time this evening because we have had a statement. So we are debating non-controversial amendments tabled to comply with the legitimate request from the Opposition. We provided three hours to discuss them and a further two hours of injury-time debate from 10 pm to midnight this evening.

Therefore, I hardly think that the right hon. Member for Devizes—[Interruption.] He is waving two fingers at me. I think that he is suggesting that we had two statements, but it is now slightly after 5 o'clock. The debate was due to start at 3.30 pm. The debate on the guillotine continued for something approaching half an hour. The right hon. Gentleman must accept that the Government have been more than generous.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): I—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are straying again into more general matters related to the procedure for dealing with the Bill. We should be using the time available to deal strictly with this group of amendments. I take it that the Secretary of State had given way to the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor).

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the important change in the structure to a Cabinet-type structure have implications for the only amendments that I and my colleagues have tabled? They relate to the Official Secrets Act 1911 in clause 79.

Mr. Ron Davies: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's concerns. I do not wish to pre-empt the later debate, but I have listened carefully to the case that he and other hon. Members have made on the provisions contained in the Bill relating to the Official Secrets Act. The Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) will have some news that the right hon. Gentleman will find welcome when we come to the matter. We have listened carefully to what has been said.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davies: I am anxious to proceed with the amendments rather than to have an extended debate at this point on the Official Secrets Act. On the understanding that my hon. Friend will use all his ingenuity to ensure that his intervention is in order, I of course give way to him.

Dr. Marek: I do not have to use any ingenuity, because my intervention is precisely on the amendments. As there will be Cabinet government for the national assembly, and every servant of the assembly will be a member of Her Majesty's home civil service, there is now a need for the assembly to appoint staff who are independent and owe their loyalty to the assembly rather than to the Government, as the Clerks of the House and the Comptroller and Auditor General owe to this House. Amendments Nos. 231, 232 and 233 would make that possible, and there is a case for considering them carefully.

Mr. Davies: As my hon. Friend says, such amendments have been tabled, and I understand that they have been selected. No doubt he will want to speak to them later. It would be inappropriate for me to address those amendments now.

My hon. Friend has suggested that we are about to prescribe a Cabinet-style system for the assembly. We are not. We are making it easier for the assembly to have Cabinet-style government if that is what it wants. It is my expectation that the assembly will establish a Cabinet-style system from the outset.

Sir Raymond Powell (Ogmore): As this is an important step to take, can my right hon. Friend tell me why the matter was not referred to in the paper that we published before the referendum, and why it was not discussed in the debate on the referendum? It is an important issue.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend is right. It is an important matter. It was debated extensively in the referendum campaign, and reference was made to it in the White Paper. My hon. Friend will recall having discussed the matter before the general election and subsequently.

We discussed at what point on the continuum between the local government committee system and the more centralised Cabinet system the assembly should be located. It has always been the case that there is a judgment to be made as to where on that continuum the assembly should operate. We are now facilitating the opportunity for the assembly, if it so wishes, to ensure that its internal architecture is placed somewhere along the continuum closer to the Cabinet style than the local government committee style. That is what we debated at great length. It is something that my national assembly advisory group considered and recommended to me, and which was put to me by representatives of all political parties in the House. We have debated it, and I am genuinely trying to reflect the consensus that has developed around it.

I deal first with new clause 23. The assembly's functions will generally be exercisable by those to whom it delegates those functions. New clause 23 sets out the possible delegations—to Committees, which can include the Executive Committee, or to the First Secretary, and then to the Assembly Secretaries. The pattern of delegation of functions will determine the assembly's decision-making style. If functions were predominantly to be delegated to subject Committees, a local government style of decision making would operate. However, if functions are predominantly delegated to the First Secretary and to the Executive Committee, something more akin to the Cabinet style will emerge.

As I said, my advisory committee has recommended a Cabinet style of decision making. I have accepted that advice, and the guidance that I shall give to the Standing Orders Commissioners will reflect that. The assembly's initial Standing Orders will incorporate a substantial delegation of functions to the Executive Committee and to the First Secretary. The assembly will therefore begin life with a delegation of functions consistent with a Cabinet model of operation. It would, however, be open to the assembly subsequently, if it wished, to change those Standing Orders and instead delegate functions to subject Committees, but that would be possible only with a two-thirds vote in favour of such a move.

New clauses 20 and 21 make new provision for the Executive Committee. The First Secretary is to appoint Assembly Secretaries, subject to a limit on numbers, to be prescribed in Standing Orders. I will seek advice from the advisory group on the maximum number of appointees, and I will listen to the comments that the right hon. Member for Devizes will doubtless make later this evening when he moves an amendment relating to the maximum number of Assembly Secretaries.

The Assembly Secretaries will be members of the Executive Committee, and the First Secretary will allocate portfolios among them, although not necessarily to all. There is provision for a limited number of non-portfolio Assembly Secretaries. Individual Assembly Secretaries will account to the assembly for their performance of functions which the assembly has delegated. New clause 21 makes provision for the questioning of Assembly Secretaries for that purpose.

The combination of an extensive delegation of functions to the Executive Committee and the First Secretary, and the appointment by the First Secretary of Assembly Secretaries and the allocation of portfolios among them, provide for the creation of a strong political centre for the assembly and meet the case made by Opposition parties.

Individuals will be clearly responsible and accountable for the assembly's decisions in particular areas of its work. That reflects the points made in the House, and by my advisory group, for a process of Executive decision making. This has been the subject of intense debate in Wales, and certainly the subject of strong representations to me and my colleagues in the Welsh Office by, among others, the CBI in Wales.

I have always made it clear that the Government's wish is to draw the best from both the Cabinet and local government models. The local government system allows for wide participation in the policy process. That is reflected in new clause 22, which makes new provision for subject Committees.

Under new clause 22, each Assembly Secretary with functional responsibilities will be a member of a subject Committee with responsibilities in the same area. The role of the all-party subject Committees will extend well beyond that of scrutiny of the Executive on the Westminster model. Thus, they could examine draft subordinate legislation, review policy outcomes and propose policy initiatives, monitor the performance of public bodies in their spheres, and make recommendations feeding into the assembly's resource allocation process.

The Committees will work in partnership with the Assembly Secretaries, and will have a distinctive and important role to play in the assembly's policy process.

Mr. Dalyell: On the subject of resource allocations, in the Scottish context it is becoming clearer week by week that the proposals are vastly more expensive than anyone had imagined. What are the estimated costs of the changes in Wales? Are they all to be borne by the Welsh allocation, or do they come out of the UK allocation?

Mr. Davies: If my hon. Friend studies the Bill, he will see that the financial memorandum, which was discussed on Second Reading, makes clear the Government's estimates. On his substantive point, I confirm that any costs incurred as a result of the running of the assembly will, of course, be met out of the existing Welsh block.

I was talking about the role of the Committees in the assembly's policy process. It is a role that I believe can be achieved effectively only if, as we have provided, the Assembly Secretaries are members of the Committees and are actively involved with their work, rather than being external to them as in the classic Scrutiny Committee manner, which we see in the Select Committees in this place.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): My question follows on from that asked by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Is it correct that the change to the Cabinet-style structure should not mean expenditure additional to that proposed in the first Bill?

Mr. Davies: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman is suggesting. Does he have a more precise question as to where he thinks additional expenditure could arise? If so, I shall try to answer him.

Mr. Evans: It is a quite clear question, as the Prime Minister might say. Will the new structure be more expensive than the first structure that the Secretary of State announced? Is it a more expensive system of local government for Wales?

5.15 pm

Mr. Davies: I know that the hon. Gentleman has difficulty with some of the concepts involved, but it is not a local government system. We are proposing a new form of arrangement in Wales, which is based on the principle of devolution. If the hon. Gentleman considers carefully the case that he has submitted to me, and which I have broadly accepted, he will understand that there is nothing inherent in the proposals that could possibly affect the costs of the assembly. I have repeatedly said that the costs of running the assembly will be met out of the Welsh block.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): My understanding is that we are discussing a strategic set of amendments and new clauses which will shape how the assembly runs. Does the Secretary of State agree that moving from the original proposals to the current ones involves what will ultimately be only marginal changes in costs?

[Mr. Lembit Öpik]

Mr. Davies: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right. The essence of the decision we had to take—a debate in which all parties involved themselves—was whether, in constructing the assembly, to opt for a form of decision making that was as inclusive as possible, or whether to put a premium on a decision-making process which was accountable and capable of making rapid decisions.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) rose—

Mr. Davies: I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman could contain his enthusiasm. I am trying to deal with an intervention by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). Once I have done so, I shall certainly try to accommodate the hon. Gentleman.

One has to decide whether to construct an assembly that is as inclusive as possible and which seeks to produce a consensus, or whether to come up with something that is less than transparent. It is my understanding, based on the strong recommendations made to me by all political parties in Wales, that the assembly should have the capacity—I stress the word "capacity"; we are not prescribing or mandating it—to go for a Cabinet style, which would ensure the accountability of individual decision makers, and that it should have the capacity to make rapid decisions.

Mr. Grieve: The right hon. Gentleman must understand the thrust of the various questions, as they are perfectly straightforward. Clearly the costs will be met from the block grant, but I take it from what the Secretary of State has said that no one in the Welsh Office has suggested to him or his colleagues that the new system that is being devised will in reality be rather more expensive and take more money out of the block grant than the old. Is that so? It is the only question to which an answer is being sought, but I am bound to say that the Secretary of State did not provide one. Has anyone costed the new system?

Mr. Davies: I have already given the answer in reply to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), although I acknowledge that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) has asked a rather more explicit question. I said that there was nothing inherent in the proposals that would lead to an increased cost.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: Yes—I suspect that I shall not be moving on for some time yet.

Mr. Wigley: I agree. My question relates not to the matter of cost, but to the relationship between the Assembly Secretary and the Committee itself. Given that a form of Cabinet system is being set up, am I right in interpreting that to mean that the Assembly Secretary would not be bound by a decision of the Committee; that he would be a member of the Committee and, if the Committee voted in a way that overruled his policy, that vote would not change his policy; and that only if the assembly as a whole changed the policy of the Executive as a whole would the Executive have to change their policy? Is that interpretation correct?

Mr. Davies: I understand the reason why the right hon. Gentleman raises that question; unfortunately, I cannot give him a precise answer, because it will depend in part on the Standing Orders eventually adopted by the assembly, which will in part reflect the way in practice develops in the assembly, which practice will be influenced by the existence or absence of political control within the assembly. Let us assume that one party has overall control of the assembly, although that might not be a prospect that the right hon. Gentleman views with great relish—

Mr. Wigley: Oh, but I do.

Mr. Davies: The right hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to learn that I am perfectly relaxed about that prospect, too, although we might differ on which party that should be.

Let us assume for the purpose of argument that the assembly has one-party majority control. In those circumstances, one can reasonably assume that the subject Committees themselves would have one-party majority control, and that therefore there would be a majority on the Committee that was broadly supportive of the Assembly Secretary. If that was the case, or if there was a coalition, or in any other circumstances, the Assembly Secretary would have to carry the subject Committee with him or her.

If he or she failed to do so on a matter of—[Interruption.] I am addressing the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), and I hope that the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) will have some regard for that. If the subject Committee found itself in conflict on a matter of principle with the Assembly Secretary who was a member of that Committee, there would a situation which presumably the First Secretary or the assembly itself would want to address, either by changing policy or by changing the Assembly Secretary. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) has joined the proceedings, and I am sure that we are pleased to see him, but we are not doing anything other in the Chamber than debating the Government of Wales Bill.

Mr. Davies: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps I can now get back to the point that I was making some time ago, which is the way in which the Assembly Secretaries will sit on subject Committees.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I am sorry to detain the Secretary of State longer, but I want to follow up the line of questioning raised by the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). Will the Secretary of State carry his clarification just one step further?

If the subject Committee in question had already delegated functions to the Assembly Secretary, even if the Assembly Secretary was sitting on the subject Committee, and the subject Committee came to a conclusion contrary to the policy established under that delegated authority by the Assembly Secretary, presumably that decision would be matter of academic interest only. Is that correct?

Mr. Davies: Yes, it is certainly a matter of academic interest.

What we are doing is providing for a strong political centre to emerge in the assembly. We are also making effective provision for all parties in the assembly to make their own distinctive contributions to its work through the subject Committees.

Finally, I refer to new clause 24. It was explained during Committee stage that we needed to make specific provision in the Bill for delegation of functions to staff, as it was not clear that the Carltona principle would apply in the context of the Assembly. New clause 24 simply makes it clear that any such delegation to staff will operate in accordance with the established principle that it is for the permanent secretary of the Department to manage departmental staff, and that he or she will decide which of the staff are actually to discharge any functions so delegated. New clause 24 therefore provides a worthwhile reinforcement of the position of assembly staff as civil servants, free from political interference.

New clauses 20 to 24 are important amendments that will have a major and beneficial effect on the business style of the Assembly and I commend them to the House.

Mr. Ancram: May I start, perhaps rather surprisingly in view of my earlier remarks, by welcoming the new clauses tabled by the Secretary of State? I do so because they are an attempt to meet some of the concerns expressed by Opposition Members earlier in the debate. I call them an attempt, because I am not yet certain that he has delivered what we were asking for.

Some of us tabled amendments earlier to create a Cabinet structure, because we believe that a Cabinet structure creates a clear line of accountability in a way that is not possible under a Committee structure. We believe also that it gives the electorate a clearer view of what they are actually electing than is possible under a Committee structure.

To summarise our arguments, we believe also that a Committee structure is more prone to being run by officials than is a Cabinet structure. When we heard last week that the Secretary of State was tabling new clauses in order to achieve a Cabinet structure, we welcomed that. I did so publicly and I do so again today, but only in so far as the right hon. Gentleman has gone.

I am little concerned that one of the concerns I expressed in an earlier debate has not been met. When we last debated this issue, I said:

"I am surprised that the Government seem to have set about creating what I can only describe as a constitutional mule—it is neither one thing nor the other, neither local government nor the type of cabinet structure to which we are accustomed."—[Official Report, 2 February 1998; Vol. 305, c. 750.]

The Secretary of State appears to have achieved the removal of that total ambiguity, but he has created two choices, so that we are still not certain whether what we end up with will be a Cabinet structure, or one based on the Committee structure that was originally in the Bill.

The right hon. Gentleman said that the amendments do not prescribe, but allow the assembly to decide. He went on to say, which I found even more puzzling, that it would not be a question of a clear decision being taken on whether there would be either a Cabinet structure or a Committee structure, but that it would depend on the decisions of the assembly as to whether there would be predominantly a Cabinet structure or predominantly a Committee structure.

Only after those various decisions on what functions to delegate in which directions had been taken would we be able to say, "That is a Cabinet structure," or, "That is a Committee structure." We are certainly not able to say at this distance, in the words of the former President Bush, that, if it quacks like a duck and walks like a duck, it is likely to be a duck. In this case, it is going to be allowed to quack and bark at the same time, so we will not know whether the structure is a duck or a dog until the assembly has taken those decisions.

Mr. Ron Davies: If it quacks and barks, it will obviously be the product of a Ministry of Agriculture experimental farm.

The answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question is that the Standing Orders under which the assembly will meet initially will prescribe a Cabinet system; however, it will subsequently be open to the assembly, if the two-thirds majority requirement is met, to change its method of operation. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that is not unreasonable to allow the assembly to review and modernise its own internal procedures.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful for that explanation, but it is precisely because the provision appears to be the product of an experimental farm that I am questioning it a little more closely. I am not sure that the product of an experimental farm is what the right hon. Gentleman intended in terms of devolution for Wales.

Perhaps the Secretary of State can enlighten me, or tell me whether I am wrong, but my understanding of new clause 23 is that it allows the assembly to delegate functions in a number of different directions, and it is on the basis of how those functions are delegated and in terms of the primary legislation allowing the assembly to so delegate, not on the basis of the Standing Orders by means of which they may be delegated, that the decision will be taken whether there will be a Cabinet structure or a Committee structure.

That appears to be what new clause 23 provides, so it leaves the whole question still to be resolved. What is does not do is create the clear position that we sought of a Cabinet structure of the sort that we find, for example, within the Scotland Bill.

It is worth reminding the House that "The Blackwell Encyclopaedia of Political Science" defines a Cabinet as "A form of government in which a group of ministers, usually drawn from the majority party or parties of a parliament, combine to make collective decisions about the country's Policies . . . Two points are central to the concept. First, the decisions of a cabinet are meant to be collective, not those of a single person; ministers are bound by the doctrine of collective responsibility publicly to support all the decisions taken by cabinet. Second, the cabinet acts as a political link between the executive and the parliament because ministers are answerable to the parliament."

If I read that right, one either has a Cabinet structure or one does not. One cannot have a series of functions being moved in different directions, which do not clearly meet those two points which are described as being central, and say, "On the balance of probabilities, this is a Cabinet." However, that seems to be what new clause 23 would achieve. I should like to hear the Minister's response on the ambiguity and doubt that could be created.

[Mr. Ancram]

Mr. Dalyell: Will the right hon. Gentleman clear up some of his own ambiguity and doubt? When he made these proposals to the Government, did he have any clear idea, for example, to whom the civil servants would be responsible? Are they to be responsible to the Welsh Cabinet structure, or to the home civil service? What was his view on that?

5.30 pm

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman knows that we asked that question in connection with the structure of the Scottish Parliament. It does not arise from new clause 23, however. We are now considering whether the civil service in Wales will be responsible to the assembly as a whole, as was the case under the original legislation, or whether it will now be responsible to a Cabinet.

In fact, that makes may point rather well, because, if I read new clause 23 aright, we may end up with it being responsible for some functions to the assembly as a whole, and for other functions to members of what would be, effectively, a Cabinet. That lack of clarity, which the hon. Gentleman rightly points out is inherent anyway in the Bill, is exacerbated by the new clause. I wish to hear a response from the Secretary of State on that.

Mr. Ron Davies: The right hon. Gentleman knows that there is no lack of clarity there. The assembly is a corporate body, and the functions that will be transferred will be transferred to it as a corporate body. It is then for the assembly to decide how it wishes those functions to be exercised.

Mr. Ancram: Intentionally or not, the right hon. Gentleman is again missing my point. I am saying that, if the assembly follows the route of new clause 23, and of what I understood him to say in his speech, it will not be a question of deciding whether there is a Cabinet; it will be a question of giving some functions to the Executive Committee, which would be along the lines of a Cabinet, and giving others to the subject Committees of the assembly, forming a Committee structure.

I say in all seriousness to the Secretary of State that that could be the undoing of the way the assembly works in future unless there is some more clarity on it.

Mr. Davies: I have made it clear to the right hon. Gentleman several times that I intend that the Standing Orders under the which the assembly meets for the first time will provide for a Cabinet system. It will be open, however, to the assembly, if it subsequently wishes, to revert to a different system. Nevertheless, I intend that, when the assembly meets for the first time, it will meet with a Cabinet system; that will be provided for in the standing orders.

Mr. Ancram: In that case, I ask the right hon. Gentleman another question. In new clause 23, which will be part of primary legislation, not the Standing Orders, does that mean that new clause 23(1)(a), which says:

"The Assembly may delegate functions of the Assembly . . . to any committee of the Assembly", will be operable only if the Standing Orders have been changed by a two-thirds majority at that time? Is he saying that that provision, which will be in primary legislation, is already qualified and pre-empted by non-primary legislative decisions that he will have taken in relation to the original standing orders? That places a very serious question mark over the meaning of the new clause. Either it is there to provide powers, or it is not.

Mr. Davies: New clause 23 is perfectly clear, and new clause subsection (1)(a) provides for the assembly to delegate its functions to any Committee of the assembly if it so wishes. That provision will be allowed for in the Standing Orders.

Mr. Ancram: In that case, this argument goes round and round. My original suggestion that we might have a bit of this and a bit of that and not know whether it was a duck or a dog is likely to come true. I say to the right hon. Gentleman in all seriousness, because I believe he is moving in the right direction, that he has left things dangerously open. I am afraid that it creates another area of uncertainty.

I do not want to be unduly unkind to him, but we are becoming used to the non-decisions of this Secretary of State. Will it be Swansea or Cardiff? Will it be Pier head or Bute square? Will it be a Cabinet or a Committee? We do not know. If the people of Wales are to have confidence in the devolution proposals, they should have a clearer idea of the answers to all those questions.

Mr. Öpik: Will the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that his anxieties would seem groundless if we were discussing the setting up of a new business? The more progressive management consultants would adopt the approach that the Government are taking, and allow the organisation to define its reporting structures. The Conservatives are advocating adherence to much more traditional, more rigid systems of government, more associated with old Westminster than with new Cardiff.

Mr. Ancram: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman can relieve us both of our concerns, because I understand that, if the assembly is to operate as a business in this regard, it will first need a two-thirds majority to overcome the Standing Orders that he has said will direct it in a particular—what the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) would call "old-fashioned"—way. We need to know the answers to those questions. That is one reason—I shall not trespass on this, Mr. Deputy Speaker—why I was worried that we did not have enough time in which to discuss this group of amendments. These are not minor or straightforward—

Mr. Ron Davies: The right hon. Gentleman is going round and round.

Mr. Ancram: I am going round and round because the new clause is circular, and it will take us round and round in circles.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a further confusion, which illustrates this point, inherent in new clause 22, on the system of subject Committees? For the past two decades, Cabinet government in this House has been balanced by accountability to cross-party Select Committees, usually acting unanimously. The subject Committees can hardly operate in that way if the person whom they are scrutinising is sitting on that Committee, asking questions with them and scrutinising the same evidence as them. Is that not another example of a quacking dog?

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that example. He is absolutely right. He will notice that the amendments that we have tabled to new clause 22—amendments (a) to (j)—seek to meet that objection by renaming the subject Committees "Select Committees", so that they will operate as a Committee should operate under a Cabinet structure, like the Select Committees of the House. We are trying to bring clarity to what we consider to be a move in the right direction, which is not achieving what it set out to achieve.

Having made those points, on which I hope that we shall receive clarification from the Secretary of State because they are important, I shall briefly explain the amendments in the names of myself and my hon. Friends.

Our amendment (a) to new clause 20 would require the First Secretary to appoint one person as Financial Secretary and another as Business Manager. Our amendment (d) to new clause 21 would provide that neither be given responsibility for a specific field of policy. That is another constructive attempt to make more sense of the Cabinet structure, because we believe that, if a Cabinet is to work, there should be Ministers in the Cabinet who are not departmental Ministers but can look after the financial side. We know that a large sum of money—about £7 billion—is likely to be within the purview of the assembly. We believe that one Minister should be responsible for that.

We believe that there should be a Business Manager—a post along the lines of the Leader of the House—to ensure that business is properly pursued. That will make clear sense in the Cabinet structure, which is why we favour a Cabinet structure.

Amendment (b) to new clause 20 would prevent the First Secretary from appointing more than eight other Secretaries, including those two. The Secretary of State said that he looked forward to hearing me explain why we chose that number. There is no magic formula. There are 60 Members of the assembly. It seems to us that six departmental Ministers—a tenth of them—is generous.

Ministers currently on the Treasury Bench are carrying out all the functions that the six Secretaries plus the First Secretary will carry out. If the Secretary of State is in the place of the First Secretary at the moment, there are two hard-worked Ministers sitting next to him on the Front Bench whose work will now be undertaken by three Ministers each. That seems to be quite generous.

Although we know the skill and hard-working capabilities of the hon. Members for Neath (Mr. Hain) and for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), we believe that three other Welsh men or women should be able to undertake the work that they currently undertake. Therefore, it seems to us that the number six is about correct.

I have referred already to amendments (a) and (c) to (j) to Government new clause 22. They are designed genuinely to make sense of the Cabinet structure by having the Committees as Select Committees—

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): What happens to the rest of the Welsh Office structure upon the appointments that we are discussing? It is implicit in the Bill that there will be a Secretary of State. Will there be junior Ministers supporting the Secretary of State, as well as the structure within the assembly?

Mr. Ancram: It is my understanding that, unless they apply for P45s fairly soon, they will find themselves without work once the Bill has passed through Parliament. We are told that the Secretary of State will continue in office. We have not been told that personally; we await the end of what might be called the right hon. Gentleman's coy period, when he will tell us whether he will stand for the assembly or remain with us in the House.

I find it difficult to believe one story I read—that the right hon. Gentleman would try to do both things. That would make nonsense of devolution. The right hon. Gentleman would be bound by the collective responsibility of the Cabinet in Westminster, which he would have to apply to the collective responsibility of the assembly's Cabinet. I think that we would all agree that that would be constitutional nonsense.

I fear that the role of Secretary of State will be severely downgraded by the nature of devolution. We have discussed that previously, and I am sure that the issue will be raised again in another place when these matters are further discussed.

Amendments (a) and (c) to (m) to Government new clause 21, and amendment No. 198 to clause 149, are designed simply to rename the Executive Committee the assembly Cabinet. I believe in calling a duck a duck or a dog a dog. When the Secretary of State makes up his mind—that is, if he does so in the direction that I hope he will—the amendments will make total sense. I therefore hope that he will be prepared to accept them.

Dr. Marek: I shall make a quick intervention or, perhaps, a short speech. I did not intend to do so but earlier I asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the amendments that I have tabled on the responsibilities and loyalty of the civil service. I would not say that he brushed off my intervention, but he said that I could make my own points. I now propose to do so.

On those matters, I have considerable sympathy with the Opposition Front Bench. It would seem that they have not been thought through very carefully. For me, the problem is deciding where civil servants owe their loyalty. We know that civil servants, including permanent secretaries, meet all the time. They probably meet regularly once a week. The head of the National Assembly of Wales civil service will continue, I am sure, to meet heads of the civil service in the different Departments in Westminster. I am sure also that he or she will continue to do so once a week.

Furthermore, if there are problems within the civil service—I do not know the code in detail but there are procedures whereby problems are raised at a higher and higher level—at the end of the day, the person who carries the can is the secretary to the Cabinet, the head of the home civil service. That is the head of the Cabinet here for the Westminster Government, not for the assembly.

[Dr. Marek]

I happen to believe that, if a body has servants, those servants should owe loyalty to that body. Under a system of Committee government, that could have worked. The home civil service could have staffed the entire assembly. However, when we move to a Cabinet form of government, surely there must be servants whose primary duty is not to the Executive Committee or to the Westminster Government. There must be servants of the assembly whose loyalty is to non-executive members of that assembly, in much the same way as we have Clerks of Select Committees. We have also Clerks to the House of Commons. Until a few years ago, the Comptroller and Auditor General was a Government employee, but the previous Administration rightly changed the nature of that employment so that the Comptroller and Auditor General is paid for out of House of Commons voted money and owes his or her loyalty—in this instance, his—to the House.

I do not think that we can set up a system where a Back-Bench Member of the assembly will have no servants of that assembly to whom he or she can turn. It is an important issue, and I do not think that the Government have thought it through. There should be officers of the assembly and my amendments—no doubt they are imperfect, and there is no need for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to say that that is the position, if he comments upon those matters before the guillotine comes down at 7.30 pm—Nos. 231 to 233 illustrate the point. I hope that they will be taken up in another place if Members there see that there is merit in them.

Codes of practice are dealt with in new clause 29, which I tabled. It must be right that further consideration is given to codes of practice. Let us suppose that there is a difference of opinion between the national assembly and its Executive, the Executive Committee and the Cabinet in Westminster. How will that issue be resolved if the loyalty and codes of practice of civil servants—Her Majesty's home civil service—rest ultimately with the head of that civil service, who is Secretary to the Cabinet and the senior civil servant here in Westminster, whose loyalty is to the Westminster Government?

5.45 pm

I do not think that the issue has been thought through. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may try to brush it away or under the carpet. I am not being rude to him, but I ask him to consider the matter. It is an important matter that needs to be clarified. It is important that officers of the national assembly should be servants of the national assembly in just the same way as the Clerks and officers of the House of Commons are servants of Westminster Back-Bench Members.

I do not want to speak for a long time because I appreciate that this will be a short debate. I have said what I wanted to say and I do not intend to amplify my remarks. As I have said, we are discussing an important matter.

Mr. Öpik: Throughout the many days of consideration of the Bill, we have complained that Ministers and the Government generally have not listened to various of our suggestions. Now, it has come as something of a surprise and a delight that the Government have made such a substantial effort to try to take on board points made by the Opposition. Slowly but surely, the Secretary of State is beginning to recognise the enormous value of the Liberal Democrats as the constitutional gurus in this place. I applaud that unequivocally.

Mr. Wigley: The hon. Gentleman's modesty knows no bounds.

Mr. Öpik: Indeed. Our constitutional prowess is second only to our humility.

My colleagues and I welcome the general thrust of the block of amendments that is before us. It has been interesting to listen to the concerns that have been raised by other hon. Members, which have been mainly about the confusion between whether it is a Cabinet structure or a Committee structure. As I tried to say earlier in a brief intervention, I do not see that this is a problem.

In modern management systems analysis, it has become clear that some of the best organisations, in ascertaining for themselves how they operate—slightly intuitive, slightly trial and error—come to the conclusion that, if they trust the individuals who are running those systems and consider them to be responsible and bright, they can trust them also to define what would be the best system for them to operate.

In that context, we must make the assumption that the good people of Wales will elect 60 responsible individuals who will be capable of making the right decisions. It is an exciting experiment, not a dangerous one, to allow the Welsh assembly to define its processes to such a degree.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): As a constitutional guru, how would the hon. Gentleman answer the charge that, despite what he said about talented and bright individuals, the purpose of a constitution is to put in place institutions, conventions and rules that will control the excesses of individuals? A constitutional guru would surely recognise that. Perhaps he will point to a serious organisation, a state or a system of government where the constitution does not put in place such safeguards.

Mr. Öpik: I shall happily ask one of my colleagues to put together a seminar, at no cost, to the official Opposition so that we might discuss those matters at greater depth. However, to answer the hon. Gentleman's question briefly, as I try always to answer direct questions, the purpose of having a constitution is not to regulate every detail of process but to facilitate an outcome or result. We all want the assembly to work, but that does not mean that we must define in minute detail exactly how it will choose to structure itself any more than a company manager would need to define in detail how all staff members choose to operate in order to deliver a result.

Mr. Hayes: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way twice. He has replied to my first question by referring to businesses. I do not know whether he has a background in business or industry, but I spent a long time in that sector. Companies do not have constitutions, because they are not subject to the pressures that I described. Business institutions do not have to have public safeguards in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests. That is a totally inappropriate analogy.

Mr. Öpik: The hon. Gentleman and I can agree to differ. As ever, I find myself mentioning Procter and Gamble. As far as I know, that company has no intention of governing Wales or any other part of the world. Nevertheless, it must achieve specific outcomes. It must secure a profit for its shareholders and, in the same way, the Welsh assembly must secure a profit for its stakeholders who, in this case, are the people of Wales.

We are dealing very much in analogies. It is perfectly correct for hon. Members to question the legitimacy of making a comparison between business and politics. However, I suggest that, if we are to be progressive and to take the best of Westminster and leave behind the worst elements—

Mr. Hayes: We do not want to leave Westminster.

Mr. Öpik: I am sure that the people of Wales welcome the hon. Gentleman's decision. If we are to look at politics in a different way—

Mr. Evans: Does the hon. Gentleman intend to stand for the assembly?

Mr. Öpik: That is a rather puerile intervention. I have said many times that I have no intention of standing for the assembly because my work at Westminster is not yet completed.

I believe that my analogy of business and politics is quite robust. Those who seek to find fault with taking the best from modern business structures contradict the basic ethos of the Welsh assembly. The assembly's goal is to govern the United Kingdom differently and to be courageous enough to believe that there is perhaps a more effective form of government than the somewhat tired processes that occasionally find us moribund in this Chamber at 6 am. As far as I am concerned, the analogy of the quacking dog is not necessarily a bad one. However, I define the Welsh assembly as a barking eagle: it should soar above Wales and survey the problems while retaining the capacity to defend Welsh territory against those who may not be so supportive of its endeavours.

In summarising my first point, I implore those who seek to detract from the hybrid nature of a Cabinet-cum-Committee structure to think bigger. Let us see how it goes, and let us be grateful that the new structure proposed in this block of amendments will allow the assembly to make course corrections as it discovers what works and what does not.

There is one caveat: the relationship between the Assembly Secretaries and the subject Committees must be very effective. That is the most important element of the relationships in all the assembly structures. We favour allowing the Assembly Secretaries to have clear roles in terms of not just conveying messages to the Committees but being advocates for the Committees by conveying information to the Cabinet. If that works, we shall be on to a very good thing.

Dr. Marek: I agree entirely that the national assembly should be able to see its way forward. However, it is written in primary legislation that every civil servant must be a member of the home civil service. Therefore, the assembly will not be able to feel its way in that area if anything goes wrong.

Mr. Öpik: I listened to the hon. Gentleman's contribution and I think that he has raised a genuine concern. I look forward to hearing the Secretary of State's response, as—without labouring the point—I think that all hon. Members share that concern.

Mr. Wigley: Taking up that thread, the hon. Gentleman may recall that the legislation that came before the House in the 1970s—which became the Wales Act 1978 and was defeated in a referendum—proposed an integrated public service in Wales. The Government have moved away from that position. It might be interesting to know the logic behind that decision, as the proposal would have created an embryo civil service in Wales that was answerable to Wales.

Mr. Öpik: That is a very lucid expansion of the point raised earlier by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). It would be helpful to hear the Secretary of State's view on the matter, and I hope that he will return to it in his summation.

I shall briefly summarise the aims of the Liberal Democrat amendments. They would make several important changes with regard to limiting the delegation of functions. We do not wish to see a huge number of political functions delegated to non-elected members. We believe that only administrative duties should be delegated to assembly staff. We recognise that there is another view on the matter, but we believe that the new clause is too broad. There should be more restrictions on the functions that may be transferred.

The other point of our amendments is to create three categories of staff: parliamentary, political and executive. In essence, those distinctions would be useful in preventing staff members from being pressured to perform inappropriate functions not related to their roles. That aim ties in with our other amendments.

I shall deal now with the amendments tabled by others. Allowing the assembly to confirm decisions to appoint Assembly Secretaries is an interesting concept, and I look forward to hearing the argument in defence of that position. I believe that that proposal would be too prescriptive and would fly in the face of the course that I advocated earlier in allowing the first assembly to follow etiquette in that area.

New clause 21 allows for Secretaries without Portfolio. I can understand the rationale behind that proposal, but that phrase makes the hairs on the back of my neck stand on end. I sincerely hope that, if a Secretary without Portfolio were appointed, we should not see the construction of a Swansea dome as compensation for not siting the assembly in that city. Incidentally, if such a dome were built, I hope that the Lord Chancellor would not be responsible for its interior decoration.

New clause 22 sensibly provides for a clearly defined Cabinet structure. The relationship between Committees and Cabinet may be complex, but the Cabinet will be quite easy to set up. I cannot imagine that the assembly will wrangle over that point.

[Mr. Öpik]

My final point responds to earlier comments made in the debate. I was concerned to hear the Secretary of State say that, if one party has an overall majority, that majority must be replicated across the Committees. That does not follow the principle of inclusivity, which we have discussed so much in the context of the assembly.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The hon. Gentleman is a keen advocate of the Cabinet system, but the Cabinet is not inclusive, either.

Mr. Öpik: There is no reason to believe that the Cabinet should necessarily comprise only one party. If we are serious about taking advantage of proportional representation and its manifestations, we should recognise that this is an opportunity to get the best from the various parties—new and old—that are likely to be represented in the first assembly. I encourage the Secretary of State to provide an assurance that he will at least consider allowing the First Secretary the latitude to give significant responsibilities to minority parties.

Mr. Grieve: That may be an expression of hope, and surely that is all that it can be. Representation and such matters will be decided by the assembly. Conservative Members strongly suspect that the inclusivity and the holistics about which we have heard a great deal may be rather more absent than present. I understand what the hon. Gentleman says, but there is not much point in Conservative Members going on about representation in the assembly, because the proof of the pudding will be in the eating.

6 pm

Mr. Öpik: There may be some point in Conservative Members going on about representation. The Welsh people are magnanimous, and we have agreed to a proportional representation system that might allow Conservative Members back into Welsh politics. We expect no thanks for that, but we expect maturity from any Conservatives who are elected to the assembly. Members of the assembly from all parties must act responsibly and co-operatively if the assembly is to be a progressive development from the Westminster Parliament.

Still, the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) may be right, and our hopes may be dashed by the first assembly. If it seeks to impose one-party-rule attitudes, my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) will have been deceived.

Mr. Evans: Where is the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Öpik: My hon. Friend is in his constituency swapping views about this very debate, and will join us shortly. Had we not had a privatised rail network, he would have been here already.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield was right to make the crucial point about representation, which hangs on the question of whether the ruling party, should there be one, will have the maturity and self-confidence to allow other parties to hold significant responsibilities. We must wait and see.

We had a tactical debate about the additional cost of a Cabinet structure. Surely we can all agree to the small on-cost, or perhaps even the small on-saving, of a Cabinet structure, if it is the strategically correct government structure. A Cabinet structure will not have a major effect on the cost of running the assembly. I hope that we shall not descend to whingeing about prices when we should be planning the future decision-making body for an entire nation.

My last point concerns positive thinking. It is always easy to condemn a structure that is not yet operating, but it is better to ask how a body can be made to work. As long as we are reasonably confident that we are within 10 per cent. of the right structure, we must believe that the rest will be achieved by responsible assembly Members who will have great enthusiasm and an enormous interest in making the first assembly work.

The Cabinet-Committee structure, which has been advocated by the three Opposition parties, will provide an excellent opportunity to see how high is up. Britain should look beyond the old structures inhabited by Westminster Members of Parliament to new structures that will allow Wales to spread its wings and prove that it can be a world player with a truly up-to-date democratic system.

Mr. Rowlands: I must tell the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) that I have not managed to call my nation or my constituency a company in 30 years in Parliament. I do not believe in using that term in such a way, and I do not believe in the values associated with it. The management-speak that poured from the hon. Gentleman is not appropriate to arguments about how we shall be governed under the new arrangements in the Welsh assembly.

Over the past 20 years, too many of our services have been gripped by management-speak. Some people believe that it can be crudely applied to the concept of service. That is a worthy concept, which is worth standing up and fighting for. It is a privilege to represent people. Management-speak books do not contain such words, but I hope that we find them in politics and in the Welsh assembly.

Mr. Öpik: I am sorry to intervene after making a lengthy contribution, but does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the words "integrity" and "service" are at the core of almost every successful multinational organisation?

Mr. Rowlands: Many features of multinational corporations are unlikely to exemplify those virtues. No, the hon. Gentleman's assumption is not right.

I shall address most of my remarks to amendment (c), but shall first speak to new clause 20. The Bill and I are not destined to get on. I vigorously defended the original clause on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, only to find that the persuasive qualities of the Conservatives, the Liberal Democrats and the nationalists—clearly not those of Labour Members—brought about a change.

I am grappling with the changes, and am trying to understand and appreciate them. The alteration of the wording caused me a bit of a problem. Will there be a Cabinet-style approach, which was mentioned in a press release; a Cabinet-style process of decision making, to use my right hon. Friend's words; or a Cabinet system, which was mentioned in debate? The Opposition amendments propose a straightforward Cabinet. We have had a great deal of time to think in the past 12 or 14 hours, especially in the small hours.

I am at sea on those issues, so I went not to management-speak, but to Walter Bagehot's classic definition of the constitution. He said:

"A cabinet is a combining committee—a hyphen which joins, a buckle which fastens the legislative part of the state to the Executive part of the state."

If that is a valid description of a Cabinet, I cannot for the life of me see why the Opposition are pressing so vigorously for a Cabinet structure in the Welsh assembly, especially as they do not support a formal legislative function. The definition is old-fashioned and beautifully written; it also has an authentic feel. If the assembly is not to be a legislative body, why try vigorously to implant or impose on that new democratic institution a Cabinet structure of the sort that would be provided by the Opposition amendments? New clause 20 also moves some way towards such a structure.

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman says that the assembly will not be a legislative body. Did I hear him correctly? Will not the assembly be legislative, albeit through passing secondary legislation?

Mr. Rowlands: The assembly will have a subordinate legislative function, but we should not get sidetracked because the issue has been debated at considerable length.

Throughout the debates and throughout the referendum campaign, the point was sturdily made that we are not constructing a Welsh assembly with the power to pass primary legislation of the kind and character to which Bagehot referred when talking of the legislative state.

We fail to remind ourselves of what the Welsh assembly is supposed to do. Its fundamental function is to allocate a block grant of £7 billion—a large sum of money—according to what it decides are the priorities and needs of the Welsh people. Distribution of expenditure does not necessarily have to be decided under a Cabinet system. The nature of the Welsh assembly's fundamental function means that secret, closed Cabinet decision-making is unnecessary. The whole idea of devolution and the setting up of a Welsh assembly was to introduce openness and to have all the options up and running, not closed down, one by one, by Cabinet Ministers and Executive Committees that would filter decision making. I thought that the idea of the new politics of devolution was to move away from that process, but there is a hankering to return to the old-style Westminster system of Cabinet decision making.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman's speech is compelling and lucid. He says that the Cabinet binds the Executive and the legislature. He has made it clear that the assembly will have a legislative role, albeit a reduced one, and that the Executive will also have a role. Without the structure that Cabinet provides, how would he link those two roles?

Mr. Rowlands: The buckle that joins the assembly to Westminster and Whitehall has nothing to do with the internal decision-making process in the assembly. That link is supposed to be through the Secretary of State and concordats. If we manage to debate the concordats, I hope that that will be brought out. Sadly, we shall not debate the role of the Secretary of State. The hon. Gentleman's point is irrelevant in this context, because there are other instruments for the function that he describes. Whether they can do it is another matter.

I did not want the assembly to have an old-fashioned local government structure. Equally, I do not want an old-fashioned Cabinet structure. I do not know whether the new clauses have created a hybrid or a hydra, but it seems that a third way is being sought. It has been found for economic policy and it is now to be in constitutional policy. Unfortunately, at the moment it is a rather convoluted and confused way to decide where we are going.

Nowhere in the White Paper or in the first draft of the Bill is there a reference to a permanent secretary. Why has one suddenly emerged in new clause 24? Oddly enough, the new clause states:

"(whether or not that person is known by the title of Permanent Secretary to the Assembly)."

Has the term been introduced to try to give the assembly the smack of old Westminster to satisfy those who have been pressing for a Welsh Government?

Above all, I question the Minister's reason for the change. In the press release and, I think, in his opening speech, he said:

"People want decision-making arrangements which provide for identified individuals to be clearly accountable to the public for particular decisions."

The new structure is supposed to provide that. Cabinet-style Government is much more collective in its decision-making process, and a permanent secretary who derives his authority from the role that he may claim in a subject committee is likely to have a perfectly identical profile. I cannot envisage many wallflowers in Welsh politics. I am not sure what the Minister meant or why he thinks that his alternative system will make people more identifiable. They will be identifiable when the First Secretary hires or fires them. That will raise their profiles.

6.15 pm

Why are we slavishly trying to return to tight, collective decision making? When one person is given the right to hire and fire, sooner or later a collective system of government will emerge. Instead of following a career in the assembly and in working with the Committees, people will follow the patronage system with which we are familiar. I have been a beneficiary of that, and understand it as well as anybody. There will be a plethora of Secretaries, the equivalent of Ministers, and there will be shadow Secretaries. When that happens, the new assembly will have returned to the world of personal patronage. I thought that devolution was more and better than that.

Mr. Grieve: I sympathise with much of what the hon. Gentleman says. He spoke about a hybrid or hydra. Has not the Secretary of State engaged in hype? The assembly will be toothless in relation to its officials. We face a dilemma. The early system seemed to offer no government for Wales, but the system that has been adopted could be criticised for not being much different from the Westminster one, which would allow the assembly to control officials. Without that, there is no control.

[Mr. Grieve]

Mr. Rowlands: I do not think that it is hype. It has more substance, I would not spend time making my case. It is a significant and important change. It shifts the nature and balance of the assembly's chemistry, and its politics will be altered by the changes. That is clear from an examination of the first secretary's role. He will have power to hire and fire. In the press release and in other statements, the Minister was at pains to explain that the Assembly Secretaries will have an important role in the Committees and that that will in no way lead to a downgrading of the Committees.

It is stated that each Assembly Secretary will have to work in partnership with the all-party subject Committee of which he or she is the leader. If one of a Secretary's major functions is to relate to an all-party subject Committee, surely our amendment (c) should apply. If the First Secretary seeks to sack that person, the Committee on which he sits should be asked to approve the dismissal. We should at least slightly temper what is otherwise a good old-fashioned return to a full-scale system of patronage in the hands of the First Secretary, who will rapidly become the Prime Minister or Premier. I understand the difficulties of finding the third way, but we must develop institutional structures that will reflect what we hope will be the new politics of devolution and not the old-fashioned politics to which so many of the clauses and Opposition amendments would like to return.

Mr. Wigley: I am glad of the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands). He described the Westminster Cabinet system, which is the type of system that generally operates in most central Governments, comparing it with the local government system and speaking about old-style local government. As he knows, I was a councillor on just such an old-style authority in Merthyr Tydfil. Anyone who says that that was an open, inclusive system of government is talking through their hat. Those in opposition—and, I suspect, sometimes Labour members of that authority—were kept in the dark most of the time about what was going on.

Therefore, I do not think that the argument is between local government and central Government-type systems. The argument is how we achieve the most effective system from the proposals that are before the House, which will, I hope, serve Wales well.

As the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney has said, I approach the subject from the view that we should take more power from Westminster and have a central Government-type system in Wales, so I welcome the Government's move. Not only have we been pressing for it, but, in strategic terms, it is important: it gives better coherence.

I accept that getting quick decisions is a managerial consideration, but we must consider what sometimes happens in local government and the delays in decision making even in new local government, which can be astronomical, hampering leaders' ability to take decisions. The proposal will facilitate quicker decision taking. Provided that there is proper answerability, this system can be made to work.

I intervened earlier on the question of answerability. What is the relationship between the Secretary and the Committee on which he or she serves as a member? I do not think that we have properly thought that through. Perhaps that was the Government's intention—to leave flexibility for the assembly itself to think it through—but the Committee needs at least some initial guidelines, so that both the commission that is working at present and the assembly know the framework within which the Committee will initially work.

I am a little at a loss to know how exactly the Secretary will relate to the Committee. He or she may be a member of the Committee and sit on it. It may behave similarly to a Select Committee, before which a Minister appears from time to time to answer for the policies being pursued. To start with, Select Committee members sit around in private to discuss the questioning of the Minister—who will say what the main points to be followed are. That will be difficult in the Welsh assembly if the Minister is a member of the Committee that will do the cross-questioning.

Will the Committee draw up the strategy and priorities within that Department's remit? If so, will the Minister be obliged to argue that case from the bottom up, as it were, in what will effectively be the Cabinet—the Executive Committee—or will he impose the policies from the centre down and have only to answer before the Committee? If that is the case, it is difficult to see that the Secretary will genuinely be a member of the Committee. He or she will come to the Committee—and certainly relate to it—but will not necessarily answer to it and be a member of a body that has developed the policy.

There is the question of the Committee's sanction against the Secretary. If the Committee feels that the priorities which it has determined, and which it believes the Secretary has been espousing and advocating within Cabinet, have not been genuinely put forward—perhaps the Secretary has deliberately not followed the Committee's line—does the Committee have the sanction of removing the Secretary?

I understand that one could argue that that should be a matter for the entire House. I should like to take up the point on which the Secretary of State intervened. Although the governing party may have an overall majority in the assembly—and although that majority will be reflected in the membership of the working Committees—that does not mean that every member of a Committee does not have his or her own opinion. The balance of feeling within a Committee may be different from the balance of feeling in the Cabinet and assembly as a whole.

The Committee may therefore want to follow a different line from that being pursued by the Cabinet. It may concentrate on one issue and not relate it to the other issues that the Cabinet or Executive Committee has to consider in parallel, not least in terms of resources. I am not sure whether we have fully understood the balance between answerability and being inter pares—advocating what the Committee wants in the Executive Committee.

There is the question of the balance within the Committees themselves. I accept that the balance in the Committees can be only that within the assembly; it could not be anything else. That is as good as anything that we, as a minority party, could want, although we, like other parties, aspire to being a majority party some time in the Welsh assembly.

The Chairs of the Committees could be powerful people, as those who chair Select Committees sometimes are: one thinks of the tremendous work of Committees such as the Public Accounts Committee. A Chair can be almost as powerful as a Minister—at least in terms of scrutiny, he or she is powerful. There will be an interesting relationship between the Chair and the Secretary, but they may not be of the same party; presumably, there will be a sharing of the Chairs. If they are not of the same party, do problems arise in terms of proper answerability and the working relationship that is necessary to allow quick and effective decision making? There could be a conflict between the two.

I welcome the new clauses. More work will need to be done on them. As we are on Report, this is clearly a matter for another place. I would much rather that it had happened here, but questions still need to be answered before we can say what amendments need to be tabled. I hope that, in his winding-up speech, the Secretary of State will deal with some of them.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I was saddened, although not critical of the fact, that, in the face of the weight of the establishment forces in Wales ranged against him—the advisory committee, which is taken from the great and the good in Wales, the Conservative party, the nationalist party and the Liberal Democrats—the Secretary of State has moved away from what was in the Bill originally. Various people criticised what was in the Bill, saying that it contained a local government model, as if that were wholly bad.

In fact, it was not a local government model. I thought that the draftsman, or whoever instructed the draftsman, drew up an elegant model in the Bill, which lay somewhere between the local government model and a type of Cabinet system. I thought that it was well done, but my right hon. Friend has no doubt been pressurised. Whether he is actually happy with the direction in which he is moving, I do not know, but he certainly has moved.

I took a note of what my right hon. Friend said at the beginning of his speech. He said that it was a "Cabinet-style process of decision-making." By the time he had concluded, it was going to be a Cabinet. Indeed, he made it clear that, once the procedures were drawn up, it would be a Cabinet.

Let us make no bones about it: it will be a Cabinet and it will meet in secret. Ministers of the Cabinet, whether they have portfolios or not, will have red boxes or perhaps red and green boxes—I am not sure what the appropriate colour might be for this inclusivity or hybridity. They will have motor cars. Just as years ago the National Union of Mineworkers sometimes mirrored the coal owners and the coal owners sometimes mirrored the NUM, so the Welsh assembly will mirror Westminster in almost every form.

We are to have at least one permanent secretary. I am sure that there will be more than one. There will be a second permanent secretary. Indeed, when I was at the Treasury, there were four second permanent secretaries and, beneath them, there were deputy permanent secretaries. no doubt there will be deputy permanent secretaries and second permanent secretaries and they will each talk to the next layer up. We will have the whole system.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) told us about multinational companies and his great experience of them. When it came to money, he was very cavalier—far more cavalier than a treasurer of a multinational company would be—and said that the Cabinet-type system might cost a little more. Of course it will, but we must remember that that money comes out of the budget; it comes out of money for hospitals and schools, so he had no right to be cavalier about it. It is not additional money that can come from somewhere else, wherever it can be found. So a Westminster structure will cost more money. I am sorry that my right hon. Friend has succumbed to pressure to take that route.

We are talking partly about secrecy. Those of us who have been round the course before—in 1978-79—felt that one reason for having a Welsh assembly was that the Welsh budget or allocation of money to Wales could never be debated on the Floor of the House as time did not allow for it. It was debated within the Welsh Office by civil servants and Ministers and, in most cases, proper decisions were reached. I make no criticism of that. However, there was no open debate of the allocation of funds to Wales; it was all done behind closed doors. Once we have moved to the black cars, the red boxes, the permanent secretaries, the Cabinets, the Premiers, the Chief Ministers and the First Secretaries, we will replicate exactly the same procedure.

6.30 pm

Matters related to the allocation of funds will not be discussed in public because of commercial confidentiality or because there will be too many pressures. So it will all be decided by Ministers, with or without portfolio, sitting in Cardiff or wherever, making decisions behind closed doors.

Mr. Letwin: As always, the right hon. Gentleman is making a most interesting speech. Does he agree that the result to which he is alluding will arise because the concomitant of Cabinet Government—procedures for debating money Bills, budgets and so on—is not proposed for the Welsh assembly? So we have only half the package.

Mr. Davies: Yes, but I am addressing my remarks to what we have—Executive devolution. Although I appreciate that there may be secondary legislation, the basic intention was to establish a body that would distribute the money that the Treasury allocates to the Welsh Office—mainly in secret. I make no criticism of Ministers, as that is the process. The money is then distributed to various sectors. The rate support grant is decided partly in public and allocated to housing and education. That is the nature of the beast. My hope was that at least that debate would take place in the open. I hope that I am wrong and that that will still happen, but I suspect that it will not once the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) has his trappings of power.

Indeed—who knows?—Perhaps the Ministers without portfolio will become Privy Councillors. Perhaps they will all be kissing hands and generally acquiring all the trappings of Westminster power. However, once that is set in motion, the nature of Government being what it is, everything will be decided in secret.

All the other members of the assembly will be sitting around without very much to do. Like Government Back Benchers, they will be expected to approve the third way or whatever. We are here to facilitate—to make sure that, once the third way has been decided on, it will be carried out.

[Mr. Davies]

Mr. Ron Davies: My right hon. Friend could have fooled me.

Mr. Davies: My right hon. Friend is amused. He should not take me too far on this issue, as he knows that we all subscribe 100 per cent. to the third way, despite the fact that occasionally we like to please ourselves and debate a few of the commas and full stops. Basically, we are all here to ensure that the third way proceeds easily.

Most members of the assembly will be there to do the bidding of the Chief Minister, the First Secretary, the permanent secretaries and all the trappings of Westminster Government that, sadly, we are now transplanting or adding to the Welsh assembly.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire, who likes to appear as a moderniser, is in the vanguard with the traditionalists. He wants a Westminster model, as do the Welsh nationalists. I understand the purpose of the nationalists. They want to create the trappings of a state. It is a state that does not raise enough money to keep itself going, but we shall discuss that in other debates.

I am sorry that my right hon. Friend has succumbed, but even a man of his iron will sometimes has to bend and, on this occasion, I am afraid that my right hon. Friend is bending.

Mr. Leigh: I very much agree with what the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) has just said. The longer the debate proceeds, the more worried people should become. The Secretary of State's opening speech was very short. The proposal has appeared somewhat late in the day. I understand the reason for it—to create a clear sense of responsibility. I can see where it is coming from.

Mr. Ron Davies: It is coming from the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Leigh: Yes, but I am also entitled to speak for myself. That may be a strange concept to the Labour party, but I am not put up against the wall by my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) and told what to say.

We have had a loose discussion about the Cabinet style of Government. However, it is a term of art that has developed over many centuries. It originally grew out of the King's Privy Council. The Cabinet was a fundamentally secretive body, a function of Executive government because it had to be. It was concerned with the King's business and issues of war and peace. However, I thought that in the Welsh assembly we sought to create something very different. That is why I echo the words of the right hon. Member for Llanelli who spoke from the Back Benches, not the Front Bench.

I am concerned that, sadly, in our own Chamber, because the Executive is drawn out of the legislature, people's primary ambition is to join the Executive. Therefore, more often than not, they will follow the party line on pretty well every occasion. The process has developed to a sophisticated degree.

When the Americans were trying to organise their new constitution, they wisely decided that the Executive should be entirely separate from the legislature. Therefore, Congressmen are entirely independent. I am concerned that we are now replicating in the Welsh assembly the worst aspects of what happens in the House.

Mr. Letwin: I am following my hon. Friend's line of logic. Does he not agree that something much worse is being done? The very safeguards that we have in the House—my hon. Friend may regard them as too slight, but they exist none the less—in the form of positive debate of legislation and money Bills are precisely what is not being offered by the Secretary of State in respect of the Welsh assembly.

Mr. Leigh: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Therefore, the concentration of power in the Welsh Assembly may be much more serious than what has developed in the Westminster Parliament in the past 200 years. Anyone who approaches the matter with any seriousness should be extremely worried about that.

Let us consider what is likely to happen. Let us assume for the sake of argument that the Labour party becomes the governing party in the assembly and has an overall majority. Let us assume that the current Secretary of State becomes the First Secretary. He would have enormous power, so it is not surprising that he is considering carefully whether to take up that position. He would appoint his own Cabinet. Members of the Cabinet will not be separated from the Parliament or the legislature as they are here. They will not have to persuade the Parliament from a separate point of view; they will be embedded in its structure and sit on the Committees.

Surely any self-respecting member of the majority party in the assembly will want to be a Secretary or a Minister and want to join the First Secretary's team. The First Secretary will appoint the Secretaries and they will be embedded into the Committee structure. Where will be the honest, open debate? As the right hon. Member for Llanelli said, speaking from the Back Benches, the assembly will develop a culture of secrecy and rule by a single party.

The right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) said that, when he was on Merthyr Tydfil council, he felt that there was some secrecy on that body. I quite understand. Most of us were involved in local government before being elected to Parliament. The advantage of local government is that, because it is an administrative body, councillors sit on committees and elect a chairman. There is more sense of audience—member—participation in local government committees than there is in our governmental structures in this place, where ordinary Back Benchers exercise very little power.

What worries me, therefore, is that we are embedding in the new assembly—we hoped that it would develop a third way—all the worst aspects of our centralised government structures. We should think twice before setting off down that road.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Several speeches this evening have highlighted the fact that there is now a problem with the legislation. We need to resolve it or to gain an undertaking that it will be resolved in another place. The problem is that, in moving away from the proposals of the referendum and the White Paper—at the request of the three Opposition parties and on the advice of the advisory committee—the Secretary of State has opted for a Cabinet-oriented system of government as his preferred choice. He has said, subject to the legislation proceeding in the Government's desired manner, that the Welsh Assembly will open using a Cabinet-style model—but that it will not have to follow that model. It can, in fact, revert to the original proposals in the first draft of the Bill as it reached the House a few months ago. That model was a Committee-style model, subject to two-thirds majorities and so on.

The problem with commencing with a Cabinet-style model but allowing the assembly to opt for a Committee-style model later is that other consequential changes will need to be made to the Bill to make it consistent from day one. Had the Secretary of State done things the other way round, there would have been fewer problems. Starting with a Committee-style model would not necessitate so many consequential changes.

The real problem is that the Secretary of State has expressed a preference for a Cabinet-style model from day one, but without the consequential changes. If we start by making a distinction between Front and Back Benchers, certain consequences will flow from that. Indeed, they lie behind my new clause 32 and new schedule 1. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has pointed out, an assembly separate from the Executive will need a Clerk and a separate staff to protect the interests of Back Benchers and to give them advice on drafting amendments and obtaining information not supplied by the Government or the civil service. That is the reasoning behind new clause 33, which has the same purpose as the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham.

Amendment no. 250 would amend clause 1 of the Bill, to drop the expression

"The Assembly shall be a body corporate".

No such reference is to be found in the Bill setting up the Scottish Parliament, which is referred to simply as the Scottish Parliament. The Welsh assembly, however, is referred to as a body corporate. That is fine if we follow the Committee model but not if we follow the Cabinet model, which would give rise to a distinction between the Executive, run by the Cabinet, and the legislature—the quasi-parliamentary body which is to challenge, and occasionally change, what Front Benchers want to do. That is the whole point of Back Benchers, after all.

We do not need the expression "a body corporate", any more than the Scottish Bill needs it. The Scotland Bill does not define the legal status of the Scottish Parliament. In a sense, all parliaments are sui generis, so it is pointless defining their legal status. If the Executive and the legislature are to be separated, there is no need to call the legislature a body corporate. I would argue that the expression should be omitted from the Bill.

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman makes his points with great force. Does he agree that there is at least one further issue of equal magnitude: the question of clause 66, which would permit the so-called Cabinet to arrogate to itself the power to legislate, leaving the assembly only the ability to pray a negative resolution? So on the first day of meeting, the assembly could delegate all powers of legislation to the Cabinet and never reconvene, provided that it never prayed a negative resolution.

6.45 pm

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful for that intervention. I cannot say that I had intended to cover the subject later in my speech, because I had not. Indeed, I had not spotted the significance that the hon. Gentleman discerns in the clause.

Then there is the problem, if we adopt a Cabinet model, of the Official Secrets Act 1989, referred to in clause 79, which I suspect we will discuss later. It appears that it would be deemed to apply only to Front Benchers—the Executive Committee—and would thus need to be amended. We shall discuss that later, too, I suspect.

Then we need to consider the departmental staff—the people who do the conventional civil service work. If BSE continues to be a problem, a vet from the state veterinary service in Scotland who visits a sick cow will be employed by the Scottish Office Agriculture, Environment and Fisheries Department, under the Scottish Parliament. In England, a cow suspected of having BSE will be visited by a vet employed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. In Wales, however, a sick cow will be visited by a Welsh assembly vet, not a vet from the Agriculture Department, because civil servants carrying out usual departmental work will belong not to Departments but to the Welsh assembly. Here, too, consequential changes are called for.

We need to think seriously about two further changes, although they may seem optional. The first concerns the vote of confidence procedure that can trigger elections. We need to debate—I am not convinced of it myself—whether fixed-term elections can be sustained with a Cabinet system. What happens if the First Secretary or the Cabinet loses the confidence of the assembly? Could they stagger on for another four years after losing the confidence of the assembly, perhaps by replacing the First Secretary and the members of the Executive Committee? Would there be a right to ask for a dissolution, in the same way as the Scottish Parliament could?

Finally, under a Cabinet system, would each party be required to elect its leader in advance of the elections? We know of the problems that the Tory party is experiencing in its consideration of the various voting systems—

Mr. Ancram indicated dissent.

Mr. Morgan: I am not making a party political point; I am simply saying that the Conservative party is considering the one member, one vote, system of electing its leader.

Will that need to be done in Wales as well by changing the Welsh Labour party rules, as the Scottish Labour party did some 10 days ago when it said that the putative Scottish First Minister will need to be given a democratic mandate in the party political sense? If we are to adopt the Cabinet model, we must think about changing the rules in the Welsh Labour party. We could then have a Prime Minister designate, selected by one member, one vote.

The alternative approach is to use the local government model, whereby the leader of the assembly is selected the day after the election from the 20 or so—or however many is required to have a majority—of the 35 Members elected. The minimum number of votes with which one could win a majority in the Welsh assembly is 31. If someone is voted for by 31 Members of the Assembly, as Labour might hope to achieve, 16 will constitute a majority. If a person can get 16 votes on the day after the election, he or she will be the First Secretary of the Welsh Assembly. Although those 16 people will have been voted in by the people of Wales, theirs will not constitute a big democratic mandate as compared with that of the British Prime Minister or the Scottish First Minister.

[Mr. Morgan]

That may not be a matter for this House, but it is a matter for all the parties represented in this House which will contest the election. They are concerned with the quality of the democratic mandate that flows from having a Cabinet system.

The points that I have made follow the same line as those made by the vast majority of Labour Members who have spoken. If we adopt a Cabinet system, at least initially, we need to follow through the changes logically so that we have a consistent package. If we do not—many Labour Members think that we should not—that is fine, because we will not need to make those consequential changes until we opt for a Cabinet model. However, if we adopt the Cabinet model first, we need to make the consequential changes that go with that so that we have a coherent whole. If we do it the other way around, there will be less of a problem, provided that permission is included in the Bill.

I am inclined to think that we should not have gone down this road, in spite of the pressing and blandishments of all three Opposition parties and of the advisory committee. It is far too easy to make the fundamental mistake of choosing a Westminster solution to a Welsh problem and Welsh political circumstances. We have not yet reached the stage where we need to opt for the kind of recommendations that have been made by all three Opposition parties because they are far too liable to "Westminsterise" the new Welsh democratic creation which we have spent so much time and trouble trying to get right.

Mr. Syms: I agree with a great deal of what the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) said. We are almost always on opposite sides of the argument in this Chamber, but he made some good points. I agree that the Bill must be logical.

However, I support the changes proposed by the Government because, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) said, a Cabinet system would be better because it recognises what will inevitably happen: after an election, the party with a majority will hold a meeting to elect who it wants to run the Committees. The proposed change makes that more explicit than it would be if we adopted the local government model.

The whole tenor of the Bill is that a further tier of government is required in Wales, so it is right to recognise it in this form. A Cabinet system would clearly delineate who is running the assembly and who is on the Opposition side. Earlier in the debate, an hon. Member said that we would have shadow Secretaries next. In many respects, that could be a good thing. I believe that an Administration, an Opposition and some debate are what democratic structures are about.

We have heard a great deal about inclusivity and the new politics, but once we get an assembly I suspect that it will be politics as we have always known them, with parties competing, arguing, debating and putting forward their points. The key point about a Cabinet system is that it allows a party to stand on a platform before the electorate. At the end of an election, if that party commands a majority within the assembly, it will have the mechanisms to carry out its mandate. That provides some accountability, which the more general and diffuse local government model does not provide.

I support my right hon. Friend's amendment to limit the number of Assembly Secretaries to eight. Under the Bill as it stands, their number could be unlimited. The idea of a non-portfolio Secretary is interesting. I am surprised that 20 Members will be elected on the alternative member system without constituencies and they could have non-jobs and be Ministers, although, thinking about it more carefully, a "non-portfolio Secretary" sounds like a Chief Whip. In this new politics, I am sure that Whips will run the political structure. Patronage is part of the system and clearly goes with the alternative member system. After all, parties will appoint placemen on those lists.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) made a good point about the home civil service. Civil servants will sometimes have divided loyalties, particularly when they represent this country in European institutions. That reveals a more difficult problem—the question of political appointees. If Cabinet members feel that they do not have the whole-hearted loyalty of home civil servants, they may fill that vacuum by making more political appointments. Nothing in the Bill stops them doing that.

Most political parties would think that it is perfectly sensible to have political advisers, but it is probably inevitable that, if we have a First Secretary, we shall have a First Secretary's policy unit, press secretary and other appointments. The Government should think a little more about that. If they do not make it clear to whom people are responsible, the vacuum may be filled by political appointees from a political party, who may start to play a larger role within the assembly's political affairs than would be the case in the British political system.

Despite criticism by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber, the British system has few political appointees or special advisers to Prime Ministers or Ministers. Most advisers are career civil servants, which is how it should be. If the assembly is not in control of its own civil servants because they form part of the home civil service, it will be tempted to make political appointments.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West spoke about votes of confidence, which would become an important concept. There would no doubt be a vote of confidence in the First Secretary, but the fact that there are fixed four-year terms would be a problem. Elections are not always a problem, but they can solve problems if there is a logjam in a legislative assembly.

Mr. Letwin: Will my hon. Friend expand the point which the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) did not quite make, and my hon. Friend has not quite made? Will he go on to say that, in this case, a strange situation could arise in respect of the Committee that had delegated authority to the Secretary in the first place? If its political position altered, for example by movement across the Floor of one person, the Committee could reabsorb and de-delegate the power, thereby causing a crisis not just of confidence but of legislative authority.

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend raises a good point. The issue of hon. Members leaving parties brings us back to the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes about the registration of political parties. That forms part of the Bill—or the cake—that we have not seen, and is relevant to the way in which political parties operate.

The ability to dissolve is an important part of the political process. A vote of confidence may sometimes be moved and carried, and the party concerned may be unable to assemble sufficient forces to produce an alternative to run the assembly; chaos would ensue. The assembly will dispose of a good deal of money, and will provide important services for the people of Wales. We therefore need to be clear about what will happen under the new arrangements.

That brings us to the question of concordats, in their broadest sense. Will a concordat be concluded with a First Secretary—in effect, the Cabinet—and, if that First Secretary is removed, will the concordat become null and void? Or can the system involving the First Secretary and the Cabinet change, while the concordat remains for the four-year period that may have been agreed with the assembly? That is a grey area, and I think that we should hear a bit more about how the system will work.

Surely it is sensible for an administration involving a First Secretary, Assembly Secretaries and a Cabinet system to agree a concordat with the United Kingdom Government. If that administration were removed, perhaps the terms of the concordat should also go, and should not be inherited by any successor body.

7 pm

Many parts of the Bill may well need tidying up because of proposed changes, but I broadly welcome the change to a Cabinet system. It will make the assembly more accountable, and, as I said at the outset, it will provide a platform, in that the manifesto presented to the electorate will have to be pushed through an assembly explicitly rather than behind closed doors.

In local government, there is a pretence that there is a committee system in which everyone has a say, but, having served in local government for many years, I know that, in practice, the most important decisions are made in group meetings rather than in debates in the chamber. I served on authorities that the Liberal Democrats ran for many years, and theirs was not the most inclusive, democratic, open way of doing things. They had group meetings and drummed measures through, very much like everyone else.

I welcome the changes overall, but there are certain problems. We must look at the question of concordats, and at votes of confidence and how First Secretaries are removed. There is also the question of civil servants' loyalty. My sympathies are not particularly with the assembly, but, if it is to exist, it is logical for it to employ—directly or otherwise—a certain number of civil servants, even in senior posts, rather than people being seconded or working for the home civil service.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): I firmly believe that the Government have no reason to be apologetic or defensive about new clauses 20 to 24. Their commitment to the new clauses reflects their willingness to listen to everyone who is genuinely committed to the idea of a successful assembly—and a successful assembly, which will deliver in terms of the expectations that have arisen in Wales, will need a strong executive wing.

The Bill does not refer to a Cabinet as such; it refers to an Executive Committee. I cannot see for the life of me what all the fuss is about. In a thoughtful speech, the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) pointed out that, in local government, decisions are normally made behind the scenes, by the ruling group. I agree, and I speak as one who served in local government before becoming a Member of Parliament.

The new clauses and amendments would introduce three important changes that would make the assembly more effective. First, they would make executive decision making more accountable, and would increase the focus—and, for that matter, political control—that can be brought to bear on civil servants. That is essential. Secondly, they would increase the efficiency and speed of decision making. That, too, is essential.

One of the criticisms of the local government system in its purest form was that it was unwieldy, and incapable of responding speedily when quick decisions were required. Is it not significant that the present Administration are embarking on a reform of local government? After all, it is generally felt that the Committee system tends to be too slow, and that it lacks transparency.

The third important aspect of the proposed changes is that the assembly's status would be enhanced. We must be careful not to ascribe too many of the trappings of power to the assembly, because this Parliament is sovereign; but, in my view, it is essential for the public to see who is responsible for each area of responsibility. There is a tension between the roles of Back Benchers and executive Assembly Secretaries. I saw force in what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and others, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). We cannot allow the assembly to adopt the worst practices of Westminster, where the power of the Executive has at times been far too great. There must be a balance between the scrutinising work of Back Benchers and the role of those with executive functions.

The Bill proposes the establishment of a council in partnership with local government, a voting system, the establishment of various advisory bodies and various other measures which, I am sure, will result from greater input into the work of drawing up Standing Orders. There will have to be a proper and fair balance between the Executive and Back Benchers. There will have to be steps to safeguard the role of Back Benchers and allow them to perform independently, but I welcome the new clauses. They give the assembly the tools that it needs to complete an important job.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): I want to pick up the business analogy made by my temporary hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik), which I found completely bizarre. No one else has suggested that we are making a major constitutional change along the lines of a change made by business. For one thing, the prospectus on the basis of which we set out back in the summer had the support of only 25 per cent. of the population. I know that Labour Members do not like that, but it is something to think about. They might also remember that management consultants like the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire will go for downsizing and clearness of decision making. I am afraid that that is being lost in the whole devolution process.

[Mr. Owen Paterson]

Overheads and over-management are a subject on which management consultants like the hon. Gentleman concentrate. Once devolution has happened, all Ministers will be without jobs. More important, however, is the fact that the new clauses go halfway towards improving what was set out in the original Bill. There is no doubt—as my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) said so eloquently—that there are serious doubts about the attempt to turn the assembly into a local government-style institution.

We have gone halfway; the problem is that the semi-Cabinet proposed by the new clauses and amendment is almost autonomous. It constitutes yet another layer. We have a Secretary of State, we will have a mini-Cabinet, and we will have the assembly. Once power has been devolved to the mini-Cabinet, I see no mechanism whereby the assembly can claw it back and make the Cabinet accountable. I should be grateful if the Secretary of State would answer that point.

We are going all the way to devolving power to the assembly. We are told that the problem of the democratic deficit will be resolved, and that all will be green in the new Wales. I fear, however, that we shall hand power to a small group of people in the assembly, after which we shall be trapped. I see no mechanism in the new clauses and amendments, or in the Bill, whereby the power can be returned. All that Opposition Members are trying to achieve will be lost.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) that we have gone halfway from a semi-local government system to a Cabinet system, but not all the way. I ask Labour Members not to keep knocking the Cabinet system. It has evolved over many centuries, and it works well. What are their criticisms of such a system, when it is set up properly? They are right to criticise the new clauses and amendments, because they do not go far enough. The Cabinet will not be accountable to the assembly.

Mr. Letwin: Does my hon. Friend agree that, despite the fact that hon. Members have started from different positions in respect of what they would prefer, it has been remarkable that, to all intents and purposes, there has been a cross-party tripartite agreement between almost all the Secretary of State's Back Benchers—with one notable exception—the leader of Plaid Cymru and the Conservative party, that, if the new clauses are to be accepted, there also need to be some checks? The one party that takes a different view is the Liberal Democrat party, which is left stranded on an island with the Secretary of State.

Mr. Paterson: The Liberal Democrats are basically giving management advice. They are concerned about transport systems and the railway. I agree with my hon. Friend that there is now virtual cross-party unanimity that the matter should be looked at again, possibly in another place. Of course, given the way that the Secretary of State has been behaving this week, perhaps he will bounce us with yet more amendments tomorrow. I do not think that the new clauses and amendments in this group will work. The right hon. Gentleman is on the right track, but, when he replies to the debate, I want him to give me a quick answer on how the mini-Cabinet will be accountable back to the assembly, and whether he has any further plans in this regard.

Ms Julie Morgan: I want to speak to amendment (d), in my name. Most of the points that I wanted to make have already been made. My main purpose in tabling the amendment was to draw attention to the dangers of concentrating too much power in the hands of one person, by allowing the First Secretary to appoint the Secretaries who will be members of the Executive Committee without reference to the rest of the assembly.

During the devolution campaign, we campaigned on open government and transparency in decision making. There is a danger that the public could perceive power to have shifted to a selected group chosen by the First Secretary, rather than being vested in the assembly. It is the system that operates in Westminster, but that system has built up over many centuries. It is not what we want slavishly to follow in the Welsh assembly. We are starting with a blank sheet, so we should have something unique to Wales, not something that apes another system.

I strongly believe that there should be as little patronage as possible, because we all know that patronage often leads to the abuse of patronage. We have seen that in the development of the quango state in Wales over the past 18 years. The power to hire and fire should not be uncontrolled. There must be constraints so that the Executive—the quasi-Cabinet—will not be dependent on and built around just one person. Allowing the assembly to endorse the Secretaries—the members of the Executive Committee—would ensure that a concentration of power would not be given to one person. He or she should not be allowed to choose those members. There may be a danger that too much power will be concentrated in the Executive, which may result in Back-Bench Members of the Assembly being dependent on the good will of the First Secretary and the Secretaries, which would be unsatisfactory.

It is important that the Committees are involved in policy making, and I welcome the discretion that the assembly is being given. We want as inclusive a system as possible. There is an issue surrounding Cabinet systems operating in secret. There should be as little divide as possible between the Secretaries and the Members. Only 60 Members make a small group to operate a Cabinet system.

It is important how the system will appear to the outside world. We are trying to develop a new model, and having a partnership council with local government, business and the voluntary sector will help the assembly to be open and accountable. However, many voluntary organisations are uneasy about the delegation of considerable power to the Secretaries over the heads of the Committees. It is important that the Committees and the Secretaries work together in an effective way.

As has been said, it is possible that some members of the Executive may not be linked to the subject Committees. In that case, it is even more important that they are endorsed and accepted by the whole assembly. Obviously, the Assembly Secretaries will have some delegated authority, but accountability to their respective Committees should be built in. I welcome the fact that the assembly will be given the discretion to work that out.

There may be some suspicion about the move to a Cabinet system because, in some ways, that runs counter to the spirit of accountable democracy. Having a democratic layer, such as that suggested in my amendment, would be more in the spirit of the new politics that we hope to achieve in Wales.

7.15 pm

Mr. Evans: I am grateful for this opportunity to speak so soon after my last piece of spellbinding oratory at 6.15 this morning, when I had the Adjournment debate. One piece of advice that I will give the Secretary of State is that, if the assembly decides to have Adjournment debates, they should start the day, not end it. [Interruption.] It is another piece of constructive advice from the Conservative party. That is how we want to continue.

We welcome the Government new clauses. We were not trying to be destructive in our attempt to get more time to debate all the new clauses and amendments. However, we are not being given that opportunity, so we will try to improve the Bill as much as we can in the two days at our disposal, before it goes to the other place.

We feel that the Secretary of State has listened to us. [Interruption.] Perhaps only a little bit, but that is a start—late in the day though it may be. We are debating changes that we and other political parties have been seeking and on which the right hon. Gentleman's advisory group gave him guidance. There is a lot of popular support for the changes, although we have heard some reservations expressed in the Chamber today. The fact that there has been such unanimity across the parties is sufficient reason for us to question some of the consequences of the new clauses, which involve major changes.

Mr. Grieve: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point, but is it not a most depressing state of affairs? However suspicious we Conservatives may be of the whole proposal for Welsh devolution, at least it has been possible for us to share, albeit in a mild way and with some cynicism, the Utopianism of some of the proposals. Yet we are now being asked to consider amendments that will reverse all that and, in its place, we are being asked to accept something that will be far worse.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's remarks. The debate has shown that there will be a great deal of theorising about what will constitute the workings of the assembly. As the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) said earlier, the assembly will start to devise its own trappings and systems, for good or for ill. It will start to mirror Westminster or somewhere else—but I suspect Westminster.

I was reading in the business section of The Western Mail the view that one of the plagues of Westminster is the lobby system—yet a new lobbying group is being launched in Wales, led by Leighton Andrews and Andrew Davies, who are known to the Secretary of State. The newspaper quotes Leighton Andrews as saying:

"There are some good generalist PR companies in Wales but they neither have the contacts nor the experience of the new Welsh political situation to be able to advise on public affairs."

We are already seeing in Wales something that many people in Westminster deride. They think that the lobby groups have too much power. A group is starting up in Wales before the first brick of the assembly is laid.

Mr. Denzil Davies: It will be more worth while to lobby the Welsh assembly, because the people being lobbied will have money to distribute.

Mr. Evans: I am sure that that has not been lost on Leighton Andrews and Andrew Davies. I suspect that it is one of the reasons why they have not only set themselves up but managed to secure positive coverage on the front page of the Western Mail business section.

We asked about the financial aspects of the changes, and I rather regretted the fact that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) said that it did not really matter whether the figure was a couple of per cent. below or a couple of per cent. above. We are talking large sums of money, and we want to seek good value for the people of Wales in the setting up of the assembly, as well as in its running costs, to ensure that money is not being diverted away from front-line services and lost in bureaucracy. We want to get all that as right as we can.

I know that the Secretary of State will want to answer some of the questions asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) about how the new Cabinet-style system will work. The analogy with a barking duck or a quacking dog was used, and we should like to know exactly what the system will be like, although we acknowledge the fact that it will evolve.

My hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) mentioned a Whip system. I am sure that, although that is not on the face of the Bill, such a system will come about, and that persuasion and patronage will be exercised by the Whips.

We have tabled several amendments about the number of Assembly Secretaries. As the assembly will consist of only 60 Members, we think that eight Secretaries is the right number. With the First Secretary, that will mean that, with 60 Members, there will be nine Secretaries altogether. I hope that the Secretary of State will look favourably on that idea, although we accept that the assembly will be able to make changes if a two-thirds majority can be secured.

Before I finish, I must ask the Secretary of State one or two questions. One is about the relationship between the First Secretary, the Assembly Secretaries and the assembly itself. Will the right hon. Gentleman say more about that, and also about the relationship between those three and the Secretary of State—unless, of course, the Secretary of State and the First Secretary will be the same person.

The right hon. Gentleman need not worry; I shall not ask whether he will stand for the assembly. I understand that, after the way in which he performed over the siting of the assembly, he has not made up his mind.

Mr. Leigh: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Evans: No, I cannot, because I must bring my speech to an end.

[Mr. Evans]

Will the Secretary of State say something about our amendments on the relationships involving the Select Committees, and tell us whether we can go down the route suggested? I have served on three Select Committees since becoming a Member of Parliament, and they are powerful bodies. We want to ensure that the parallel organisations in Wales grow up, serve the assembly well and become a powerful influence for good.

Will the Secretary of State accept the fact that our suggestions, both now and in the past, have been right for the assembly, but also that there are great reservations about the changes that he has made? We want to be clear about what will happen when the assembly adopts the changes—although we know that they may not represent the final format, and that the assembly may want to make its own improvements.

The Secretary of State has started to listen, and he still has another day and a half to accept some of our amendments.

Mr. Ron Davies: If I had to listen to many more speeches like that, I could be persuaded not to spend my time listening. However, I welcome the strong support that has been shown for our proposals by the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) and by the Plaid Cymru and Liberal Democrat spokesmen.

I shall make clear at the outset a point that I tried to develop in the opening part of the debate: we are not talking about a choice between either a local government system or a Cabinet system, but about a new political institution that must be built by drawing the best from both local government and central Government practices. We shall have the best of a Cabinet system and a Westminster system, as well as the best of a local government system.

I believe that the new political institution that we are creating will be able to establish the principles of inclusivity and collective decision making, while maintaining clear lines of accountability and effective decision making. That is what we are trying to achieve, and I have no doubt that our amendments will achieve it.

Many separate and sometimes conflicting amendments have been tabled, and I shall try to deal with as many as I can during the limited time left to me. Three separate sets of amendments were tabled to new clause 20. Amendment (c) would make the First Secretary's appointments of individual Assembly Secretaries subject to the approval of the subject Committees of which they will become members.

Amendment (d) would make each appointment of an Assembly Secretary subject to ratification by the assembly as a whole. Amendments (a) and (b) would remove the ability of the First Secretary to appoint a limited number of non-portfolio members of the Executive Committee, and require him or her to appoint a financial secretary and a business manager. They would also place on the face of the Bill a limit of eight on the maximum number of Assembly Secretaries whom the First Secretary could appoint.

I understand the motivation behind amendments (c) and (d). I am not, however, persuaded to accept them. The concern is that, under the Government's amendments, there would be excessive powers of patronage for the First Secretary in respect of appointments to the Executive Committee. However, I remind the House, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), that the First Secretary's power is not unconstrained. The assembly elects the First Secretary, and it will always be open to it to replace the First Secretary with another appointee if it is clear that the First Secretary's proposed appointments or other actions are inappropriate.

Amendment (c) may reveal a concern that it will not be easy for a subject Committee to work with a particular individual who has been appointed as the Assembly Secretary for that policy area. I understand that argument, but I do not accept it. It will be incumbent on the First Secretary to make appointments which will command general respect in the assembly, and it will be incumbent on those appointed to work with their subject committees in a constructive and positive way. That will form an important part of the accountability pressures to which they will be subject. That point was raised by the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley).

Clearly, if an individual Assembly Secretary's working relationship with his or her subject committee breaks down, that would be likely to constitute good grounds for replacing that Secretary with someone more capable of establishing a proper partnership with the Committee. The precise nature of the relationship between the Assembly Secretary and the subject Committee will have to develop as the assembly is elected and its internal procedures develop.

The Government are not persuaded that it would be sensible to accept amendments (a) and (b). In fact, we are surprised at the proposal that the First Secretary should be put under a legal duty to make two specific appointments, of a financial secretary and a business manager, when those roles are not defined, which makes the amendments defective. I accept that there may be a case for such appointments—but it is hardly consistent with the concept of a Cabinet system that the First Secretary's choice of offices to be filled should be constrained in that way as a matter of law. We are not persuaded by that idea.

The amendments tabled to new clauses 21 and 22 are concerned with the names of the Executive Committee and the subject Committees. As far as nomenclature is concerned, it will already be possible under the Government's proposals for the assembly to designate the Executive Committee as the assembly Cabinet, and call the subject Committees Select Committees, if it wishes to do so; those names can appear in Standing Orders. The more important point, however, is what the Committees will do and how they will operate, which I have already dealt with in introducing new clauses 20 to 24.

New clause 24 makes provision for the delegation of functions to the assembly's staff. It therefore extends to the assembly the application of the Carltona principle, in accordance with which it is legally permissible for a duly authorised civil servant in a central Government Department to act on behalf of his or her Minister in the performance of statutory functions. Decisions made by planning inspectors provide one example of functions being performed by officials on behalf of Ministers; another example is the confirmation of byelaws.

Amendments (a) to (h) to new clause 24 would prevent the assembly from delegating any "functions" to staff, but would limit delegation to "administrative duties"—a point that was made by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik).

Mr. Rowlands: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davies: I have too many points to reply to.

The Government believe that the assembly should be able to take advantage of the Carltona principle if it wishes, and new clause 24 as drafted permits that. The clause is purely facilitative—there is no requirement to delegate any function to staff—and its main purpose is to ensure that, if such delegation does take place, it is done in a manner compatible with the permanent secretary's overall responsibilities for the management of the staff.

New clause 25 proposes three categories of assembly staff—parliamentary staff, political staff and executive staff. All, it appears, would be civil servants. New clause 29 would require the Minister responsible for the civil service to consult the assembly on codes of practice and procedure applicable to assembly staff who are civil servants. Amendments Nos. 231 to 233 envisage the appointment of not more than 10 assembly officers, whose functions are not described in the amendments but who certainly would not be civil servants.

Finally, new clauses 32 and 33 and new schedule 1 envisage the creation of a Welsh Assembly Corporate Body with the powers to hold property, employ staff and enter into contracts. To make room for that, the assembly would be deprived by amendment No. 250 of its Corporate Body status and its legal status allowed to float in the void. Therefore, that makes the amendment unacceptable.

The amendments and new clauses have a common theme—the position of the assembly staff. Under the Bill, they are to be civil servants. That follows logically from the executive character of the assembly and the fact that it will perform its functions on behalf of the Crown.

The position of assembly staff, and the support which will be provided for Assembly Members, is being considered by my assembly advisory group. The statutory assembly's staff will be civil servants, operating to the highest standards of honesty, integrity and political impartiality which apply throughout the United Kingdom. They will have to be organised to support Assembly Members in the carrying out of their various and different roles. Most of the staff will work in support of the Assembly Secretaries—

It being half-past Seven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

New clause 21

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

'.—(1) There shall be a committee of the Assembly whose members shall be—

(a) the Assembly First Secretary, who shall chair it, and

(b) the Assembly Secretaries.

(2) The committee shall be known by such title as the standing orders may provide (but is referred to in this Act as the executive committee).

(3) The Assembly First Secretary shall allocate accountability in the fields in which the Assembly has functions to members of the executive committee so that, in the case of each of those fields, accountability in the field is allocated either to one of the Assembly Secretaries or to him.

(4) The Assembly First Secretary need not make an allocation under subsection (3) to every member of the executive committee; but the number of Assembly Secretaries to whom no such allocation is made shall not exceed such number as may be specified in, or determined in accordance with, the standing orders.

(5) For the purposes of this section and section (Subject committees) "accountability", in relation to a member of the executive committee and a field, means that he is the member of the executive committee accountable to the Assembly (in accordance with standing orders under subsection (7)) for the exercise of the Assembly's functions in that field, except the exercise of functions by the executive committee (or by the Assembly itself).

(6) The Assembly First Secretary is accountable to the Assembly (in accordance with standing orders under subsection (7)) for the exercise of functions by the executive committee.

(7) The standing orders must include provision for allowing Assembly members to question (orally or in writing, as Assembly members prefer)—

(a) each member of the executive committee about the exercise of the Assembly's functions in the field or fields in which he is accountable, except the exercise of functions by the executive committee (or by the Assembly itself), and

(b) the Assembly First Secretary about the exercise of functions by the executive committee.

(8) In this section—

(a) references to the exercise of functions by the executive committee include the exercise of functions by a sub-committee of that committee or by members of the Assembly's staff in pursuance of a delegation to the Assembly's staff by either that committee or such a sub-committee, and

(b) references to the exercise of functions by the Assembly itself include the exercise of functions by members of the Assembly's staff in pursuance of a delegation to the Assembly's staff by the Assembly itself.'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 22

SUBJECT COMMITTEES

'.—(1) The Assembly shall establish committees with responsibilities in the fields in which the Assembly has functions.

(2) The committees established under this section shall be known by such titles as the standing orders may provide (but are referred to in this Act as subject committees).

(3) There shall be the same number of—

(a) subject committees, and

(b) members of the executive committee to whom the Assembly First Secretary allocates accountability in any of the fields in which the Assembly has functions.

(4) The division between the subject committees of the fields in which those committees have responsibilities and the division between members of the executive committee of the fields in which accountability is allocated to members of that committee shall be the same; and the member of the executive committee who has accountability in the field or fields in which a subject committee has responsibilities shall be a member of that subject committee.

(5) The Assembly shall elect a number of Assembly members to be a panel from which the members who are to chair the subject committees are to be selected; and the members of the panel shall be elected so as to secure that, as far as is practicable, the balance of the parties in the Assembly is reflected in the membership of the panel.

(6) The number of members of the panel at any time shall be equal to the number of subject committees at that time; and each member of the panel shall be selected to chair one (but not more than one) subject committee.

(7) A subject committee shall have such number of members (in addition to the person who is a member of the committee by virtue of subsection (4) and the member who chairs it) as the standing orders may provide.

(8) Those other members shall be elected by the Assembly from among the Assembly members so as to secure that, as far as is practicable, the balance of the parties in the Assembly is reflected in the membership of the committee (including the person who is a member by virtue of subsection (4) and the member who chairs it).'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 23

DELEGATION OF FUNCTIONS

'.—(1) The Assembly may delegate functions of the Assembly (to such extent as the Assembly may determine) to—

(a) any committee of the Assembly, or

(b) the Assembly First Secretary.

(2) Any committee of the Assembly, apart from the Audit Committee, may delegate functions of the committee (to such extent as the committee may determine) to a sub-committee of the committee.

(3) In addition—

(a) the executive committee may delegate functions of the executive committee (to such extent as the executive committee may determine) to the Assembly First Secretary or an Assembly Secretary, and

(b) a subject committee may delegate functions of the subject committee (to such extent as the subject committee may determine) to the member of the executive committee who is a member of the subject committee by virtue of section (Subject committees)(4).

(4) A sub-committee of the executive committee may delegate functions of the sub-committee (to such extent as the sub-committee may determine) to the Assembly First Secretary or an Assembly Secretary; and a sub-committee of a subject committee may delegate functions of the sub-committee (to such extent as the sub-committee may determine) to the member of the executive committee who is a member of the subject committee by virtue of section (Subject committees)(4).

(5) The Assembly First Secretary may delegate functions of his (to such extent as he may determine) to an Assembly Secretary.

(6) In delegating a function under any provision of this section the Assembly, a committee of the Assembly or a sub-committee of such a committee may limit or prohibit its further delegation under this section or section (Exercise of functions by Assembly staff) (or both).

(7) Where a function has been delegated to the Assembly, this section applies to the function subject to the terms of the delegation to the Assembly.

(8) The delegation of a function under this section shall not prevent the exercise of the function by the body or person by whom the delegation is made.'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 24

EXERCISE OF FUNCTIONS BY ASSEMBLY STAFF

'.—(1) Each of the following—

(a) the Assembly,

(b) any committee of the Assembly, apart from the Audit Committee,

(c) any sub-committee of a committee of the Assembly,

(d) the Assembly First Secretary, and

(e) any Assembly Secretary,

may delegate functions to the Assembly's staff.

(2) Where a function is delegated to the Assembly's staff it is for the Permanent Secretary to the Assembly to make arrangements as to which member of members of the Assembly's staff is or are to exercise the function; and in this subsection "the Permanent Secretary to the Assembly" means the person appointed in accordance with section 35(1) and (3) to be the head of the Assembly's staff (whether or not that person is known by the title of Permanent Secretary to the Assembly).

(3) Where a function has been delegated to the Assembly, this section applies to the function subject to the terms of the delegation to the Assembly.

(4) The delegation of a function under this section shall not prevent the exercise of the function by the body or person by whom the delegation is made.'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 16

STATUS OF WELSH PUBLIC RECORDS

'.—(1) Welsh public records shall not be public records for the purposes of the Public Records Act 1958.

(2) But that Act shall have effect in relation to Welsh public records (as if they were public records for the purposes of that Act) until an order under section (Transfer of responsibility) imposes a duty to preserve them on the Assembly (or a member of the Assembly's staff); and this subsection applies to Welsh public records whether or not, apart from subsection (1), they would be public records for those purposes.'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ron Davies: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government new clause 17—Transfer of responsibility.

Government new clause 18—Meaning of "Welsh public records".

Government Amendments Nos. 113 to 115, 118 and 99 to 102.

Mr. Davies: We said on Second Reading that we would bring forward amendments to make new provision for Welsh public records. I am pleased to present the new clauses and amendments now, and the House will wish me to explain their effect in a little detail.

There are three new clauses and a number of consequential amendments. The broad effect of the new clauses is as follows. First, we propose that there should be created a new category of Welsh public records. As the House may know, there is no separate record office for Wales at present and most public records relating to Wales are held in the Public Record Office at Kew. That is very different from the position in Scotland and Northern Ireland, where national record offices hold records relating to those countries.

The proposal, therefore, is that, simultaneously with the establishment of the assembly, a new category of Welsh public record will be created and, in the fulness of time, responsibility for them will be transferred by order to the assembly.

I shall explain what records will fall within the new category—they are set out in new clause 18. The first will be those of the assembly itself. The Public Record Office does not, as a matter of principle, hold records of any elected bodies. It follows that, without the provision that we are making, there would not be proper provision for the assembly's records.

The second category will be records of the Welsh Office. That is particularly appropriate because the Department's records have now to become available under the 30-year rule.

Third will be the records of other bodies with responsibilities in Wales in areas in which the assembly has responsibilities—health bodies, a number of listed public bodies and the records of bodies that may, at a later date, be made subject to the new provisions by order.

The idea is to be able to extend, where that is considered appropriate, the category of Welsh public records to a wider range of non-departmental public bodies than the 1958 Act currently applies to, but that power would not be exercisable without the assembly formally resolving to request the Lord Chancellor to do so. In such circumstances, the assembly would want, first, to consult the affected bodies.

The new category of Welsh public records will have no operational significance unless and until my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, who has departmental responsibility for public records, makes a transfer of responsibility order under new clause 17.

The effect of such an order, which can be made only after consultation with the assembly, would be to transfer to the assembly responsibility for the preservation of Welsh public records covered by the order and responsibility for making them available for public inspection.

Mr. Rowlands: I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's excellent decision. I have perhaps spent too much of my time at the Public Record Office at Kew searching among Welsh Office or Welsh documents of one kind or another, and the new clause will give students and research assistants much better access than was possible at Kew, with the additional cost that spending time there entailed.

The BD category at Kew applies to Welsh documents, some of which go back to 1945–46, with the old Board of Trade documents. Will they also be available for transfer, as opposed to those post-1964? They are extremely valuable and many reflect the evolution of Welsh administrative life before the establishment of the Welsh Office. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that.

Mr. Davies: As always I am grateful for my hon. Friend's vigorous and wholehearted support. I am only sorry that during the previous debate, when he expressed full and vigorous support for Government policy, we had to change the policy. On this occasion, I assure him that his support is welcome and it will ensure that my determination to proceed with the proposal as it stands is set even deeper in concrete. I hope to be able to give my hon. Friend a specific answer by the usual method before the end of the debate. If I cannot do that, I shall write to him. It may well be that the answer is yes. I am having some difficulty with the calligraphy.

A transfer of responsibility order will also contain provisions based on the Public Records Act 1958 on requirements for preservation, so there is no question that a lower standard of preservation of the records will follow from the making of such an order. Furthermore, such an order will designate a place within Wales to which Welsh public records may be transferred from the Public Record Office. No decision has yet been made about where that should be, and there will be no need to reach such a decision for some time yet. In due course, a study will be undertaken of the options. If my hon. Friend has any suggestions to make in that regard, I shall listen carefully.

Mr. Rowlands: I understand that at the moment most Welsh Office records are in the Embankment building—an old munitions building that is the least advisable building for such a purpose. I hope that my right hon. Friend does not go out to massive tendering of the kind that we had for the new assembly, and that we have a public record office in which Welsh records will fit.

Mr. Davies: I am sure that we shall have an opportunity to discuss the matter further, and I shall listen carefully to my hon. Friend's observations.

We have also had to amend clause 148 to ensure that it covers a transfer of responsibility order made by the Lord Chancellor, who is not a Secretary of State. That is the reasoning behind amendment No. 99.

I should make clear that all the clauses simply facilitate a process of, in effect, establishing a location in Wales for the preservation and public inspection of records relating to Wales. They do not require that to happen. The assembly will clearly need from the outset to preserve its records in accordance with the 1958 Act, but there is no reason necessarily to suppose that an early transfer of responsibility order will be made.

Mr. Grieve: I support the idea of Welsh records going to Wales, but how far back will they go? There will come a point when extricating English and Welsh records will be difficult. We might have to wait for a more detailed presentation, but there might be objections if certain hybrid records were transferred.

Mr. Davies: The matter can obviously be sensitive. The hon. Gentleman's point is fair and will be taken into consideration when we consider the nature of the records that will be held in Wales.

The new clauses will facilitate the provision of a record office rather than require it. The assembly will have to consider the options and the costs, in consultation with the Public Record Office and the Lord Chancellor, to see whether and when the powers should be exercised. Nevertheless, the new clauses represent a major step forward in identifying a discrete category of records specifically relating to Welsh public administration. They hold out the prospect of such records being held and made available for public inspection in Wales.

[Mr. Davies]

Mr. Rowlands: I shall be brief. I intervened a couple of times in my right hon. Friend's speech because I feared that there would not be enough time for me to speak.

I should like to underline my support for and appreciation of the proposals. It may not have been the easiest of battles to obtain the powers in the new clauses. The Public Record Office is a jealous guardian of its powers and responsibilities and I imagine that the Lord Chancellor's Office is, too. If there has been a bit of an argument, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on winning it. It is a significant one.

Welsh historical research has suffered considerably from the fact that records are held at Kew. It is an expensive business for a 22 or 23-year-old to come up to Kew and spend time at the Public Record Office to work through the available documents. Photocopying costs are enormous. I have the great fortune that I am here and can sneak out for an hour or two to do my research. A great deal of important research into Welsh public administration during the past 40 or 50 years has been made more difficult by the location of records at Kew.

I hope that the Lord Chancellor's office will take the most generous attitude to the matter. I understand the sensitivities that have been mentioned, but there are discrete categories of documents such as the BD documents. The BD documents do not belong to the Welsh Office because they belonged to the regional division of the Board of Trade after 1945, but that was the time of the birth of a distinctive Welsh administration. It was born out of the war. The records from the Board of Trade, the Ministry of Production and various Departments that survived the war and led to the regeneration of communities such as mine ought to come home.

I do not want to over-egg the matter, but the documents are the equivalent of our Elgin marbles. I welcome them home and I hope that they will find a fitting and proper home. I hope that, unlike what has happened on other aspects of our debates, we do not have a quarrel or squabble about where and in what way we shall have our records at home. I thank my right hon. Friend for winning whatever battle he has won to achieve this result.

Mr. Grieve: I endorse everything that the hon. Gentleman for Mertyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has said. The categories of documents about which he is concerned cause me no concern at all. I stand to be corrected by the Secretary of State, but it seems to me that the powers could extend to documents from many years before those to which the hon. Gentleman referred—from a time when Wales had not become a separate administrative unit. People studying that time rather than Wales's development as a separate administrative unit might wish to study those documents. That would cause problems, but if I understand correctly what the Secretary of State said, that is not the category of document about which he is concerned. I understand that it is not the sort of document about which the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) is concerned, either. I simply raise a flag to say that we will come to a point at which we will come across sensitive documents.

Mr. Rowlands: I do not think that we should concede what the hon. Gentleman says. If documents from before 1536 and the Act of Union—I am not a mediaeval historian, so I do not know what the records look like—are available, why should they not be moved to Wales, except for the reason that we get into the amazing world of preservation? Let us concentrate on more recent documents that would be helpful in developing our contemporary Welsh history.

Mr. Grieve: On that, the hon. Gentleman and I can agree. I should only say that if we go back to the council of the marches we are dealing with matters that pertain to both sides of the border. I imagine that it is likely that there will be some objection from people dealing with records relating to Shropshire and Herefordshire if the documents are moved to a new depot in Wales. These are matters of some sensitivity, but I am prepared to accept that we should not labour them too much. I simply register the point that we have a common history and splitting archives is a complex matter.

It being a quarter to Eight o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

New clause 17

TRANSFER OF RESPONSIBILITY

'.—(1) The Lord Chancellor may by order make provision—

(a) imposing or conferring on the Assembly (or a member of the Assembly's staff) functions relating to Welsh public records (including, in particular, functions of preserving them and of making them available for inspection by the public), and

(b) imposing on persons responsible for Welsh public records duties relating to the selection of such records for permanent preservation, the safe-keeping of such records and their transfer to a place specified in, or appointed under, the order.

(2) An order under this section may (in particular)—

(a) make in relation to Welsh public records provision analogous to that made by the Public Records Act 1958 in relation to records which are public records for the purposes of that Act, and

(b) contain any appropriate consequential, incidental, supplementary or transitional provisions or savings (including provisions in the form of amendments or repeals of enactments).

(3) An order under this section—

(a) may make provision in relation to all Welsh public records or any description of Welsh public records (or all Welsh public records apart from those of a particular description), and

(b) may make different provision in relation to different descriptions of Welsh public records.

(4) An order under this section which imposes on the Assembly (or a member of the Assembly's staff) a duty to preserve Welsh public records, or Welsh public records of any description, must include provision for the Lord Chancellor to make such arrangements as appear appropriate for the transfer of Welsh public records, or Welsh public records of that description, which are in—

(a) the Public Record Office, or

(b) a place of deposit appointed under the Public Records Act 1958, to a place specified in, or appointed under, the order.

(5) No order shall be made under this section unless the Lord Chancellor has consulted the Assembly.'.—[Mr. Dowd.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 18

MEANING OF "WELSH PUBLIC RECORDS"

'.—(1) The following are Welsh public records—

(a) records of the Assembly,

(b) administrative and departmental records of the Auditor General for Wales,

(c) administrative and departmental records belonging to Her Majesty which are records of or held in any government department which is wholly or mainly concerned with Welsh affairs,

(d) administrative and departmental records belonging to Her Majesty which are records of any office, commission or other body or establishment under Her Majesty's Government which is wholly or mainly concerned with Welsh affairs in a field or fields in which the Assembly has functions,

(e) administrative and departmental records of the bodies and establishments specified in subsection (2) (but not records of health service hospitals in Wales which are of the descriptions excepted from being public records for the purposes of the Public Records Act 1958 in the case of health service hospitals in England), and

(f) any other description of records (other than records of any court or tribunal or held in any department of the Supreme Court) which is specified by order made by the Lord Chancellor.

(2) The bodies and establishments referred to in subsection (1)(e) are—

(a) the Countryside Council for Wales,

(b) the Curriculum and Assessment Authority for Wales,

(c) Family Practitioner Committees for localities in Wales,

(d) the Further Education Funding Council for Wales,

(e) the General Teaching Council for Wales,

(f) health service hospitals, within the meaning of the National Health Service Act 1977, in Wales,

(g) the Higher Education Funding Council for Wales,

(h) the Local Government Boundary Commission for Wales,

(i) National Health Service Authorities for districts or localities in Wales, or for areas in or consisting of Wales, including National Health Service trusts all of whose hospitals, establishments and facilities are situated in Wales,

(j) the Qualifications, Curriculum and Assessment Authority for Wales, and

(k) the Welsh Board of Health.

(3) An order under subsection (1)(f) may be made in relation to a description of records—

(a) which (immediately before the order is made) are public records for the purposes of the Public Records Act 1958, or

(b) which (at that time) are not public records for those purposes.

(4) No order under subsection (1)(f) may be made in relation to records within subsection (3)(a) unless the Lord Chancellor has consulted the Assembly; and no such order may be made in relation to records within subsection (3)(b) unless the Assembly has resolved that the Lord Chancellor be requested to make the order.

(5) In this section "records" includes not only written records but records conveying information by any other means whatsoever.'.—[Mr. Dowd.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 19

CONSULTATION WITH BUSINESS

'. The Assembly shall carry out such consultation with representatives of business as it considers appropriate having regard to the impact of the exercise by the Assembly of its functions on the interests of business.'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ron Davies: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 204, in clause 64, page 31, line 33, leave out from 'consultation' to 'is' in line 34.

Mr. Davies: This new clause discharges the undertaking that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) on 2 March, when we debated her amendment about a scheme to sustain and promote business in Wales.

It is right that the Bill should require consultation between representatives of business and the assembly, but it should do so in a flexible way. Business will be affected by many aspects of the assembly's work, so a scheme or more rigid form of consultation would not have been practical or desirable in our view. The new clause leaves it to the assembly to judge which representatives of business it is appropriate to consult, the frequency of consultation and the matters about which there should be consultation.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): I have no objection to the assembly consulting business. We have to extend the process of consultation to every aspect of our lives. What worries me is that the assembly should consult not only the shareholders but people on the shop floor or on building sites who are not generally regarded as part of the business community. I should have liked the new clause to refer to the need to consult not only business but the trade unions—the very organisations that gave birth to the Labour party that allowed the Minister to be in the privileged position that he is in today. If the trade unions are not consulted, the assembly will be consulting some business people such as the firm in my community—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has gone over the score.

Mr. Davies: I welcome my hon. Friend's unequivocal support for the Government's position. He will know that, in keeping with best modern European practice, the term "business" is used to describe both sides of business. To give him the assurance he seeks, the expectation is that the assembly will be required to consult both employers and the trade union movement. I was going to come to that very point, but now that my hon. Friend has raised it with me, I can delete it from my introductory remarks.

[Mr. Davies]

Another important flexibility is that the assembly would be able to consult business representatives not only about the prospective exercise of functions but about measures that have already been adopted by the assembly and which have had an impact on business interests. For example, having operated a particular policy for a time, the assembly could choose to review with business or trade union representatives what effect it had had, and consult them on possible changes to the policy.

I welcome the support that the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) and his colleagues have given to the Government's proposal by putting their names to new clause 19.

Amendment No. 204 would remove the explicit reference in clause 64 to consultation with representatives of business about regulatory appraisals. The Government cannot accept the amendment. If its purpose is to prevent consultation with representatives of business under clause 64, it will fail. The clause would still require the subordinate legislation procedures to include provision for "appropriate consultation", and the standing orders could include consultation with representatives of business as part of that.

If the amendment's purpose is to make the point that there is no need to include a specific reference to consultation with representatives of business in clause 64, given the general nature of the duty in new clause 19, I have to disagree with the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley).

The specific requirement for the subordinate legislation procedures to include provision for consultation with business representatives is not limited by the general duty in the new clause. We want it to be clear that the assembly cannot avoid consulting business representatives about regulatory appraisals under clause 64 by carrying out more general consultation under new clause 19.

I am sure that new clause 19 will be warmly welcomed by business in Wales as proof of our commitment to a positive partnership between the assembly and the business sector. I ask the House to agree that the new clause be added to the Bill.

Mr. Jenkin: I had hoped for a grudging acknowledgement of our contribution to the new clause—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State acknowledged a contribution from a Labour Member, but I seem to remember that we had a constructive debate about appliance cost assessments and the need for the Welsh assembly to produce them when legislating.

There were exchanges in Committee about whether it was necessary to include in the Bill a requirement for compliance cost assessments. The Minister replying at the time said that legislation always provided for them, so it was not necessary to mention them specifically in the Bill. However, plenty of legislation does not provide for them because they were not in vogue when that particular legislation was passed, although a reference to them would have been a useful addition. To some extent, consultation with business is a mild substitute for the requirement to carry out compliance cost assessments.

Mr. Ron Davies: I am sorry if I inadvertently offended the hon. Gentleman—had I done it deliberately, it would have been another matter. I mentioned my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) because it was her amendment that gave rise to the debate, but I fully acknowledge the support that came from all parts of the Chamber, including from those on the Opposition Front Bench, when we debated the matter.

Mr. Jenkin: It was extremely gracious of the Secretary of State to acknowledge that. Having said that, I shall now sour the atmosphere again with a few acidic remarks.

The problem with a new clause of this nature is that it is so general that, as we saw from the Secretary of State's exchanges with the hon. Member for Llanelli, it could be interpreted so widely.

Mr. Llew Smith: Blaenau Gwent.

Mr. Jenkin: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ron Davies: You had better apologise to my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies).

Mr. Jenkin: I am in a hole, but I shall not dig any deeper.

The Secretary of State serenaded the new clause and said that it was not "rigid", but that leaves a bit to be desired. Not only does it not specify the business representatives who should be consulted—every quarter of the House will have its own ideas about who those representatives should be, thus rendering the new clause almost meaningless—but the Secretary of State compounded the error by going on to talk about "both sides of business". In fact, the modern idea is that we do not divide business into sides. Employers and shareholders should be treated as a single unit, working harmoniously and co-operatively together for the benefit of the business, its customers and the community as a whole.

However, it would be churlish of us not to welcome the new clause. As I said, it is not a proper substitute for compliance cost assessments, which is what business really wants. Business wants a clear explanation of the costs and benefits of particular legislation and how it will impact on its affairs in particular, and on business in general.

It is too easy for legislators—we are setting up another body of legislators—to have good ideas which can prove hugely costly to the people on the ground who have to implement them. We are already living in an over-regulated society, and I fear that new clause 19 will not protect business from the tendency of legislators to over-regulate.

As for amendment No. 204 tabled by Plaid Cymru, I am at a loss to know why that party wishes to delete any obligation to consult businesses on the particular issue of subordinate legislation, because it seems that that is the very point at which an input from business should be most valuable. After all, it is business that ultimately generates the wealth that will pay the taxes that will fund the activities of the Welsh assembly. If the assembly cannot even curtsey in the direction of business when it is legislating, there ain't much hope for the way the assembly is going to function for the benefit of Wales.

One would hope that such invocations would not be necessary if the assembly were doing its job properly. I wonder whether the new clause is really an expression of faith in the assembly, or an anticipation by the Secretary of State of the assembly's shortcomings.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): I am grateful to the Secretary of State and to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) for telling the House the purpose of amendment No. 204 before we had even spoken to it. I can now deal with their opposition to it, instead of putting my positive arguments.

Let me make it clear at the outset that it is not our intention specifically to remove the assembly's obligation to consult business. It is a probing amendment. Under clause 64, there is an obligation on the assembly to consult business but no one else. It refers to "appropriate consultation" being carried out, but what does that mean? Consultation with whom, and with what sorts of organisations? The only clarity in the clause is that business must be consulted; there is no obligation to consult anyone else.

The amendment aims to probe what sort of organisations it is expected that the assembly will consult. For example, will it consult voluntary organisations?

If the assembly is considering subordinate legislation that affects nursery education, would it have to consult, let us say, Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin—the Pre-school Playgroups Association Wales—or not? One might read the Bill and say it might do so, "if appropriate", but the assembly might consider it not appropriate to do so. However, even on nursery education, it would have to consult business.

With the amendment, we are seeking clarity. Unfortunately, the Bill as it stands provides clarity in respect of one particular section of society, but not others. That is not to say, as the Secretary of State has stressed, that business would not be consulted; but we want to know what other organisations should be consulted. The danger in legislation is always that, if we begin to list, we either list the lot or we list nobody. That is why we tabled the amendment.

8 pm

The hon. Member for North Essex knows perfectly well that we support new clause 19 as drafted. I put it on record that there is no question of Plaid Cymru saying that business should not be consulted. However, let me make a point that even the hon. Gentleman did not make.

The Secretary of State has said that business in the modern sense includes both business organisations in the traditional sense and trade unions. We welcome that assurance, but I hope that business in Wales does not simply mean the CBI, either. We want an assurance that business in that sense means business in the widest sense.

The vast majority of employers in my constituency are self-employed people who run small businesses, and it has been announced in the past few weeks that an organisation that represents such businesses—the Federation of Small Businesses—is, in preparation for the setting up of the assembly, establishing a Welsh organisation; it is to be congratulated on that creditable action. Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that there will be an obligation under the terms of the new clause for the assembly to consult the Federation of Small Businesses?

Mr. Llew Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already stated that he is willing to include trade unions in his definition of business, but let us assume that the assembly takes some initiative in relation to the environment, and that it decides that it is necessary to consult business. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the assembly should also be under an obligation to consult the local community, who may be affected by business or believe that their area has been polluted by business? They may feel that they have no voice if their role is not specified in the legislation.

Mr. Jones: I must confess that I strongly agree with those sentiments. The assembly should consult to the widest possible extent—hon. Members on both sides of the House would agree on that point. We are asking the Secretary of State, in a probing way, to give an assurance that, through clauses 64 and new clause 19, there will be an obligation on the assembly to consult. If he gives that assurance, we will be satisfied; otherwise, the questions marks will remain.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Perhaps to his surprise, I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) says. I welcome the new clause as far as it goes, although I was surprised to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State overturn 500 years of case law by suggesting that "business" included trade unions. I do not know whether the Lord Chancellor will want to have a word with him tomorrow about that legal interpretation, but we shall leave that point for now. I understand business to mean business, but there is nothing wrong with the new clause for that.

We tend to be rather romantic about the Welsh assembly, so by all means let us consult business. Business is important, because the main challenge facing the assembly will be to try to raise the level of gross domestic product in Wales, which has fallen dangerously low, especially in the western part of Wales, both north-west and south-west. Perhaps the challenge will not be to raise, but merely to sustain, the abysmally low level of GDP, given the pressures that may be exerted on the Welsh economy over the next few years.

However, the assembly is not about business—it is about doling out money. The assembly is about spending £7 billion, almost all of which will not go to business or anywhere near it. About £200 million gross will be the budget of the new-style Welsh Development Agency, but the net figure will probably be less, because the agency will have to find some of its budget from its internal organisation. Therefore, we are not talking about large sums of money.

The assembly is there to distribute money for social purposes, which has to be done—we need a health service and education—so the larger part of the work of the assembly will not be about business. The new clause is welcome for that reason, because it can make it clear to the assembly that business exists, and that business is as important as handing out money. What worries me is that the whole orientation of the Bill is not in that direction.

[Mr. Denzil Davies]

One of the clauses not debated—clause 112, which has already been mentioned—deals with voluntary organisations in Wales and enables the assembly to set up a scheme to assist voluntary organisations. Such organisations are defined extremely strangely as organisations that do not have to make a profit, but exist to "benefit the whole or any part of Wales".

I cannot think of any definition wider, more diffuse or more dangerous in some ways than that. The whole thrust of the legislation is that money is to be spent on non-business matters and on organisations that will not create wealth. Trade unions and employees are part of the wealth-creating process.

I rose to speak in this debate because a constituent who has a master's in business administration wrote to me enclosing the Labour party's person specification for candidates for the assembly. I am sure that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik) will jump, because understands the magical language that includes such phrases. The person specification I was sent seeks, rightly, "Labour party experience". In another phrase that the hon. Gentleman will recognise, it also seeks "life experiences".

Mr. Öpik: Before the right hon. Gentleman proceeds, let me categorically state that I have not been moonlighting on behalf of the Labour party in any management consultancy context in respect of its selection procedures.

Mr. Davies: From what I know of management consultants, that is a great relief.

The person specification calls for "Other life experience". I am not quite sure how one is to read those words—whether the experience desired is of the other life or of another life outside the Labour party, although I suspect it is the latter. I am concerned because, during the referendum campaign, great emphasis was placed, quite rightly, on the fact that the assembly would be an assembly for business as well as for the rather old-fashioned councillors from south Wales; but when I read the person specification's suggestions of what constitutes other life experience, I saw no mention of business at all.

We note that

"Family and other caring responsibilities" are considered to be other life experience for the purposes of sitting in the Welsh assembly. I suppose one could consider "work/professional" to mean business, but the suggestions go on to cover "educational" experience and "Voluntary sector experience", neither of which involves business—quite the opposite. Appearing next are "tenants groups", which are certainly not business; "youthwork", which might possibly be related to business; and

"community involvement, PTA, charity work", which are not. Those are followed by "campaigning experience", whatever that may mean. Then there is

"Public service experience . . . local government, trade union".

My hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) will be pleased to learn that the trade unions come under the heading of "Other life experience", but there is nothing about business. The category ends with "magistrate, school governorship", which again have nothing to do with business. No doubt the Liberals have a similar classification, taken from a similar management consultancy booklet or whatever. However, I am sorry to say that there is nothing in the Labour party person specification about business. No suggestion is made that part of the "Other life experience" should be business.

I welcome the new clause, because at least it tries to make it clear that the £7 billion ultimately comes from business. I do not want to upset my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent, so I shall define business in the novel way used by the Secretary of State, including trade unions, shareholders and employees. All those people create the wealth.

I hope that the assembly will pay attention to a clause such as new clause 19, because, if we do not have that wealth creation in Wales, however much money or subsidy comes to Wales from the United Kingdom Treasury, or from Europe—there will probably be less of it in the next few years—the other activities will suffer. We must place an emphasis on business.

I am sorry that the Labour party appears to have ignored business completely in its person specification, but at least we are making up for that to some extent in the new clause.

Mr. Öpik: I congratulate the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), who is obviously a key player in the ball park, and who is absolutely right to run the idea up the flagpole and see if anyone salutes—classic phrases from the books he describes.

Four of the five hon. Members who tabled new clause 19 are Liberal Democrats, because we unequivocally support the Bill. In earlier debates, some hon. Members have feared comparisons with business, which is fair enough, but when I think of the word "business", I think not only of the big companies but of the smaller companies and of the individuals who form 30 per cent. of business people in areas such as mid-Wales.

The Federation of Conservative—oh dear, a blast from the past. Let me say that again. The Federation of Small Businesses would very much corroborate the importance of small business in Wales. At the moment, sadly, especially in mid-Wales, rural areas are suffering a deep recession. I mean not just the closure of larger companies, such as D. C. Evans, but the terrible cash flow problems that are being experienced by farmers, who are small business people. They feel fed up and let down by the current Government, as they felt fed up and let down by the Government who preceded them. An assembly is their best hope for a medium-term reprieve from the suffocation that they experience—in their view, due to insensitive handling of rural issues by both Governments.

The assembly, by listening and using its powers, can definitely make a difference to the quality of life and, more to the point, the economic performance of Wales as a whole and the rural areas in particular.

We have made this criticism previously, so I shall not dwell on it, but it is a matter of regret to Liberal Democrats that the assembly will not have more powers to influence the economic development of Wales. Nevertheless, it will have an important role in lobbying the Secretary of State for Wales and the Westminster Parliament, to ensure that Wales's voice is heard.

We all agreed with the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) that politics is not a business—not simply a question of pounds and pence. However, the voice of business is the voice of the working people. When we remember that business is not just LG, Laura Ashley and Control Techniques, but Peter Burt the publican, Nick Bates the farmer and Neil Badger the photographer, business takes on the face and personality of the people who keep Wales trading.

We believe that politicians can learn from business people, just as business people can gain an immense amount by becoming aware of the social environment in which they trade. That is why we warmly welcome new clause 19.

Ms Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire): Because it was I who requested that the business issue be raised in the context of the assembly, I was stunned by the comments of the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), who first tried to claim credit for raising the issue and then said that he regarded the new clause as almost useless. There is considerable confusion on the Conservative Benches as to how the Opposition stand on that issue.

I very much welcome the fact that the Secretary of State wishes new clause 19 to be incorporated in the Bill, because it is a sign of a determination in the assembly to have a framework of wholesale co-operation between all sectors of society and all the people of Wales.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) asked, "Why just business?" but the Bill already contains a system for consultation of the voluntary sector. We also have a system, through the Partnership Council for Wales, for consultation on educational matters. It was for that reason that I first raised the issue of consultation with business. At that stage, although there was an innovative approach for a reactive consultation with business, I felt that it should be proactive, not only to obtain benefits on compliance costs, as the Opposition said, but to give the assembly the very positive and pragmatic benefits of business sector expertise.

It is vital that small businesses are represented in the consultative process, especially in the light of the fact that a recent European Commission report says that new jobs are most likely to come from small businesses. Those businesses need the means to communicate effectively with the assembly to maximise job creation.

8.15 pm

It is important to consult business. I have just returned from Catalonia, which has a 20-year record of devolution. The enthusiasm demonstrated there, the co-operation between all sectors in the region, and the confidence arising from that, which has enabled people to portray what their area has to offer, were very welcome.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) said something about the assembly doing little more than doling out money. My vision, and the reason that I wanted business to be consulted, is that the purpose of the assembly is to give the Welsh people democratic control of things that affect their everyday lives. That goes for everyone in Wales—and for the businesses in Wales, to which we look for our economic future.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): I shall speak briefly but warmly in support of new clause 19. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on presenting the new clause, because it strikes exactly the right note in terms of the relationship between the new assembly and business in Wales. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) on bringing the matter to the notice of the House by tabling her new clause 14 in Committee. She rightly withdrew that new clause for what is now a better clause and a better piece of legislation.

I spoke in support of new clause 14 in Committee, but with a note of caution, based on my experience of more than five years, from 1992 to 1997, working with one of the biggest partnerships between private business, Government and Government agencies in Wales. It was one of the most successful partnerships in contributing to, and attracting, inward investment to Wales. We attracted a higher proportion of inward investment to that part of Wales during that period than any other region and, by and large, it was due to that relationship.

However, one cannot legislate a formula, which is why new clause 19 is so good. One cannot embody in law what that partnership with business should be. It is my passionate belief that the secret of a successful relationship between Government and business is to evolve an innovative relationship, which does not try to get either partner to do what it cannot do. It allows each partner to do what it does best, without interference. That was the secret of our experience, and I think that it is the secret for future success in Wales.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) is right when he says that the greatest problem facing the new assembly will be gross domestic product per capita in Wales, which is in relative decline when compared to GDP in the rest of the United Kingdom. If we do not address that problem by working in partnership with the wealth creators, with business in Wales, we shall certainly have a problem.

Mr. Llew Smith: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a need to include the word "business" in the Bill, in the sense that there is a need to consult business? Does he accept also that, within the proposed legislation, we should have included a reference to local communities, which may have been adversely affected as a result of the activities of business? For example, if a firm is set up in a community and as a result that community is polluted, the assembly would have an obligation to consult the firm, or the polluter, but not the local community that has been polluted by the activities of the firm. Should we not extend the list of those who should be consulted?

Mr. Smith: I understand that there is a commitment to sustainable development. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We must consult and we must protect people, but that should be done under a separate mechanism. The challenge facing us is the future success of Welsh business.

Those who cast doubts on the ability of the Welsh people and the Welsh assembly to work in partnership with business should re-examine the track record of local government in Wales and its success in partnership with business. Local government and business worked together as a team. We in Wales are better able and better prepared than others, partly because of our co-operative values, to work closely in partnership with business and to make a damned good success of that approach. We have done so in the past despite, on occasions, the activities of some Tory Secretaries of State for Wales over the past 10 years, who have done business in Wales no favours. Local government in partnership with business has been responsible for our success in attracting foreign investment, I stress, into Wales.

[Mr. Smith]

Mr. Llew Smith: I accept that the proposed legislation may be committed to sustainable development, but will my hon. Friend accept that, even allowing for that, it is likely that some firms in Wales will continue to pollute communities? Perhaps there should be written into the Bill an obligation that consultation should take place with those who are being polluted by particular firms.

Mr. Smith: I think that that should be covered generally by environmental protection legislation. I think also that my hon. Friend's argument detracts slightly from the new clause, which I wish to address.

Ms Lawrence: My hon. Friend the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) has been an advocate of strong local government. Do we not agree that the avenue for tackling issues such as the pollution of communities where such communities have a direct input is through strong local government? The assembly will strengthen local government to allow that to happen.

Mr. Smith: I agree absolutely with my hon. Friend.

Finally, the clause is exactly what we want to see. The answer is to have a broad framework of bodies to consult and to have a dialogue with business in Wales. In the end, the secret will be for business to make its own contribution to the success of the Welsh economy by forming private sector-led partnerships that are broadly coterminous with the new regional committees that will be set up by the Welsh assembly. I welcome the new clause.

Mr. Ron Davies: I thank all those who have expressed their support for the new clause. I shall concentrate on the points raised by the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones). I ask for his forgiveness if he thinks that I was rather precipitate in explaining his new clause before he introduced it. However, the hon. Gentleman asked me a number of questions and I shall respond to them. That will give me the opportunity to respond also to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith).

First, the hon. Member for Ynys Môn raised the problem that is inherent in a new clause of the sort that is before us. The hon. Gentleman described it as the problem of listing. It is true that, once we start to place an obligation on a body such as the assembly to consult one group, it may well be asked why it should not consult other groups. The hon. Gentleman referred specifically to the voluntary sector. I draw his attention to clauses 111 and 112, which set out the mechanism by which the assembly can establish good relations both with local government and the voluntary sector. Clause 112 refers specifically to a relationship with voluntary organisations.

I again congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) on introducing her amendment in Committee. My hon. Friend's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent was absolutely correct. It is local government that will—

Mr. Llew Smith: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davies: No, I am sorry. I have to put my case. I cannot give way at the moment. If I have time, I shall give way.

My hon. Friend raised a fair point, and I understand his argument. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire was right when she said that it is for local government to represent communities. We have set out in clause 111 how we see relations with local government developing.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn referred to the Federation of Small Businesses, and asked whether our definitions would include the federation. He will be interested to know that the federation, along with the Institute of Directors and the Confederation of British Industry, made a formal submission to the Welsh Office. They are content with the form of words that we have used. As I said in my opening remarks, we believe that it is right to leave it to the assembly to judge which representatives of business it is appropriate for it to consult.

No doubt there will be changes over time, and I certainly do not want to be too prescriptive at this moment and place a legal obligation on the assembly which might cause it difficulties in future. It is right, therefore, to place a duty but to give maximum discretion to the assembly to develop the duty as it thinks best.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn referred to the provisions that are set out in clause 64, which deals with consultation on regulatory appraisals. The clause provides that there should be procedures for "appropriate consultation" where "the costs . . . of complying with" the assembly's

"subordinate legislation are likely to be significant".

The consultation that will be appropriate in those circumstances will vary from case to case. It could include, under clause 64, consultation with, for example, the voluntary sector, charities, local authorities and environmental groups. That is providing some redress in terms of the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent.

It must be right that the assembly tailors its consultation to meet the prevailing circumstances. The circumstances will obviously change from case to case. If the assembly failed to consult in a way that would be reasonable, that would increase the risk that it might be subject to challenge by way of judicial review for failing to comply with its duty under clause 64. I hope that hon. Members are reassured, and that the new clause will not be pressed to a vote.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 27

POWER TO PROMOTE AND OPPOSE PRIVATE BILLS

'.—(1) The Assembly may promote private bills in Parliament and may oppose any private bill in Parliament.

(2) But the Assembly shall not promote or oppose any private bill in Parliament unless a motion to authorise the Assembly to promote or oppose the bill is passed by the Assembly on a vote in which at least two-thirds of the Assembly members voting support the motion.

(3) Subsection (1) shall not cause the Assembly to have power to apply for orders under section 1 or 3 of the Transport and Works Act 1992 by virtue of section 20 of that Act (which gives a body with power to promote and oppose private bills power to apply for and object to such orders).'.—[Mr. Ron Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ron Davies: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause fulfils the undertaking that I gave to the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 2 March in response to an amendment that he had moved. The new clause clarifies that the assembly will have power to promote or oppose private Bills in Parliament, but the clause does not confer on the assembly the power to make primary legislation. It will be able to promote only a private Bill in Parliament.

Subsection (2) of the new clause provides for a decision by the assembly to promote or oppose a private Bill in Parliament to require a two-thirds majority. That is appropriate in order to ensure that the decision by the assembly to promote or oppose a Bill is not taken lightly. I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that explanation.

As I said in Committee, we have looked further at the interaction between an explicit power for the assembly and the Transport and Works Act 1992. Subsection (3) deals with that. It provides that the new clause does not cause the assembly to have power to apply for orders under section 103 of the 1992 Act by virtue of section 20 of that Act, because that would, in effect, give the assembly primary powers—and I know that the hon. Gentleman would not want me to do that.

8.30 pm

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He has answered one of the two points that we raised. The other point was whether we could dispose of private legislation within the assembly. I hope that we may be able to do that at some time in the future. However, I am grateful for small mercies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order.

Mr. Jenkin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is there any way that we can discuss new clause 31 before we move on? It is a completely new clause that introduces a completely new—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The short answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is no. He must know that the programme was approved by the House and that this is not the first day upon which we have dealt with the legislation. There is no way that new clause 31 may be discussed under the terms of the motion that the House has agreed.

It being half-past Eight o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Question necessary to dispose of the business to be concluded at that hour.

New clause 31

POLLS FOR ASCERTAINING VIEW OF THE PUBLIC

'.—(1) The Assembly may hold a poll in an area consisting of Wales or any part (or parts) of Wales for the purpose of ascertaining the views of those polled about whether or how any of the Assembly's functions (other than those under section 34) should be exercised.

(2) The persons entitled to vote in a poll under this section are those who—

(a) would be entitled to vote as electors at a local government election in an electoral area wholly or partly included in the area in which the poll is held, and

(b) are registered in the register of local government electors at an address within the area in which the poll is held.

(3) The Assembly may not delegate the function of deciding—

(a) whether to hold a poll under this section,

(b) when, and in which area, a poll is to be held, and

(c) the wording of any questions or propositions to be put to those polled.

(4) The Assembly may by order make provision as to the conduct of polls (or any poll) under this section.

(5) The Secretary of State may by order make provision for the combination of polls (or any poll) under this section with polls at any elections.

(6) An order under subsection (4) or (5) may apply or incorporate, with or without modifications or exceptions, any provision of or made under any enactment relating to any elections; and the provision which may be made under subsection (4) includes, in particular, provision for disregarding alterations in a register of electors.

(7) The costs of polls under this section shall be met by the Assembly.'.—[Mr. Ron Davies]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 2

SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION

'(1) The subordinate legislation procedures must include provision for ensuring that, before a draft of a statutory instrument containing Assembly general subordinate legislation is laid before the Assembly, the draft is—

(a) submitted to a committee consisting of all Members of the House of Commons representing constituencies in Wales; and

(b) approved by that committee.

(2) When any draft is submitted to the committee under this section, the committee shall report within a reasonable period as to whether it approves the draft.'.—[Mr. Evans.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Evans: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 6—Reports prepared under Part IV—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

'The Secretary of State, Comptroller and Auditor General, Auditor General for Wales and the Assembly shall lay before both Houses of Parliament any statement prepared under Part IV of this Act.'.

New clause 15—Relations with House of Commons—

'.—(1) The standing orders of the Assembly may make provision for the agreement by the Assembly and publication by it of proposed amendments to any bill to which this subsection applies.

(2) Subsection (1) applies to any public bill affecting Wales in any of the fields referred to in Schedule 2 which has received a second reading in the House of Commons.

(3) The standing orders of the Assembly may make provision for the publication of draft public bills affecting Wales in any of the fields referred to in Schedule 2.

(4) Proposed amendments and proposed bills published under subsections (1) or (3) shall be laid before the House of Commons by the Secretary of State, and that House shall make provision for such amendments and bills to be considered.

(5) Nothing in subsection (4) shall require the House of Commons to consider amendments or bills published by the Assembly if those amendments or bills do not conform with any rule of the House.'.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss new clause 2 and new clause 6 even if we did not have the opportunity to discuss new clause 31—a clause that we never debated and did not have the opportunity to amend. I think that that demonstrates clearly the need for the extra day that we requested.

The proposed new clauses present another opportunity to improve the Bill. Although they are relatively short, they are none the less important, because they refer to the relationship between the assembly and Westminster. We must recognise that such a relationship must exist, even though powers are being devolved through the Secretary of State to the new body. While recognising the supremacy of Westminster, we must ensure that there is a real partnership between the assembly and this Parliament. The hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) referred to partnership time and again.

Consideration of the new clauses provides another opportunity to examination the checks and balances that will be necessary within the new assembly. There is an on-going debate in this place about what should happen to the other place. Despite that debate, no one disputes the fact that there should be a second Chamber—we all believe that another body should revise the legislation that passes through this place, and hopefully improve it. Perhaps the other place will improve the legislation that we are considering today.

In new clause 2, we have attempted to introduce a check and balance within the assembly while trying to ensure that the partnership between Westminster and the assembly continues. It appears that most Labour Members of Parliament at Westminster will remain here—there may be one exception—and not go to the new assembly. Therefore, we must ensure that they have a proper role. We are not sure what will happen to the Welsh Grand Committee; we do not know whether it will continue and whether it will have any real role.

Mr. Ron Davies: Not for you.

Mr. Evans: We already know that. The Conservative party, which received 317,000 votes in Wales, has no voice on the Welsh Grand Committee.

New clause 2 does not refer to the Welsh Grand Committee as such because we know that, in the past, hon. Members representing constituencies outside Wales have served on the Committee. We have said that all 40 Members of Parliament who represent Welsh constituencies at Westminster and who have a real stake and a real interest in what occurs in Wales will also have more than a passing interest in what happens in the Welsh assembly. Some hon. Members may have a dual mandate—we do not know. However, the vast majority of Labour Members representing Welsh constituencies will remain in Westminster.

New clause 2 provides a real opportunity for secondary or subordinate legislation in the assembly to come to a Committee of the House consisting solely of Welsh Members of Parliament. They may then scrutinise the legislation and approve or not approve it within a reasonable time. As far as we are concerned, it is a very reasonable new clause. We do not propose that the body should delay subordinate legislation needlessly for months on end. We want to ensure that such legislation is passed as quickly as possible.

Mr. Dalyell: What would happen if Welsh Members in Westminster disapproved of such legislation?

Mr. Evans: Because of the supremacy of Parliament, the Welsh assembly would have to reconsider its decisions and change its mind. In the final instance, Westminster would be supreme. [Interruption.] I hear what the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger) says from a sedentary position. The Secretary of State for Wales admits that Westminster will remain the supreme body, even after devolution. We are simply formalising the arrangement to ensure that the hon. Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire has something to do other than sit behind the Secretary of State—whether it is the present Secretary of State or a new one—and offer advice from a sedentary position.

Mr. Dalyell: I wish to record that, judging by his expression, the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) does not agree.

Mr. Evans: That comes as no surprise to me. The journey on devolved Government that I am making is completely different from that of the right hon. Gentleman. He is following a route to independence that has no exit lanes. Therefore, I am not surprised by his reaction—in fact, I would be surprised if he had done anything other than look rather concerned about this suggestion.

New clause 6 concerns the relationship between Westminster and the new assembly. Part IV deals with financial matters, including grants and loans to the assembly, expenditure, remuneration expenses, accounts, examinations into the use of resources and Audit Committee reports. It goes from the famous clause 80, under which the Secretary of State will, from time to time, give money to the assembly, down to clause 104. The new clause would ensure that statements are laid before Parliament for scrutiny. Parliament remains the sovereign political body in the United Kingdom, and should have access to the details of public expenditure for scrutiny, particularly as they originate from this Parliament and are devolved to the assembly.

The Treasury is responsible for allocating the budget to the assembly and should be accountable to Parliament for such matters. It is a basic democratic demand that information on the assembly's expenditure should be available for debate in Parliament. Our two new clauses would ensure that the assembly will be a greater success, and that the partnership between Westminster and the assembly will be assured into the future.

Mr. Ron Davies: New clause 2 would place new procedural burdens on the assembly in respect of its order-making powers. Under the new clause, no order could be made by the assembly without its first having secured the approval of a Committee of Members of Parliament from Welsh constituencies.

Since we first debated the subordinate legislation procedures, my right hon. Friend the President of the Council has submitted a lengthy and detailed memorandum to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, on both the Scottish Parliament's and the Welsh assembly's order-making powers. It summarises the provisions in the Government of Wales Bill related to the making of assembly orders. It also explains that my advisory group will consult widely in Wales after Easter about the detailed Standing Orders that the assembly should have for the exercise of its order-making powers.

The group is anxious that there should be greater public involvement in the making of subordinate legislation in Wales, and wants the Standing Orders to reflect that approach. I am minded to accept the group's advice on these matters. I hope that hon. Members present will find the Joint Committee report interesting, and I trust that the Joint Committee will find the memorandum helpful.

Unfortunately, I do not find new clause 2 at all helpful. I see no case for requiring the assembly's draft orders to be submitted to a special Committee of the House for approval. That proposition is entirely inconsistent with the most basic assumptions behind devolution: that the assembly will be a responsible, democratic body and will be well able to exercise its powers sensibly without constant supervision from the centre. Given the number of orders that the assembly will have to make, the proposal is wholly impractical. I hope that the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) will withdraw the new clause.

New clause 6 provides that any statement under part IV must be laid before both Houses of Parliament. Its effect is not altogether certain, because the term "statement" may not include accounts and reports, although I assume that that was the intention. It is unnecessary in most circumstances. Clauses 83 and 88 already provide for the Secretary of State's accounts to be laid before each House of Parliament by the Comptroller and Auditor General. I appreciate that they may not have been the main target of the proposal.

The Secretary of State will be accountable to the House for the grant that he or she pays to the assembly each year under clause 80. He or she will seek approval for that grant through a supply estimate, in the same way as at present. Those accounts will continue to be audited by the Comptroller and Auditor General and laid before Parliament.

We must recognise that the role of the House in approving public expenditure for Wales will change as a result of devolution, and the same holds true for Scotland. The House will no longer approve detailed financial allocations for the Secretary of State for Wales, because the grant to the assembly will be a single, unhypothecated sum.

The way in which the assembly decides to use the money that it receives from the Secretary of State will be a matter for it alone. It will be accountable to the electorate in Wales for its decisions. Its accounts will be audited by the independent Auditor General for Wales, laid before the assembly and published. Providing for the assembly's accounts to be laid at Westminster would tend to undermine the change in responsibilities, and would blur accountability.

Although only the Auditor General for Wales will have responsibility for auditing the accounts of the assembly and its public bodies, the Bill provides for the Comptroller and Auditor General to have access for the purposes of value-for-money examinations and financial investigations. That is dealt with in clauses 100 and 101.

The Bill acknowledges that the Public Accounts Committee will also have a role. Clause 98 provides for the assembly's accounting officer to have responsibilities to the Public Accounts Committee. Similar responsibilities will be placed on accounting officers of other public bodies in Wales by Government amendments Nos. 109, 177 and 180, which we shall debate later.

Part IV provides appropriate mechanisms for accountability to Parliament that nevertheless reflect the fundamental changes in democratic accountability inherent in the process of devolution.

I appreciate that new clause 15 may be an attempt to draw out the Government's thinking on how the assembly could influence the content of legislation at Westminster.

Mr. Wigley: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I hope to finish shortly so that the right hon. Gentleman can make his speech on new clause 15.

Mr. Wigley: I was going to invite the Secretary of State to leave his speech at this point, so that I can explain the reasons for new clause 15 before he puts the arguments against it.

Mr. Davies rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Secretary of State was premature in seeking to catch my eye and perhaps I was premature in calling him. I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for that. I am sure that the Secretary of State is keen to hear the right hon. Gentleman on this matter. Perhaps the Secretary of State could finish this part of his speech and seek to catch my eye again.

Mr. Davies: I appreciate that new clause 15 may be an attempt to draw out the Government's thinking on how the assembly would influence the content of legislation at Westminster. It would be inappropriate for me to speculate any further until I have heard the right hon. Gentleman.

8.45 pm

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for interrupting his speech. I dare say that his notes will be just as relevant when he has heard what I have to say because I realise that responses are written before speeches are made.

[Mr. Wigley]

I am glad of the opportunity to speak to new clause 15 because it addresses a material question. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) was concerned about the role of Welsh Members at Westminster on matters arising from the assembly. The new clause sets out an excellent work load that can be passed on constructively. It deals with Bills that have had their Second Reading at Westminster and which affect matters that have been devolved to the assembly for executive and secondary legislative purposes.

The assembly may take a view on the impact of legislation that is going through this place and, from its experience of executive responsibilities, especially for Welsh local government, for the Welsh language and for education in Wales, on all of which we have our own agenda, it may want to table amendments to the primary legislation. However, it does not have a vehicle to do that directly, because it cannot undertake primary legislation.

The new clause contains a mechanism by which, after Second Reading of a Bill, it will be possible for the assembly to present draft amendments for consideration here. They can be debated by Welsh Members and by Members from elsewhere. Unless the Bill contains such a provision, there will be great frustration, because members of the assembly will deal daily with such matters and with the implications of legislation in a different way from Welsh Members at Westminster. The absence of a mechanism to allow amendments or to close a loophole in primary legislation affecting Wales would cause difficulties.

The Secretary of State has almost accepted the principle. In an earlier debate, I was glad to be able to thank him for the way in which he is to enable private legislation to be brought from the assembly to Westminster. Private legislation may affect only a few square miles of Wales, and it is much more important for legislation affecting the whole of Wales on local government, education or the Welsh language to be treated in the same way. The wording of the new clause may not be appropriate, but I urge the Secretary of State to consider between now and the Bill reaching the other place whether there should be some formal mechanism to enable the assembly to have its wishes brought here.

We should bear in mind that the political colour of an administration in the assembly may be different from the colour of the Government at Westminster. The assembly may want action that the Government do not want to facilitate, and there should at least be an opportunity for the assembly's voice to be heard, although it would finally have to accept Parliament's determination on the primary legislation. The proposal is modest, and I shall be interested to hear the Secretary of State's considered response.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As a United Kingdom MP, I can contain myself no longer from intruding on Welsh affairs. Having listened to the debate, I am certain that this arrangement cannot endure into the next Parliament or the one after that. In view of the Government's majority, it will probably endure quite easily in this Parliament. It is quite clear to an outsider that both sides are saying, "Get your tanks off my lawn." What was equally clear in that good-tempered exchange of bonhomie was that the Opposition Front-Bench team has a completely different interpretation of what we are discussing from the Government Front-Bench team and indeed from the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). They cannot all be right.

It was clear from the passionate intervention sotto voce by my hon. Friend the Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger) that he thought that there was absolutely no question of Westminster telling the Welsh assembly what to do in matters that pertain to it, but there is a little problem of pipers and tunes and who pays the money for all this. The time will come, sooner rather than later, when Westminster will say, "Hey, we're a bit strapped for cash," and look hard at the aspirations of the Welsh assembly. Therein lies a source of considerable trouble.

I do not want to intrude any further, but I say here and now that it is fanciful to believe that this situation can endure in a Parliament where the political arithmetic is different, especially when the votes of Welsh and Scottish Members could determine the shape, colour and policies of a Government of England.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): I will not follow the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) down the path of tanks and so on, which is rather emotive. I understand why he uses those similes, but I do not think that things will go that way.

New clause 2 sabotages the assembly's ability to have a proper say even in the few legislative powers that it has in relation to draft statutory instruments. As we know, the new clause says:

"before a draft of a statutory instrument containing Assembly general subordinate legislation is laid before the Assembly, the draft is—

(a) submitted to a committee consisting of all Members of the House of Commons representing constituencies in Wales".

It also says:

"the committee shall report within a reasonable period as to whether it approves the draft."

Being a reasonable man, the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) used sweet reason in trying to persuade us that all would be well, but the interpretation of what is a reasonable period is as long as my arm and his combined. It could be any period. The new clause could be used as a delaying mechanism to frustrate the Welsh assembly. We do not see the point of going down that path.

On new clause 6 and scrutiny, as has been said, in any case, those accounts are laid before both the assembly and the House. Indeed, if it so wished, the Public Accounts Committee could probably examine the Welsh assembly's accounts as audited at any particular moment. We therefore feel that the safeguards are already there and that there is no need to accept new clause 6.

We agree that new clause 15 is useful. It allows the Welsh assembly to propose draft amendments to Bills. Obviously, if it so wishes, the House could reject those drafts; it could exercise that power. In any case, the new clause proposes draft amendments to Bills that directly affect only Wales. We support the new clause.

Mr. Grieve: I should like to address my remarks to new clause 2 and new clause 15—the latter is the reverse of the former. The debate—and particularly the speech by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—has been interesting. It appears to me that we have been labouring under a delusion that subordinate legislation is in some way different from primary legislation in terms of its impact on people. It is not. It creates criminal offences and, if it is not properly drafted, it can create enormous problems. There is ample evidence to suggest that it is often not properly drafted.

The new clauses are about the desire of Westminster to retain some measure of control over the way in which subordinate legislation goes through. Not surprisingly, new clause 15 expresses the desire of the Welsh nationalists that, when the assembly is set up, they should have some input into the primary legislation from which the subordinate legislation will be derived.

The Secretary of State mentioned the report produced by the President of the Council to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. It is abundantly clear that, unless some mechanism is set up—admittedly, it would not go as far as new clause 2—to allow some input into the way in which the statutory instruments are drafted in Wales, we will be in a difficult position.

Last week there was a meeting between the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments and representatives of the European Parliament to discuss the problem of subordinate legislation. It is quite apparent that, at the European level, there is no control over subordinate legislation, and that is a cause for concern. It was a topic that we discussed at some length. It emerged powerfully from the representations by Speaker's Counsel on the issue that, although the Joint Committee has no power to alter statutory instruments, its ability to report on them at least ensures a measure of conformity and that, on the whole, Government Departments listen to what we have to say.

The Secretary of State said that the Welsh assembly would have its own Speaker's Counsel and Department and that there was no reason why it should not do the job just as well as we do it here, although I have always thought that the job that we do here is thoroughly imperfect because we are not given the proper tools with which to do it. However, the fact remains that we live in a United Kingdom, and Wales and England share a common legal system. Although some statutory instruments are exclusive to Wales, a large number will be common to both.

In those circumstances, will statutory instruments be drafted differently as a result of exercises in semantics which may have profound implications if they are every challenged in the courts? What will we do when people in Wales tell their Members of Parliament that they are having regulations foisted upon them through statutory instruments which are imperfect compared with those that were passed for the same purpose here? The Secretary of State has never answered that question, and on the last occasion on which it was raised, he simply dismissed it.

I am taking the opportunity offered by new clause 2—perhaps slightly tendentiously—to ask him to reconsider it even in that most narrow ambit. I accept that new clause 2 goes far further, but it points up the enormous difficulty that results from splitting subordinate from primary legislation. We are not dealing with executive matters. The extent and range of subordinate legislation is so great that in many ways it affects people far more than the primary legislation. Unless that difficulty is resolved, we shall continue to have problems. To some extent I sympathise with the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), because I am concerned that the matter must be addressed.

Mr. Ron Davies: The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) is having difficulty in coming to terms with the principle of devolution, and I am afraid that he has completely overstated his case.

I want to talk briefly about new clause 15. The right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) said that we had accepted that the assembly could be involved in the promotion of private legislation, therefore that could be extended to public legislation. I do not accept that because there is such a fundamental difference between the two.

Paragraph 3.38 of the White Paper states:

"The Bill would place a duty on the Secretary of State to consult the Assembly about the Government's programme for legislation after it has been announced in the Queen's Speech."

Clause 32 delivers on that commitment. The consultation under it is one way in which the assembly can influence the content of primary legislation. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman, however, that, relying on the powers in clause 34, the assembly could make appropriate representations to whomever it chose about any Bill before Parliament that affected Wales, whether or not that Bill related to the areas covered in schedule 2. Those representations might include suggested amendments; they could be published or sent to the appropriate Minister, or to any Member of this House or of the House of Lords. Obviously, it will be for the Government or Parliament, as the case may be, to decide what, if anything, they want to do in the light of the assembly's representations. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will recognise that point.

It would not be right for the Bill to require the Secretary of State to table the proposed amendments and to require this House to provide for them to be considered. The only restriction in new clause 15 is that the amendments would have to conform with the rules of the House—the new clause is somewhat impractical in that respect.

Let us assume that the assembly wished to propose an amendment to a Government Bill which directly contradicted the policy—

It being Nine o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER , pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Question negatived.

New clause 5

POWER TO ENTER INTO CONCORDAT

'No Minister of the Crown or Government Department shall enter into a concordat with the Assembly or a committee of the Assembly unless a draft of the concordat has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, both Houses of Parliament'.—[Mr. Ancram.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: new clause 9—Concordats between the Assembly and Departments of State—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

'(1) Her Majesty may by Order in Council provide for concordats to be agreed between the Assembly and each department of state governing the relations between the Assembly and the departments.

(2) The Secretary of State shall, before the first ordinary election of the Assembly, lay before each House of Parliament the draft of an Order in Council under this section making provision for such concordats.

(3) No recommendation shall be made to Her Majesty in Council to make an Order in Council under this section unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing the Order in Council has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.'.

New clause 10—Publication of concordats—

'.—(1) Where a concordat between the Assembly and a Minister of the Crown is agreed, the Assembly shall publish the text of the concordat within 7 days.

(2) Where an amendment to a concordat between the Assembly and a Minister of the Crown is agreed, the Assembly shall publish the text of the amendment within 7 days.'.

New clause 11—Amendments to concordats—

'.—No amendment to a concordat between the Assembly and a Minister of the Crown may be made without first having been agreed to by majority vote at a meeting of the Assembly.'.

Mr. Ancram: There is a saying about a house divided against itself. The Government may have to learn from recent experience.

The new clause has a simple purpose: it is to say that we are still here. So much of the legislation seems to concern moving responsibilities away from this House; the new clause is designed to bring those responsibilities back, especially as they relate to concordats.

I hope that the new clause will be regarded as innocuous enough, and that the Government will accept it. It goes to the very heart of the Government's attempts, ever since 1 May, increasingly to bypass Parliament. I was interested to watch the Secretary of State's impatience as the clock ticked towards the time when the last debate was supposed to end. I remind him that it was he who set the time limits, against the wishes of the Opposition. He should not, therefore, look impatient—

Mr. Ron Davies: That—and the right hon. Gentleman knows it—is a complete travesty of the truth. It was the Opposition who suggested that these matters be taken on the Floor of the House, a principle which I readily conceded. The Opposition have been party to the agreement all the way through, and the right hon. Gentleman knows that the Government generously allowed two hours of additional time today in view of the brief statement at the end of Question Time. The only reason I was impatient was that I was anxious to reply to the remarks of the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), and the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) was preventing me from doing so.

Mr. Ancram: That was not the first time this evening that the right hon. Gentleman has appeared impatient. Had he accepted our suggestions about the timetabling of these parts of the Bill, he would have had rather more time to make his case.

The Government's attempts to bypass Parliament really know no bounds. One of the few Divisions in which the Prime Minister has voted since 1 May was earlier today, on the business motion governing today's debates. That is yet another example of the Government's disdain for the House.

Concordats may sound friendly, but when we begin to examine what they are and what they will do, we find them rather sinister. Earlier this year, we were helped by a Government written answer which had attached guidance setting out their view of the purpose and nature of these concordats. I have looked at that guidance with some care; rather than reassuring me, it has filled me with even deeper foreboding. It states:

"Their purpose is not to create legal obligations or restrictions on any party; rather, they will set the ground rules for administrative co-operation and exchange of information."

Setting "the ground rules" sounds wonderful—as if the Government are setting the rules by which the game will be played. However, when we asked previously what the concordats were for, we were led to believe that they were not for administrative co-operation and exchange of information but for important matters like deciding how much money the Welsh assembly will get and how the voice of Wales will be heard in the European Council of Ministers. Those are not administrative, co-operative matters or exchanges of information; they are matters of fundamental importance to Wales and to this Parliament.

The next paragraph says:

"Concordats are not necessarily the only way to regulate these relationships in future."

Good, say I—something better. Not at all. We are told:

"Other, less formal, arrangements will be appropriate in many cases, and in others there will be no need for any standing arrangement at all."

We suddenly begin to see something that is highly alien to our democratic principles: the introduction of what have become known in America as "Executive agreements"—agreements not between legislatures, Parliaments or countries but between Administrations so that they can bypass democratic procedures.

The concordats will be used for exchange of information and

"arrangements for liaison on EU and international matters".

By what right does a concordat that does not come before this House decide on matters of liaison within the European Union, or on other international matters? Are not those of concern to this House and to elected Members of the Welsh Assembly? How can they be dealt with on the same basis as the concordats?

The document also refers to "any financial arrangements", but are those the financial arrangements under clause 80? Do they relate to the Barnett formula? Will they all now be regulated by non-statutory, non-legally enforceable documents, which will become known as concordats?

Those are the reasons why, earlier in our proceedings, I tried to explore what the concordats were about. The document tells us firmly that they are non-statutory and not intended to be legally enforceable. That is interesting, because it gives rise to all sorts of questions. The document also says that they are not intended to impose duties and liabilities.

Mr. Letwin: Will my right hon. Friend speculate, given his knowledge of these matters, whether the statement that the concordats are not intended to be legally enforceable is of the slightest legal interest? Does he agree that, over time, the courts might come to think that they are justiciable and perhaps even enforceable?

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for asking that, because it is one of the questions that I was going to ask the Secretary of State to respond to when he replies to the debate. Without having seen a concordat, I cannot take a view, but it might well found an action for judicial review, for instance. In a sense, that would then bring into question whether it was creating obligations or liabilities and whether it might at some stage become legally enforceable.

These concordats have no status whatever. We are surprised that, although they will deal with major matters, they will normally be signed by a senior official. Only if they are politically sensitive will they be signed by Ministers and Assembly Secretaries. Thus, they will not be regarded as sufficiently important for a Minister to be involved in their negotiation and signing, but will be signed by officials within Departments.

We need to ask a number of fundamental questions about the concordats. First, what status will they have? I hope that the Secretary of State will give us an answer for the first time. Are they like Executive agreements in the United States, which are deliberate ways of bypassing the legislature, and thus matters of considerable constitutional interest and challenge in the United States? If they are, we should be told. Secondly, will they found actions for judicial review? Has the Secretary of State taken advice on whether he is correct in saying that they are not intended to create or impose duties and liabilities? Is he secure in his expectation that that will not happen?

Who will decide who signs the concordats? What are the criteria for deciding whether they will be signed by a Minister or an official? That may appear a semantic question, but it is not. We know that Ministers come and go, and that Governments come and go, but that officials, by their nature, tend to stay. We need to know whether a concordat signed by a Minister will end with the departure of that Minister, and whether a concordat signed by a Minister on behalf of a Government will end with the departure of that Government. It seems that a concordat signed by an official might last, because the officials will still be there, and the interests in which they signed will remain. That will create not just one category of concordat, but a series of categories.

Mr. Letwin: Has not an early example of what might be described as a concordat in British history come to have considerable significance over time, although it is rather different from some of the examples that my right hon. Friend is describing? I refer to magna carta.

Mr. Ancram: I thank my hon. Friend for introducing the subject of that particular concordat, although I think that I could give him examples of some rather more modern and ecclesiastical concordats. At least we knew the basis of those concordats, and the way in which they could ultimately be enforced in constitutional terms. What we have here are documents—I call them documents, but I do not even know whether they will be documents. In any event, they will be constitutional eccentricities which, at present, have no status, and no basis that we know of on which they can be enforced.

Are the concordats unilaterally breachable? If one side decides that a concordat is no longer a concordat, will that be the end of the matter? If so, is any remedy available to the other side? Will there be financial implications? I understand that the concordats could well be used to decide matters such as the resourcing of the assembly under clause 80 or, indeed, the workings of the Barnett formula. If they have financial implications, will they be open to inspection by the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons—and, if so, on what basis, if they are not born of the House of Commons?

Let us come to the nub of the issue. How can someone who is not a representative of the United Kingdom be delegated, on the basis of an informal agreement, as a representative of the United Kingdom in the Council of Ministers? We are told that that will be one of the purposes of the concordats. How can that be done on the basis of, if necessary, no more than the signature of an official?

Will there be two types of concordat? Will there be concordats that are essentially between officials and, therefore, theoretically, under the terms of the Bill, between members of the same civil service, and concordats which, being between separate Administrations, constitute a very different animal? That, too, will arise in relation to Europe. I understand that concordats will be drawn up between two Administrations in order to allow one to be represented on the delegation of the other, which will be based on the advice of civil servants common to both—civil servants who, I believe, will move between their offices in Cardiff and the Cabinet Office in London in order to formulate the policy that will be taken to the Council of Ministers.

A series of strange, sinister beings called concordats are being introduced—[HON. MEMBERS: "Sinister?"] Hon. Members may smile, but it takes only one mouse to begin to chew away the rope that holds a building together. I see the beginnings of a deliberate attempt to bypass the House of Commons increasingly. We are starting with a few small concordats; five years later, we shall find that more and more is being done by concordat.

In the absence of answers, there is only one way in which the House can continue to control what is happening here: requiring all concordats to being brought to both Houses in draft form for approval. If that is done, we shall have a chance of protecting the interests of the House.

Mr. Rowlands: New clause 9, which is grouped with the right hon. Gentleman's new clause, would have the same effect, so I share the right hon. Gentleman's objective. However, I intend to employ a different argument because I thought that he rather over-egged his argument.

To return to my Bagehot, two buckles will link the assembly to Whitehall and Westminster. One is the Secretary of State and the other is the concordats. Those are the two instruments which will be used to achieve a relationship. They will deal with—if I can borrow a phrase from a different situation—the three areas of cohabitation that will have to be worked out.

9.15 pm

I am referring to the cohabitation between the Secretary of State and the assembly; the cohabitation between the

[Mr. Rowlands]

Secretary of State and Whitehall and the powers that he might have; and the cohabitation between the assembly and Whitehall. The concordats deal mainly with the third category of cohabitation—the relationship between assembly officials and Whitehall officials.

If the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) had bothered to read column 745 of Hansard on 2 March, he would have seen that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State spelled out rather well the reason why we have to have concordats. He described a series of relationships between Welsh Office officials and Whitehall officials on a host of issues. Those officials regularly meet in a working relationship within a common political structure.

I was rather surprised that my right hon. Friend described the relationship as harmonious. If it is, it has changed a great deal since my time in office 20 years ago, when there was a great deal of tension. Quite often, Whitehall would either try to pull a fast one or simply ignore the Welsh Office. I gather that everything is now sweetness, light and harmony, although I find it a little difficult to believe.

My right hon. Friend rightly pointed out that there is a meaningful basis to the relationship—that the officials work in a common political administrative-executive structure. When Welsh Office officials go to Whitehall, they work under the same rules, with the same common purpose, and bound by the same set of relationships. Therefore, many of the points made by the right hon. Member for Devizes were off target.

The fundamental issue is not that there is something sinister about the relationship or that we do not need concordats. I understand why we need them—to establish the sort of relationships that exist now and which were well described by my right hon. Friend on 2 March. The problem is that we are in a wholly different political environment with different sets of loyalties. The officials coming to Whitehall from the Welsh Office or the assembly will not have a common political administrative-executive allegiance; they will be separate people with separate relationships and separate loyalties—not to a Minister who is part of the collective system of Westminster, Whitehall and Cabinet, but to the First Secretary and other Secretaries who will have different priorities and different political instincts.

Mr. Letwin: In theory, a civil servant could be on both ends of a concordat, acting in his two capacities. Does the hon. Gentleman envisage that civil servant acting for two bodies which could have a contractual or legal relationship?

Mr. Rowlands: It is not a legal relationship at present; it is an administrative-executive arrangement between two sets of officials, but within a common system. I was saying that one of the questions that we need to ask is what happens when we break that up and the officials turn up in Whitehall from the assembly, with different political masters, different priorities and different remits.

I tried to read the document that, according to my right hon. Friend on 2 March,

"could not be classified as a ripping good yarn, but . . . is worth reading"—[Official Report, 2 March 1998; Vol. 307, c. 745.]

The right hon. Member for Devizes quoted from it earlier—but I did not find that it answered the one basic question that I would like answered.

Mr. Grieve rose—

Mr. Rowlands: Let me make my point first. The hon. Gentleman can intervene later.

The best way to get through all the constitutional theorising is to imagine a situation, to have a case study—or perhaps a scenario; that word would please the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). Let us imagine a scenario in which assembly officials turn up at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to discuss one of the sensitive issues concerning animal welfare, meat on the bone or something similar.

At the moment, such subjects may be all hush-hush, with confidential discussions taking place within MAFF about what it intends to do about an issue of considerable difficulty—meat hygiene, for example. Yet when the assembly officials turn up at the meeting, they may find that the thinking within MAFF is political dynamite for Welsh hillside farmers.

What do the officials do? At present, they would report back to their Ministers, and those Ministers would meet. That would all take place within a common system. What would a concordat say about such a situation? Having been up to Whitehall, the assembly officials will go back to base and report.

The first question is: to whom will they report? Do they say to the First Secretary, "We have to tell you that what we heard in the MAFF discussions is political dynamite"? What is the status of that information? How is to be transmitted to the assembly as a whole, or to the subject Committee dealing with the issue?

That is a central question about how well the buckle, or hyphen, representing the concord linking the two will be tested. I have not found out from anything that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said, delivered to the Library or explained to us in any shape or form, how we would deal with such a situation.

My scenario is not fanciful. Such things happened in my day, and I am sure they are happening now. Priorities, opinions, emphasis in policy and decision making—at operational level as well as at the grand strategic level—reveal lots of potential tensions between the needs and priorities of the assembly and its officials, and those of Whitehall and its Ministers.

Of course, the Secretary of State for Wales will have to play a vital part in bridging the gap. Sadly, I share with the right hon. Member for Devizes the idea that there are two things about which we know little more than we did at the beginning of our debates. The first is the meaningful content of the concordats dealing with such issues.

Secondly, the shadowiest figure in the Bill is the Secretary of State for Wales after devolution—[Laughter.] I mean a Secretary of State, not necessarily the present Secretary of State. The last thing that I would describe my right hon. Friend as is a shadow.

Mr. Jenkin: He is a sunny chap.

Mr. Rowlands: He may cast a shadow over some of us occasionally.

What I have described are two vital elements, which even after all this time we have not managed to flush out. Our new clause, like that of the right hon. Member for Devizes, says that, if we are to make devolution work, we at Westminster must have a profound interest in ensuring that the two hyphens, or buckles, hold, and can sustain the pressure.

I hope that, even if my right hon. Friend does not concede on our new clauses, he will come up with something more in the way of a substantive view. Before the Bill passes through both Houses of Parliament, we should have a better understanding of how concordats will work in the situations that I have described.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: New clauses 10 and 11 are about the publication of concordats and amendments to them. I listened with great care to the case advanced by the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) and to that put forward by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands).

I shall give another reason why we think greater thought should be given to the way in which the concordats are to operate. I listened with care to the scenario postulated by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney about Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food officials and beef on the bone, but I should have thought that the Welsh assembly could decide differently. I say that because such a measure would have to be introduced through secondary legislation. The regulation banning beef on the bone was, I understand, introduced by statutory instrument. It would have been possible for the Welsh assembly not to introduce it.

Mr. Rowlands: One of the great unanswered questions, which I raised earlier, is to what extent MAFF functions with regard to beef on the bone will be devolved to a Welsh assembly and, if not, what relationship the Secretary of State will have with Whitehall and the assembly on that matter. I am by no means clear whether the Bill and secondary legislation allow what the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Jones: That is my reading of the Bill. If it is not correct, I fail to understand what the assembly's powers in secondary legislation will be. The Secretary of State might wish to settle the argument.

A scenario or case study is the best way in which to test the Government's position on concordats. I want to examine the Secretary of State's written answer of 27 February to the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) on the common provisions in concordats. The right hon. Member for Devizes mentioned it in the context of arrangements for liaison on EU and international matters.

In cases such as this, there will have to be a concordat not only between the Welsh assembly and a Whitehall Department, but between the Welsh assembly and two Whitehall Departments. That is important. For example, in regard to the EU, for the relationship to work, there would have to be a concordat between the Welsh assembly and the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign Office.

Negotiations on the future of structural funds would fall within the purview of the DTI. Currently, the DTI is the lead Department in such matters. It is the common position put forward by the DTI in the Council of Ministers that carries the day. The Welsh Office has an opportunity to put forward its case, but in the Council of Ministers the vote is delivered by the President of the Board of Trade or another DTI Minister.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman talks about a concordat in relation to representation in Europe. He keeps on talking about a concordat between the assembly and one or two Whitehall Departments, but there is nothing to suggest that the assembly will have any more say than the House. The concordat will be drawn up between either officials or the First Secretary and, presumably, the Minister in the Department. My argument is that there is no democratic control or accountability. That is what I am trying to make clear, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support me in that.

Mr. Jones: The right hon. Gentleman has already said that. It would be helpful if the Secretary of State would tell us in what circumstances concordats would be signed between officials and between politicians. For example, the reply to the hon. Member for Clwyd, West says that there will be circumstances in which they will be signed by Ministers and Assembly Secretaries. It would be helpful for us to know what those circumstances might be.

Mr. Letwin: I wonder why the hon. Gentleman thinks it would be helpful if the Secretary of State told us about his speculations on the matter. That has nothing to do with the Bill. His speculations are merely speculations like those of a person in a pub.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he is not having a conversation with the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones); he is speaking to the Chair.

Mr. Jones: I do not follow the point made by the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). The written answer specifies that certain concordats will be signed between officials and certain concordats will be signed between Ministers and the assembly. The point being made is that that need not happen, but circumstances are being envisaged—although they are not legally binding.

Mr. Paterson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

9.30 pm

Mr. Jones: No. I need to make some progress.

Will there be a concordat on European matters between the Department of Trade and Industry and the assembly on issues such as structural funds, but a concordat between the Foreign Office and the assembly on representation of the assembly in the UKREP? Let us say for the sake of argument that a civil servant from the assembly is seconded to the permanent representation in Brussels. That is a function decided by the Foreign Office. Would there need to be a separate concordat on that arrangement? These are matters that need to be properly clarified.

I did not like the use of the word "sinister" by the right hon. Member for Devizes because it is provided that the details of concordats should be published. The difficulty as I see it is that in the vast majority of cases there is no opportunity for anyone other than officials to decide the contents of the concordat.

[Mr. Jones]

Let us assume that there is a concordat between an assembly official and a DTI official about the relationship between the assembly and the Council of Ministers. How will the assembly make it clear that it wishes to have better representation in Europe if the officials have denied that in the official concordat? At what stage would, say, the First Secretary of the assembly be able to discuss with a Minister in the DTI the extent of that concordat? Who would be in a position to amend the concordat if the relationship was obviously not working?

That is one reason why we believe that there should be some way in which amendments to the concordat can be discussed in the assembly. If a concordat signed between officials obviously is not working—for example, the discussion of European matters—and an amendment is proposed, it is vital that the assembly's voice is heard before the amendment is finally agreed.

I do not always share the Secretary of State's confidence about the future relationship between the assembly and Whitehall. I readily agree—he has often made the point—that the relationship is good at present. It is founded on mutual trust. I do not think that that will always be the case. I shall give the Secretary of State an example.

Let us assume that during the right hon. Gentleman's term of office a concordat is signed on sensitive European matters. Let us assume that, two general elections down the line, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) becomes President of the Board of Trade in a Conservative Government. Let us assume that he wants to tear up the concordat, as he wanted to do when he was Secretary of State for Wales. Let us be blunt about it; he did not want Wales to have any relationship with the European Union. He wanted all the negotiations to be handled here in Westminster. He did not want Wales to have any influence in Europe. If he tears up the concordat, what happens?

The Secretary of State needs to reassure those of us who generally support the move towards better relationships between Departments about what would happen in that event. We need to know that there would be some system to enable the assembly to continue with the arrangements that had been in place under a previous Government.

Mr. Öpik: New clause 11 would authorise the assembly to confirm or reject a decision on a concordat made on its behalf. To make the relationship balanced, surely this House should have the same authority. I would be interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's justification for suggesting that the assembly should have a greater power of scrutiny than the House.

Mr. Jones: I am not here to make that case—but the right hon. Member for Devizes has. He made a strong case for Westminster having the opportunity to consider the contents of the concordat, but he failed to respond to the argument that the assembly should have a similar power. Taken together, the new clauses complete the jigsaw.

The difficulty is that, because the concordats have not been drawn up yet, we are in the dark. I am sure that the Secretary of State is now aware, if he was not before, that the situation needs to be clarified. We need to be satisfied that the assembly will have real clout in its important relationships, such as that with the European Union.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be able to give the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) the reassurance that he seeks. I too read the paper that my right hon. Friend kindly and rightly placed in the Library. I do not want to seem churlish, but it does not reassure me completely.

I feel some sympathy for the person who wrote the paper because he did not know what was in the draftsman's mind—and it is always difficult to draft something when it is not clear in one's own mind. I understand his problems. At least the paper begins by saying that, basically, the aim of the concordats is "to preserve the good working relationships which currently exist"

between the Welsh Office and other Government Departments. Throughout its three pages, the hope is constantly expressed—explicitly or implicitly—that those good working relationships will continue.

Of course, as my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) pointed out, we are talking about a different situation—a different form of cohabitation. The good working relationships that now apparently exist between the Welsh Office and other Whitehall Departments need not necessarily exist between Whitehall Departments and a completely different animal—the National Assembly for Wales—for the simple reason that the assembly will not be a Whitehall Department.

In the main, Whitehall Departments have to live together. They may fight and quarrel but, at the end of the day, they have to reach an agreement, not necessarily because they want to but because they live in the same little pond and the same little village. That is not the case with the National Assembly for Wales; it will be from outside, from the next block.

The document has all the hallmarks of a demandeur, if I can use a French word.

Mr. Gareth Thomas indicated assent.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend, who is an expert in that language—as we heard earlier today—says that I am right. It is the kind of word that one hears in the Council of Ministers. To be accused of being a demandeur is a bad thing, and one does not get what one demands. The problem is that the National Assembly for Wales will be a demandeur, outside the magic circle but wanting to come in, perhaps wanting to be the chairman of the euro X committee. It will be told by those dreadful French that it cannot, because it not part of the whole magical set-up.

Right through the paper runs the demand, "Please, we want the same good working relationships." We are told that the concordat does not—the word "not" appears in strong typeface—create legal obligations. I suppose it does not, but I do not know.

Mr. Paterson: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, who is an eminent lawyer, his opinion of the idea that the concordats have no legal standing? If something goes wrong, surely the aggrieved person—perhaps the farmer in one case or the industrialist in another—will go to law and the concordat will very rapidly acquire legal standing.

Mr. Davies: I am not an eminent lawyer, but apparently eminent lawyers do not give free legal advice—I shall not mention the Lord Chancellor in this context.

Mr. Letwin: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree, from the face of the Bill and without his being any kind of lawyer, that it is evident that the subject of a concordat could become a devolution issue and that that could lead to its being adjudicated by the Judicial Committee?

Mr. Davies: Yes, indeed—they could all end up in the Judicial Committee, and lawyers, who love judicial review and have made a lot of money out of it over the past 20 years, will press the case and learned articles will be written saying that of course the matter is within the ambit of judicial review. That is the nature of things.

We are told that there should be

"co-ordination . . . to take account of the programmes for implementing new legislation"— in other words, another cry from the national assembly: "Please, please, Whitehall, let us in on implementing new legislation. Don't freeze us out, because we need to be there." Whether Whitehall will listen is another matter: if it does not need to listen or is not forced to listen, it will not listen. Again there is the real problem of how the assembly gets into the legislative process of Whitehall, with which I foresee great difficulties.

We are told that the concordats should deal with

"shared interests in matters such as EU business."

We have heard that time and again and we heard it tonight from the hon. Member for Ynys Môn. The problem as I understand it is that the lead Department in EU business, be it the Department of Trade and Industry, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food or the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, being a UK Department, will also be the Department for England.

We shall have a curious situation: the President of the Board of Trade will be not only the lead Minister for the United Kingdom, but the Minister for England. The same is true of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who will be the lead Minister for the United Kingdom and the Minister of Agriculture for England. There will be no Minister for Wales, except for the First Secretary of the National Assembly, so there is bound to be a conflict of interest. That will create difficulties, so I can understand the need for some sort of concordat; but how we are to go about it, I do not know.

We are told that, despite having the concordat and the good working relationship, the concordat must

"avoid constraining the Assembly or Whitehall Departments in their actions within their fields of competence."

We need a concordat, but it must not constrain anyone.

Mr. Grieve: Reading new clause 9, which stands in the right hon. Gentleman's name among others, it appears to me that it is a one-way street, because once the Order in Council has been made at Westminster, Buckingham palace, or wherever, the assembly will not be able to get out of it.

Mr. Davies: To some extent, I am arguing that it is a one-way street. On the one hand there will be a working relationship but, on the other and according to the document, that relationship

"must not constrain . . . Whitehall Departments", and, of course, Whitehall will not want to be constrained. Why should it be constrained by the little kid in the next street? Why should Whitehall be constrained by the Welsh assembly? It will have no interest in being constrained by the Welsh assembly; it will carry on in its own way.

We are moving back halfway to the position that existed before there was a Welsh Office. That is a consequence of devolution and I do not criticise it. When there was no Welsh Office, Welsh matters were dealt with in Whitehall Departments. Then, because of the pressure, the Welsh Office was set up. Gradually it built up, and now—eventually—it has a good working relationship with other Whitehall Departments. At the start, it was difficult.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: That is an interesting issue. I became a civil servant at the Welsh Office within 12 or 14 months of its being set up. Slightly older civil servants have described to me the change in relationships that took place on the setting up of the Welsh Office as a separate Cabinet Department; that change in relationships was not unlike what is being talked of now. There was a step change in the relationship and the demandeur relationship that my right hon. Friend is describing was a feature of what happened to the Welsh Office when it became a separate Department of state.

I remember that, when we were trying to demand that the Royal Mint be moved to Llantrisant, that the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre be moved to Swansea and that a section of the Department of Trade and Industry be moved to Cardiff, all at the same time, we could not work out whether it was a good or a bad thing to aim at all three. In the end, we aimed at all three and got all three. That was an example of a new Department of State being able to do a great deal of demanding all at the same time.

9.45 pm

Mr. Davies: Yes, indeed. It became, and remains, a mature Department of State. In so doing, it ceased to be a demandeur and became part of the set-up.

However, now we are moving backwards again. We are dismantling that situation and must almost start again—or at least move halfway back to where we were before 1964, when the Welsh Office was set up. Again we find the Welsh assembly seeking somehow to obtain an agreement to constrain the other side. Whitehall Departments do not need the Welsh assembly.

The Treasury will consider that, once it has given the Welsh assembly £7 billion to spend on health and education, for example, that is the end of the matter: Whitehall will have performed its obligation. Whitehall will ask, "What on earth is all this about legislation? The Welsh are being given £7 billion and they should be grateful. Go away, spend it and come back next year, when they will probably get another £7 billion plus whatever the rate of inflation might be. Why should they return to Whitehall, demanding this, demanding that?"

[Mr. Davies]

According to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn, two agreements are being demanded with one Department. That is unrealistic and reveals a lack of understanding of the realpolitik in government and the bargaining that takes place.

We are told, in paragraph 5 of the document:

"The aim on both sides should . . . be 'no surprises'."

There should be no surprises on the part of the National Assembly for Wales—we would not wish to be the subject of surprises from Big Brother in Whitehall—but why should Big Brother in Whitehall worry about surprises coming from the little National Assembly for Wales? The aim of "no surprises" is to put constraints on Whitehall Departments, so that they do not surprise us.

We are not equal partners in the agreement, whether or not there is an intention to create legal relations. We are not equal parties to the contract, and that is the real problem. Whitehall will not be malicious; Whitehall will not need to look at us, because Whitehall will have paid us the money, having written the cheque, thinking, "Those Welsh—they can go off and do their own thing." That is the worry and the reality.

I conclude with this. We are told that there is to be consultation with United Kingdom-Great Britain public bodies. We are told that there will be consultation about "the exercise of Ministerial functions relating to such bodies, such as giving directions or approving corporate plans".

There will need to be separate memorandums of understanding for each body. Which bodies are they? Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will give us a list of those bodies.

There may be concordats on

"operational agency arrangements"—

we are almost back to local government again—

"whereby matters are administered by the UK Government on behalf of the National Assembly on an agency basis or vice versa."

What agency matters will be imposed or agreed by the National Assembly on behalf of UK Government or vice versa? May we have a few examples?

There may be a concordat on

"arrangements for resolving disagreements about any matters related to the concordat"— another grand concordat to judge the little concordats. Is that realistic? It would take a long time to draft.

We are told that there will be an official committee, with a rotating chairman—going round and round—to report at intervals to Assembly Secretaries and Ministers on the operation of the concordat. Will there be a grand weekend conference with the rotating chairman? "How is it working now? How does the assembly like these concordats?" That is entirely and completely unrealistic within the reality and the brutishness, sometimes, of government. We are told that there will be signing at senior official level, and only occasionally at ministerial level.

I do not criticise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Obviously he has done his best with the document. I am sure that no better could have been done with it, because the relationship is unstable, unequal and unrealistic. Yes, we have devolution. Yes, most people in Wales have wanted it. However, there are consequences. As lawyers would say, there are burdens and benefits. Being frozen out of Whitehall or being in a halfway house is one of the burdens. I hope that we can find some benefits.

Mr. Ron Davies: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) for his comments. I am grateful that he took the trouble to read the report of our debate on 2 March. It was a full and substantive debate, and I remind the House that many of the questions that we have been debating today were raised on 2 March, and that full answers were given. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for acknowledging that. I shall reply to the points that have been made on the three clauses, and then I shall deal with any other questions that are raised.

Each of the new clauses refers to concordats, and seeks to put them on a statutory footing. Certain procedural requirements are set out that would apply to them. We have made it clear consistently since the White Paper was published, and in a statement of principles that I published on 27 February, that it will be important to have clear mutual understandings about the working relationship between the assembly and Government Departments. We have been equally clear that it would be unhelpful to turn these into law. That is why the concordats we propose are not intended to be statutory.

Our aim is to preserve the good working relationships that my Department currently has with other Whitehall Departments, so that the business of governance in Wales continues to be conducted smoothly and efficiently. Concordats will set the framework for administrative co-operation and exchange of information dealing with the current processes and the main features of good working relationships.

Concordats already exist between the Welsh Office and local government. These are not legal agreements or agreements that are subject to the affirmative procedure. They are agreements entered into between myself as Secretary of State and the 22 unitary authorities in Wales. They set out the basis on which we consult, respect one another and ensure that the good business of government in Wales is conducted. That is an example of how concordats will work in practice. Suggestions that practical working arrangements should have a legal basis or be subject to procedures of the House are fanciful.

Mr. Ancram: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall not give way. The right hon. Gentleman had the opportunity to put his points at length, and I want to reply to them. If there is sufficient time, he can come back at me.

It might assist the House if I give some specific examples of matters that I expect to be covered in concordats. The ground to be covered in each document will need to be settled by the assembly and the Government Department concerned. To answer the question of the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones), the documents will be signed by the assembly. If a concordat related to political matters, an Assembly Secretary would sign it, together with a Minister. In other circumstances, it may be that, if the concordat related to working arrangements between civil servants, it would be signed at that level.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn is correct in assuming that there will be different concordats relating, to take the example he gave, to the Department of Trade and Industry on the one hand and the Foreign Office on the other. Those concordats will have to be mutually compatible. However, different concordats will be entered into with the objective of ensuring that matters such as Welsh representations to the European Union are conducted in a way that minimises friction and ensures that the voice of Wales is heard properly. That is an example of how the concordats will work.

I understand that some hon. Members, such as the right hon. Member for Devizes, can think only in terms of conflict. It just goes to show what an outdated mindset the Conservative party has. We are entering an era of new politics, when it is possible to co-operate and put aside party political differences in the interests of better government. When the right hon. Gentleman understands that, he will be in a better position to argue his case at the Dispatch Box.

Concordats would cover consultation arrangements in relation to proposals for legislation and Executive action, such as the exchange of information, including policy papers, analysis and statistics; and joint working, including participation in working groups, official committees and so on. They are two-way processes. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) raised the question of confidential information. When a party requires confidentiality, that will have to be written into the concordat and respected.

Concordats will need to address those issues in the context not only of domestic policy and legislation but of the European Union. The assembly's role in policy discussions, both in the United Kingdom and in Europe, on matters within its field of responsibility will therefore be a central feature of relevant concordats. In line with current arrangements, the concordats will provide for matters such as access to relevant papers, attendance at interdepartmental meetings, consultation with the assembly about the development of the United Kingdom negotiating line, and participation in United Kingdom delegations to Brussels. They are precisely the points that were raised during the debate.

New clause 10 would require concordats to be published within a week of having been agreed. The assembly's concordats will be published documents, but I do not believe that it is necessary or appropriate for the legislation to specify the timing of publication. I informed the right hon. Gentleman in a written answer on 10 March that any draft concordats produced by my Department in preparation for the assembly will be published subject to the provisos mentioned in the Government's White Paper on freedom of information. I do not expect the drafts to be ready until well after the Bill has completed its passage through Parliament.

That underlines my point that concordats are practical documents that deal with working relationships rather than matters that need to feature on the face of legislation. The terms of concordats will be agreed between the assembly and Government Departments after the assembly has been elected. As new clause 5 suggests, there is no case for requiring these documents about working arrangements to be subject to prior approval by both Houses of Parliament.

New clause 9 suggests that it is necessary to have an order in council providing for the assembly and Government Departments to agree concordats between them. If the Government thought that the assembly needed any specific power to enter into concordats, we would have included that in the Bill. I am afraid that I cannot offer my hon. Friend any encouragement regarding new clause 9. New clause 11 would require all amendments to concordats to be agreed by a majority vote at a meeting of the assembly. That unnecessarily threatens the discretion of the assembly to decide how it wishes to approve them.

This afternoon, we have seen a synthetic exercise in indignation from the right hon. Member for Devizes. He realises that he can do little to prevent the passage of this legislation into law—he is simply looking for an excuse to call a Division.

Mr. Jenkin: The Secretary of State has succeeded in creating a fog of complete confusion about the nature of concordats. More ridiculous even than his other comments was his suggestion that he already has a concordat with local government in Wales. What sort of concordat did he have with the Cardiff county council regarding the siting of the assembly? He had no such concordat, because, for an agreement to exist, it must be based upon a common source of authority.

The description of a concordat says that it should set the ground rules. It states that there will be arrangements for resolving disagreements, but that they are not intended to be legally binding. When is an agreement an agreement? An agreement is not an agreement unless the parties have some recourse to an independent arbiter who will decide what that agreement should be.

Mr. Öpik: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jenkin: No, I am sorry, I only have one minute.

Is the assembly or the assembly Executive a legal personality separate from the Westminster Parliament and the Whitehall Government? Even though they have a common civil service, they will be separate legal personalities, because they will have separate masters and separate agendas. The agreements, which will be published, will be the subject of disputes, and are bound to finish up in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. They will be used as evidence of a contract between those two separate legal personalities, and will be the governing arrangements between two separate Administrations.

If the Secretary of State is confident that the agreements will not be legally enforceable, he should give the House that guarantee.

It being Ten o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER , pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

The House divided: Ayes 129, Noes 309.

Division No. 231] [10 pm

AYES

Amess, David	Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael	Baldry, Tony
Arbuthnot, James	Bercow, John
Atkinson, David (Bour'mth E)	Beresford, Sir Paul

Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Mrs Virginia
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Browning, Mrs Angela
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Burns, Simon
Butterfill, John
Cash, William
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James
Clark, Rt Hon Alan (Kensington)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Collins, Tim
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cran, James
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davies, Quentin (Grantham)
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fox, Dr Liam
Fraser, Christopher
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hawkins, Nick
Hayes, John
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Horam, John
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Key, Robert
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lilley, Rt Hon Peter
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
McIntosh, Miss Anne
MacKay, Andrew
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Maples, John
Mates, Michael
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Norman, Archie
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Rowe, Andrew (Faversham)
Ruffley, David
St Aubyn, Nick
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shephard, Rt Hon Mrs Gillian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Soames, Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Sir Teddy
Townend, John
Tredinnick, David
Trend, Michael
Tyrie, Andrew
Viggers, Peter
Walter, Robert
Wardle, Charles
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Willetts, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Stephen Day and
Mr. Nigel Waterson.

NOES

Ainger, Nick
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Armstrong, Ms Hilary
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Baker, Norman
Barnes, Harry
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Bell, Martin (Tatton)
Bell, Stuart (Middlesbrough)
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Blackman, Liz
Blears, Ms Hazel
Blizzard, Bob
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brinton, Mrs Helen
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnett, John
Caborn, Richard
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell, Mrs Anne (C'bridge)
Campbell, Menzies (NE Fife)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Caplin, Ivor
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Rt Hon Dr David (S Shields)
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John (Copeland)
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darling, Rt Hon Alistair
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Denham, John
Dewar, Rt Hon Donald
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, Rt Hon Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drown, Ms Julia
Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Eagle, Angela (Wallasey)
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Fatchett, Derek
Fearn, Ronnie
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Fisher, Mark
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Goggins, Paul
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hanson, David
Harman, Rt Hon Ms Harriet
Harris, Dr Evan
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Dr Lynne (Selly Oak)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kirkwood, Archy
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David

Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Livsey, Richard
Llwyd, Elfyn
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McNamara, Kevin
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Mandelson, Peter
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheff'ld Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morley, Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Bill (Normanton)
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Organ, Mrs Diana
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Prescott, Rt Hon John
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quin, Ms Joyce
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Reid, Dr John (Hamilton N)
Rendel, David
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Ruddock, Ms Joan
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Short, Rt Hon Clare
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Rt Hon Chris (Islington S)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, Jacqui (Redditch)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Southworth, Ms Helen
Spellar, John
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Rt Hon Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Tyler, Paul
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
White, Brian
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Willis, Phil
Wills, Michael
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Worthington, Tony
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Clive Betts and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 3

TIME OF ORDINARY ELECTIONS.

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Win Griffiths): I beg to move amendment No. 74, in page 2, line 36, at end insert—

'( ) No order shall be made under subsection (3), and no order in connection with an ordinary election subsequent to the first shall be made under subsection (4), unless the Secretary of State has consulted the Assembly.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 183, in clause 4, page 2, line 38, leave out from 'have' to end of line 2 on page 3 and insert

'one vote (referred to in this Act as a constituency vote).

(2) The constituency vote is to be given for a candidate to be the Assembly member for the Assembly constituency.

(3) There shall also be calculated an additional member vote for each registered political party which has submitted a list of candidates to be Assembly members for the Assembly electoral region in which the Assembly constituency is included.

(3A) The additional member vote for each party shall be the same as the constituency vote of the candidate of the party in that constituency.'.

No. 211, in page 2, line 43, after '(a)', insert

'a candidate who is a member of'.

Government amendment No. 75.

No. 184, in clause 5, page 3, leave out lines 24 and 25.

No. 185, in page 3, leave out lines 32 to 43.

No. 186, in clause 6, page 4, line 3, leave out 'electoral region' and insert 'additional member'.

No. 187, in page 4, leave out lines 10 to 13.

No. 188, in page 4, leave out lines 15 to 18 and insert

'for a registered political party under subsection (1)(b) is referred to in this Act as the electoral region figure for that party.'.

No. 189, in clause 7, page 4, line 20,, leave out 'or individual candidate'.

No. 190, in page 4, line 22,, leave out 'or individual candidate'.

No. 191, in page 4, leave out lines 33 and 34.

No. 212, in page 4, line 36, leave out

'in which they appear on the list'

and insert

'of the number of votes cast for the candidates'.

No. 192, in page 4, line 44, leave out 'or individual candidates'.

No. 193, in page 5, leave out lines 4 to 8 and insert

'a recalculation has been carried out under section 6(1)(b) after adding one to the number of votes given for each party with that electoral region figure.'.

No. 194, in page 5, line 10, leave out 'or individual candidates'.

No. 195, in clause 8, page 5, line 17, leave out from 'vacancy' to end of line 20 and insert

', the Assembly member for the Assembly constituency shall be returned under the simple majority system.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(3A) No election held under this section shall call into question the election of Assembly members for the Assembly electoral region in which the Assembly constituency is included at the last ordinary election.'.

No. 196, in clause 9, page 5, line 39, leave out from '(2)' to second 'the' in line 40.

No. 216, in page 5, line 44, leave out 'that list' and insert

'the list from which the Assembly member whose seat is vacant was returned.'.

No. 213, in page 6, line 6, leave out from 'them' to end and insert

'received the greater number of votes.'.

No. 197, in page 6, leave out lines 12 to 15 and insert

'there is no-one who satisfies the conditions in subsection (3).'.

No. 24, in clause 11, page 7, line 11, leave out

'any provision of, or made under,'

and insert 'the provisions of'.

No. 23, in page 7, line 12, leave out from 'Acts' to end of line 14.

No. 25, in page 7, line 22, at end insert

'and

(d) substitute for any provision requiring the payment of a deposit a provision requiring the signatures of a specified number of electors.'.

Government amendment No. 153.

Mr. Griffiths: In Committee, we undertook to consider further whether the order-making powers in clause 3 to adjust dates of elections might be exercised by the assembly rather than the Secretary of State.

Generally speaking, the Government's approach is for the House and those directly accountable to it to be responsible for electoral matters relating to the assembly. We recognise, however, that Members of the Assembly would have a legitimate self-interest in decisions concerning the dates of elections. They would be well placed to advise the Secretary of State in taking his decision. Accordingly, we propose that the order-making powers should be properly exercised by the Secretary of State in consultation with the assembly. Amendment No. 74 would provide for that eventuality.

Amendment No. 75 responds to the issues raised in Committee. Hon. Members will recall the concerns expressed that the Bill as drafted might prevent parties from submitting a party list comprising one name only. It was certainly not the intention to rule out single-name lists. As promised, the Government have considered the matter, and I am pleased to offer the House the clarification that amendment No. 75 provides. It confirms that parties will be able to submit a single name for an electoral region.

Amendment No. 153 is a technical amendment. Under clause 11(5), the return of an Assembly Member at an election may not be questioned except under the provisions of part III of the Representation of the People Act 1983 as applied by or incorporated in order made by the Secretary of State. Part III of the 1983 Act provides for an election to be challenged by means of an election petition. The purpose of the amendment is to clarify that in the context of the clause and to establish consistency with clause 15(3)(a), which makes what would otherwise be the first reference to an election petition but does not cite the legislative source.

Mr. Ancram: I should like to speak to amendment No. 183 and the other amendments standing in my name and the names of my hon. Friends that are effectively consequent upon the amendment. I do so in the light of points that were raised earlier, to which I must briefly return because they set out the reasons for our concern in tabling the amendments.

The present system of voting as proposed in clause 4 allows for two votes that will be cast separately. The first vote will be for direct elections to constituencies, in the same way as hon. Members representing Welsh constituencies are elected at the moment and on the same constituency boundaries. The second will be for constituency parties or individuals that will be aggregated over a given region yet to be determined, although it is likely to be the European constituencies of the past. That total aggregated vote will then be dealt with under what is known as the d'Hondt system. Success in the direct elections is taken into account in dividing the aggregate vote before the ranking of that vote takes place to decide how many seats are won on the regional list. It is even more complicated than that, but I will not go through it all now.

The real problem arises because there is a distinct possibility of abusing the system, which is designed to create proportionality, in a way that defeats proportionality. That is done by what has become known as split-ticket voting. That is nothing new; it happens in Germany, where there is an additional member system. The difference here is that it is possible, under the provisions of the Bill, to register parties which are essentially identical but pass under different names—Plaid Cymru for the direct elections and the National Party for Wales for the regional list; the Labour party for the direct elections and the Independent Labour party for the regional list; the Conservatives and the Unionists, and so on.

If a split-ticket vote of this kind is achieved, the effect of the d'Hondt divider is totally avoided. Thereby representation of a party can be substantially increased on the regional list. The figures I gave the last time we debated the subject showed that, on 1 May last year, had there been a Labour party for the direct elections and an Independent Labour party for the regional list, the difference would have been between 64 seats under the system as it should work, and 91 seats under the system if it were distorted in this way. That clearly shows that the purpose of what has been sold by the Government as a proportional system could be completely defeated.

We have been looking for ways to prevent that. I originally tabled an amendment that sought to ensure representation across the two lists. The Government asked me to withdraw it, and said that they would think about the matter further. I then asked whether we would be able to see the draft of the registration of political parties legislation, which we now expect to see after Easter. I had hoped to find there a solution that would prevent the registration of identical parties—parties which I have in the past called alter ego parties. The Minister said at the time that he would examine that legislation to see whether it would deal with those issues. Unfortunately—we have already had an argument about this today—that legislation is not before us, so we cannot tell whether it will provide an answer.

All I have been able to get is the Government's submission to the Neill committee, attached to a written answer on 9 March, setting out in general terms what the Bill will contain. It takes us no further forward:

"The Registration Bill will have two key purposes. These will be to give a formal legal status to 'registered' political parties and thus enable them to field lists of candidates for the proportional representation systems proposed for the elections to",

among others, the

"National Assembly for Wales"; and secondly, to

"prevent the use of misleading descriptions . . . In order to achieve these purposes, it is intended that the Bill should provide for compulsory registration" in certain circumstances, and the "voluntary registration of any other political parties".

There is no qualification or restriction—nothing to say that there will be any way of preventing alter ego parties or hence the manipulation of the system to which I have referred.

I reluctantly accept that this Bill will leave the House before we know whether the registration of parties Bill will deal with what is, on any view, an attempt to avoid the purposes behind this system. That is why we have tabled another amendment tonight. I realise that it has its shortcomings; I am sure that the Minister will tell me that it will get in the way of individuals standing for the regional list.

However, instead of giving two votes that could be exercised on a split-ticket basis, the amendment allows only one vote. That vote would be cast initially for the candidate in the direct election constituency, and thereafter it would be counted within a given region as the party vote. Thus the same votes will be used for the same purposes. A vote cast for Plaid Cymru in the direct elections will be counted as a Plaid Cymru vote in the regional lists, and could not be counted under any other nomenclature. The same would apply to a Labour or a Conservative vote. Unless we find a solution to that problem, we shall build into the system something that will discredit the assembly in its infancy and undermine its credibility in the long term.

On 2 March, the Minister referred to that practice by saying:

"Such cynical manipulation of the system would be an affront to the electorate and would undermine the democratic credibility of the elected body."—[Official Report, 2 March 1998; Vol. 307, c. 804.]

Given those words, the Minister has a responsibility to find a solution to that problem. The simplest solution should be in the registration of political parties Bill. Whether it will be, we do not know.

Mr. Leigh: I am trying to follow my right hon. Friend's argument, but I do not understand the problem. I accept that proportional representation systems are complex, but I do not understand why someone cannot vote once, and why the votes cannot be aggregated between the parties. It seems such a fair and obvious solution that I cannot think why everybody does not accept it.

Mr. Ancram: That is precisely what my amendment sets out to do. I accept that the Government want individual candidates on the regional lists, and will turn down the amendment because it prevents that from happening, for technical reasons. My hon. Friend is absolutely right: this is the simplest and quickest way to deal with the problem. In the absence of that solution, we shall need to look for an answer in the registration of political parties legislation. I regret that the draft legislation is not available to us today. It is wrong to ask us to consider such an important matter without all the available information, particularly as it must be available somewhere if the Bill is to be published in a week or two.

In the light of his comments about the unacceptability of potential abuse of that system, if the Minister will not accept my amendment, which I shall seek to press, I hope that he can find another way to proceed.

Mr. Livsey: Amendments Nos. 211, 212 and 213 seek to provide for open-list voting for the additional member part of the elections. Amendment No. 211 provides that the second vote of each elector will be for a candidate on a list. Amendment No. 212 changes the counting system so that candidates on a list are elected in the order of votes cast, not according to the order in which the party has placed them. Amendment No. 213 deals with vacancies in electoral region seats under the open-list system created by amendment No. 211. It provides that a vacant seat is allocated to the person on the list who receives the next highest number of votes.

Under the system that Liberal Democrats would adopt, candidates for electoral regions would be listed on the ballot paper in alphabetical order by party. Electors would use their votes to vote for a candidate on the list, as opposed to a party, as in the Bill.

The issue of open and closed lists was discussed extensively during the passage of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill. As a compromise, my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) tabled amendments to create open lists in which voters would have the option of voting for a party or for a candidate. Voters who voted for a party would be deemed to have accepted the order of candidates selected by the party. That would have given voters an opportunity to express a view on the party list—an opportunity that is lacking in the Bill.

The Home Secretary considered that option carefully, but decided at the last minute not to accept the amendments. He said that the system of providing a choice between a party and a candidate suffered from a fundamental and incurable weakness, in that voters' preferences for individual candidates were not necessarily translated into electoral success. He argued that that was because a significant proportion of voters vote for the party, and individual votes for candidates on the list were unlikely to change the order of candidates.

Amendments Nos 211 to 213 address that argument by giving voters a completely open list, with a real opportunity to elect the candidates whom they prefer. As part of the consultation process, during deliberations on the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, research on the issue of open and closed lists was carried out. A poll of 1,130 people by Professor Patrick Dunleavy of the London school of economics concluded

"it is likely that a clear majority of voters . . . would prefer to see an open list."

There are other examples, which I will not go into now; but the overwhelming evidence is that voters prefer open lists.

[Mr. Livsey]

10.30 pm

Open lists allow voters to choose candidates from within parties, expressing preferences for men or women or for ethnic-minority candidates. The only possible argument against open lists is party management. As the poll evidence shows, voters do not like having candidates imposed on them. Open lists are not more likely to lead to fighting between candidates in the same party if they are controlled by a single agent for each party, who oversees a budget.

The voting system used for the first elections to the assembly must have the confidence of the Welsh people. The amendments would increase their confidence, and might encourage more participation in a fair and open electoral system.

Mr. Win Griffiths: The issues raised by amendments Nos 183, 184 and 191 to 196 are important, and I do not dismiss for a moment the questions raised by the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). We have given a great deal of thought to the matter and to the various solutions that have been suggested, but I am not convinced that there is an answer that can be provided for in electoral law. The various solutions that have been suggested are, in many ways, more undemocratic than the circumstances that they seek to address.

The solution presented by this group of amendments, for example, would undermine the democratic credentials of assembly elections in three ways. First, voters would be allowed only one vote—for the constituency candidate. If voters want to vote for the candidate of one party in the constituency, and for the list of another party in the electoral region, why should they not have that choice?

Mr. Leigh: Why should they want to do that?

Mr. Griffiths: The record shows that, in countries where there is an additional member system, voters can be quite sophisticated in voting for an outstanding individual who may or may not be a member of their party. Also, in voting for additional members, they may decide that, given the luck of the way in which the election may turn out, it would be just as well to vote for some members of a party in order to retain a reasonable balance in the politics of their country.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok): In many parts of my country, people vote for the most prominent anti-Conservative candidate under the first-past-the-post system in order to defeat the Conservatives, and then want to vote for the candidate of their choice in the list system. The system that is now being proposed would stop the people of Wales uniting to back the most popular anti-Conservative candidates in individual constituencies, which must surely be a bad development.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his Scottish contribution, which was full of wisdom.

We believe that smaller parties' main hope of winning seats in the assembly may be the party list vote in the electoral region. We in the new Labour party are now so inclusive that we want to give everyone—even the Conservatives—a chance, by having an additional member system anyway. Such a system would enable smaller parties to maximise their potential for party list seats if they ran candidates in one electoral region, but it would not be helpful if they had to run candidates everywhere, as was proposed earlier.

Moreover, as the right hon. Member for Devizes pointed out, his system, as outlined in amendment No 183 et al, would prevent independents from being able to run in electoral regions.

There are questions to be asked about ticket voting, and we must ask them, but there is also a danger of overstating the likelihood of the potential for collusion being realised. I have already said that it would take a very sophisticated degree of cynicism within or among parties to attempt such a manipulation of the system.

I am sure that, if there were any attempts at such collusion, the vigilance of other political parties and the media would soon expose it. I do not think that exposure would reflect well on the guilty party with the electorate, and that in itself would be a real deterrent. It is in parties' own interests not to undermine the democratic integrity of the assembly by cynical manipulation.

Mr. Ancram rose—

Mr. Griffiths: Just a moment. I shall give the right hon. Gentleman the chance to speak shortly.

On behalf of the Labour party, I am prepared to say publicly and openly that my party will not try to deceive the electorate by entering into any such collusion. It would be easy for all the other parties in the House to make a similar commitment, which would kill the split ticket idea altogether.

Mr. Ancram: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is sincere in his offer; whether he can deliver on it is another matter. I do not know how the Labour party is organised these days, so I do not know whether, when he talks about "my party", he is talking merely for the Labour party in Wales.

Indeed, the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) has just told us that that is precisely what he and his colleagues in Glasgow intend to organise between the Labour party and the Co-operative movement. So there are already signs that such activity is being planned in one part of the Labour party in the United Kingdom, even as we are being made a kind offer that it will not happen in another part of the Labour party in the United Kingdom. Will the Minister accept from me the thought that it is just that type of divided view within his party that causes me great unease on the subject?

Mr. Griffiths: I have made it clear what the position in Wales will be, and I am sure that we can think of ways of ensuring that such things do not happen, and electors are not given the wrong impression about what people really represent.

Mr. Livsey: May I assure the Minister that my party would not wish to abuse the system, either.

Mr. Griffiths: I am pleased to hear that.

Amendments Nos. 211 to 213, to which the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) spoke, were designed to give voters in the list system the opportunity of looking at a list with all the potential candidates on the ballot paper.

The voting procedure is new, and we want it to be as simple and straightforward as possible. Everybody will know exactly who is standing on each party list, and if people have a preference for one list as opposed to another, under our system they can vote for the party that offers the best list. Notices will be prominently displayed in polling stations, and parties will be able to circulate fully all their lists in each of the electoral regions. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman will not press his amendments.

As for amendments Nos. 24 and 23, I remind the House that the purpose of clause 11(3)(a) is to enable us to draw up orders relating to the procedure for assembly elections that are appropriate for elections under the additional member system.

We shall introduce an elections procedure order in the autumn, and we want to make it as elector-friendly as possible. Because of the additional member system, we want to be able to take into account more than the Representation of the People Act, and we shall ensure that the order will be subject to an affirmative resolution in each House of Parliament before it can come into force.

Mr. Ancram: Will the Minister explain to the electors in Wales how the d'Hondt divisor works?

Mr. Griffiths: A research paper in the Library explains that. As a former Member of the European Parliament, I am well aware of how that system works.

Amendment No. 25 is a departure from the practice of requiring candidates to be supported by deposits in favour of lists of voters backing potential candidates. I want to give hon. Members the opportunity to vote on the matters that concern them. We do not want to depart from the established practice of deposits. It is a useful discipline. If signatures had to be collected, they would have to be verified, and a decision would have to be made on what was a reasonable number. Returning officers would have to do all that at a time when they were busy enough.

I appreciate what Plaid Cymru is trying to do in broadening the scope for candidature, but the Government want to stick to some sort of a deposit. I promise that it is not likely to be onerous. Therefore, I hope that amendment No. 25 will be withdrawn.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 4

VOTING AT ORDINARY ELECTIONS

Amendment proposed: No. 183, in page 2, line 38, leave out from 'have' to end of line 2 on page 3 and insert

'one vote (referred to in this Act as a constituency vote).

(2) The constituency vote is to be given for a candidate to be the Assembly member for the Assembly constituency.

(3) There shall also be calculated an additional member vote for each registered political party which has submitted a list of candidates to be Assembly members for the Assembly electoral region in which the Assembly constituency is included.

(3A) The additional member vote for each party shall be the same as the constituency vote of the candidate of the party in that constituency.'.—[Mr. Ancram.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 119, Noes 272.

Division No. 232] [10.41 pm

AYES

Amess, David
Ancram, Rt Hon Michael
Atkinson, David (Bour'mth E)
Atkinson, Peter (Hexham)
Baldry, Tony
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Blunt, Crispin
Body, Sir Richard
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter (Worthing W)
Bottomley, Rt Hon Mrs Virginia
Brazier, Julian
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Bruce, Ian (S Dorset)
Burns, Simon
Butterfill, John
Cash, William
Chope, Christopher
Clappison, James
Clark, Rt Hon Alan (Kensington)
Clifton-Brown, Geoffrey
Collins, Tim
Colvin, Michael
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cran, James
Curry, Rt Hon David
Davies, Quentin (Grantham)
Davis, Rt Hon David (Haltemprice)
Duncan Smith, Iain
Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Evans, Nigel
Faber, David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Michael
Flight, Howard
Forth, Rt Hon Eric
Fox, Dr Liam
Fraser, Christopher
Gibb, Nick
Gill, Christopher
Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gray, James
Green, Damian
Greenway, John
Grieve, Dominic
Gummer, Rt Hon John
Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Hammond, Philip
Hawkins, Nick
Hayes, John
Heald, Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Horam, John
Howarth, Gerald (Aldershot)
Hunter, Andrew
Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Jackson, Robert (Wantage)
Jenkin, Bernard
Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Key, Robert
Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Lansley, Andrew
Leigh, Edward
Letwin, Oliver
Lewis, Dr Julian (New Forest E)
Lloyd, Rt Hon Sir Peter (Fareham)
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
McIntosh, Miss Anne
Maclean, Rt Hon David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Malins, Humfrey
Mates, Michael
Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
May, Mrs Theresa
Moss, Malcolm
Norman, Archie
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Paterson, Owen
Pickles, Eric
Prior, David
Redwood, Rt Hon John
Robathan, Andrew
Robertson, Laurence (Tewk'b'ry)
Ruffley, David
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shephard, Rt Hon Mrs Gillian
Simpson, Keith (Mid-Norfolk)
Soames, Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spring, Richard
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Streeter, Gary
Swayne, Desmond
Syms, Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Townend, John
Trend, Michael
Tyrie, Andrew
Walter, Robert
Wardle, Charles
Wells, Bowen
Whitney, Sir Raymond
Whittingdale, John
Widdecombe, Rt Hon Miss Ann
Willetts, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann (Congleton)
Winterton, Nicholas (Macclesfield)
Yeo, Tim
Young, Rt Hon Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Nigel Waterson and
Mr. Stephen Day.

NOES

Ainger, Nick
Allan, Richard
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Baker, Norman
Barnes, Harry
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Betts, Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blizzard, Bob
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnett, John
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell, Menzies (NE Fife)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Rt Hon Dr David (S Shields)
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John (Copeland)
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Dalyell, Tam
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Edward (Kingston)
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, Rt Hon Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drown, Ms Julia
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Fatchett, Derek
Fearn, Ronnie
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Don (Bath)
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hanson, David
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keetch, Paul
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
King, Ms Oona (Bethnal Green)
Kirkwood, Archy
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Livsey, Richard
Llwyd, Elfyn
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McNamara, Kevin
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Meale, Alan
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morley, Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Öpik, Lembit
Organ, Mrs Diana
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Rendel, David
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sanders, Adrian
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Rt Hon Chris (Islington S)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Soley, Clive
Southworth, Ms Helen
Squire, Ms Rachel
Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Steinberg, Gerry
Stevenson, George
Stoate, Dr Howard
Stott, Roger
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Gerry
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)
Taylor, David (NW Leics)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)
Timms, Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mark
Touhig, Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)
Twigg, Derek (Halton)
Tyler, Paul
Walley, Ms Joan
Wareing, Robert N
Watts, David
Webb, Steve
Wicks, Malcolm
Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Wills, Michael
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Wise, Audrey
Worthington, Tony
Wray, James
Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Kevin Hughes and
Mr. Robert Ainsworth.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 5

ADDITIONAL MEMBER SYSTEM: PARTY LISTS AND INDIVIDUAL CANDIDATES

Amendment made: No. 75, in page 3, leave out line 19 and insert—

'(3) The list must not include more than twelve persons (but may include only one).'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 7

ADDITIONAL MEMBER SYSTEM: RETURN OF MEMBERS

Amendment proposed: No. 212, in page 4, line 36, leave out

'in which they appear on the list'

and insert

'of the number of votes cast for the candidates'.—[Mr. Livsey.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 25, Noes 248.

Division No. 233] [10.53 pm

AYES

Allan, Richard
Baker, Norman
Beith, Rt Hon A J
Burnett, John
Campbell, Menzies (NE Fife)
Fearn, Ronnie
Foster, Don (Bath)
George, Andrew (St Ives)
Harris, Dr Evan
Harvey, Nick
Jones, Ieuan Wyn (Ynys Môn)
Jones, Nigel (Cheltenham)
Keetch, Paul
Kirkwood, Archy
Livsey, Richard
Llwyd, Elfyn
Öpik, Lembit
Rendel, David
Russell, Bob (Colchester)
Sanders, Adrian
Smith, Sir Robert (W Ab'd'ns)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Tyler, Paul
Webb, Steve
Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Andrew Stunell and
Mr. Edward Davey.

NOES

Ainger, Nick
Allen, Graham
Anderson, Donald (Swansea E)
Anderson, Janet (Rossendale)
Ashton, Joe
Atherton, Ms Candy
Barnes, Harry
Battle, John
Bayley, Hugh
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, Andrew F
Benton, Joe
Bermingham, Gerald
Berry, Roger
Best, Harold
Blackman, Liz
Blizzard, Bob
Borrow, David
Bradley, Peter (The Wrekin)
Brown, Rt Hon Nick (Newcastle E)
Brown, Russell (Dumfries)
Browne, Desmond
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Campbell, Alan (Tynemouth)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Canavan, Dennis
Casale, Roger
Caton, Martin
Chaytor, David
Chisholm, Malcolm
Church, Ms Judith
Clapham, Michael
Clark, Rt Hon Dr David (S Shields)
Clark, Dr Lynda (Edinburgh Pentlands)
Clarke, Rt Hon Tom (Coatbridge)
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Ann
Coaker, Vernon
Coffey, Ms Ann
Coleman, Iain
Colman, Tony
Connarty, Michael
Cook, Frank (Stockton N)
Cooper, Yvette
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Corston, Ms Jean
Cousins, Jim
Cryer, John (Hornchurch)
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr John (Copeland)
Cunningham, Jim (Cov'try S)
Darvill, Keith
Davey, Valerie (Bristol W)
Davidson, Ian
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Rt Hon Ron (Caerphilly)
Dawson, Hilton
Dean, Mrs Janet
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, Rt Hon Frank
Donohoe, Brian H
Doran, Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drown, Ms Julia
Eagle, Maria (L'pool Garston)
Edwards, Huw
Ellman, Mrs Louise
Ennis, Jeff
Fatchett, Derek
Field, Rt Hon Frank
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Rt Hon Derek
Foster, Michael J (Worcester)
Foulkes, George
Fyfe, Maria
Galloway, George
Gapes, Mike
Gibson, Dr Ian
Gilroy, Mrs Linda
Godman, Norman A
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie
Griffiths, Jane (Reading E)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grogan, John
Gunnell, John
Hain, Peter
Hall, Mike (Weaver Vale)
Hanson, David
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, John
Henderson, Ivan (Harwich)
Hepburn, Stephen
Heppell, John
Hewitt, Ms Patricia
Hill, Keith
Hinchliffe, David
Hodge, Ms Margaret
Hoey, Kate
Home Robertson, John
Hoon, Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howells, Dr Kim
Hoyle, Lindsay
Hughes, Ms Beverley (Stretford)
Hughes, Kevin (Doncaster N)
Humble, Mrs Joan
Hurst, Alan
Hutton, John
Iddon, Dr Brian
Jackson, Helen (Hillsborough)
Jamieson, David
Johnson, Alan (Hull W & Hessle)
Johnson, Miss Melanie (Welwyn Hatfield)
Jones, Helen (Warrington N)
Jones, Ms Jenny (Wolverh'ton SW)
Jones, Jon Owen (Cardiff C)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Kemp, Fraser
Kennedy, Jane (Wavertree)
Kidney, David
King, Andy (Rugby & Kenilworth)
Kumar, Dr Ashok
Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Laxton, Bob
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Ivan (Bury S)
Lewis, Terry (Worsley)
Lock, David
McAvoy, Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCartney, Ian (Makerfield)
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFall, John
McGuire, Mrs Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
McNamara, Kevin
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Marek, Dr John
Marsden, Paul (Shrewsbury)
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Martlew, Eric
Maxton, John
Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Meale, Alan
Michie, Bill (Sheff'd Heeley)
Milburn, Alan
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Austin
Moffatt, Laura
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morgan, Ms Julie (Cardiff N)
Morgan, Rhodri (Cardiff W)
Morley, Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, George
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Denis (Wansbeck)
Murphy, Jim (Eastwood)
Naysmith, Dr Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mike (N Warks)
Olner, Bill
O'Neill, Martin
Organ, Mrs Diana
Palmer, Dr Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pike, Peter L
Plaskitt, James
Pollard, Kerry
Pope, Greg
Prentice, Ms Bridget (Lewisham E)
Primarolo, Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Ken
Quinn, Lawrie
Radice, Giles
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, Nick
Reed, Andrew (Loughborough)
Rooney, Terry
Ross, Ernie (Dundee W)
Rowlands, Ted
Roy, Frank
Russell, Ms Christine (Chester)
Ryan, Ms Joan
Sedgemore, Brian
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Simpson, Alan (Nottingham S)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Angela (Basildon)
Smith, Rt Hon Chris (Islington S)
Smith, Miss Geraldine (Morecambe & Lunesdale)
Smith, John (Glamorgan)
Smith, Llew (Blaenau Gwent)
Soley, Clive
Southworth, Ms Helen

Squire, Ms Rachel	Walley, Ms Joan
Starkey, Dr Phyllis	Wareing, Robert N
Steinberg, Gerry	Watts, David
Stevenson, George	Wicks, Malcolm
Stoate, Dr Howard	Williams, Rt Hon Alan (Swansea W)
Stott, Roger	Williams, Mrs Betty (Conwy)
Stringer, Graham	Wills, Michael
Sutcliffe, Gerry	Wilson, Brian
Taylor, Ms Dari (Stockton S)	Winnick, David
Taylor, David (NW Leics)	Winterton, Ms Rosie (Doncaster C)
Thomas, Gareth (Clwyd W)	Wise, Audrey
Thomas, Gareth R (Harrow W)	Worthington, Tony
Timms, Stephen	Wray, James
Tipping, Paddy	Wright, Anthony D (Gt Yarmouth)
Todd, Mark	Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)
Touhig, Don	Wyatt, Derek
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Paul
Turner, Dennis (Wolverh'ton SE)	Tellers for the Noes:
Turner, Dr Desmond (Kemptown)	Mr. Robert Ainsworth and
Twigg, Derek (Halton)	Mr. Clive Betts.

Question accordingly negatived.

It being after Eleven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Clause 11

POWER TO MAKE PROVISION ABOUT ELECTIONS ETC.

Amendment made: No. 153, in page 7, line 26, after 'except' insert 'by an election petition'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 12

DISQUALIFICATION FROM BEING ASSEMBLY MEMBER

Amendment made: No. 76, in page 7, line 44, leave out '19(2)(b) or 20(4) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982' and insert

'17(2)(b) or 18(7) of the Audit Commission Act 1998'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 16

SALARIES AND ALLOWANCES

Amendments made: No. 77, in page 10, line 11, leave out 'or allowances'.

No. 78, in page 10, line 14, leave out 'or allowances'.

No. 79, in page 10, line 15, at end insert—

'( ) A determination or direction under this section may provide for different allowances for different cases.'.

No. 122, in page 10, line 20, leave out from 'section' to end of line 22.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 18

PENSIONS ETC.

Amendment made: No. 123, in page 11, line 33, leave out from 'section' to end of line 35.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 20

OATH OF AFFIRMATION OF ALLEGIANCE

Amendments made: No. 80, in page 12, line 22, leave out 'cease to be an Assembly member'.

No. 81, in page 12, line 23, at end insert

'cease to be an Assembly member (so that his seat is vacant)'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 23

TRANSFERS: SUPPLEMENTARY

Amendment made: No. 235, in page 13, leave out lines 36 to 39 and insert—

'(a) section 3(4) and (Polls for ascertaining views of the public)(5),

(b) sections 121 to 138, and

(c) Part VII so far as relating to the provisions specified in paragraphs (a) and (b).'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Mr. Evans: I beg to move amendment No. 218, in page 14, leave out lines 10 to 18.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 219, in page 14, line 11, after 'culture,', insert 'or'.

No. 220, in page 14, leave out lines 14 to 16.

No. 221, in page 14, leave out lines 19 to 29.

No. 222, in page 14, line 37, at end insert—

'(11) Nothing in this Act shall permit the Assembly to exercise any function or enjoy any power in any part of England.'.

Mr. Evans: It has just been demonstrated that another day to consider the Bill on Report would have been extremely useful, as it would have allowed us to examine in detail other elements arising from Government amendments and new clauses. At least in the 54 minutes remaining to us today, we shall be able to debate some important matters, including those that arise from this group of amendments. They relate to clause 23 and are consequential on clauses 21 and 22 and the assembly's functions, especially in relation to cross-border areas.

Dispute would arise when the assembly used its powers to exercise functions on a cross-border area, which is defined in subsection (7) as "an area that includes a part (but not the whole) of England as well as the whole or a part of Wales."

The Secretary of State did not feel it worth including a clause that would make it necessary for the Assembly to consult Ministers before using its power in England. In reality, that means that people in England could be directly affected by the actions of the Assembly. Yet, because they do not have a vote for that body, they would have no way of influencing its decisions.

I have been asked before whether I was thinking of standing for the Welsh assembly. I know that I have disappointed some right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House by saying that I have no intention of standing for the assembly, along with virtually everyone else in this place, especially those representing constituencies in Wales. I have always felt that the people of Ribble Valley have no interest in the deliberations of the Welsh Assembly as it pertained to them. However, it appears that there will be people in England who will be directly affected by, and interested in, what is going on in the assembly, yet they will have no vote, and no representation within it. If they write to Members of the Assembly, to whom will they write? Will there be an onus on those Members to respond or even to take any notice at all?

A number of cross-border issues could arise, including those that involve water authorities such as Dwr Cymru, Dee Valley in Chester, and Severn Trent. There are sites of special scientific interest such as those covering the Severn estuary, some drainage fisheries and the Severn bore. There are no proper maritime borders for Wales. Highways may be involved, and so may parish councils.

We have tried to redress the imbalance through the amendments. The Secretary of State apparently does not believe that we should examine the problems that will exist and try to do something about them. Amendment No. 222 reads:

"Nothing in this Act shall permit the Assembly to exercise any function or enjoy any power in any part of England."

That amendment is the crux of the matter. We do not believe that the assembly should have any say over anything that happens in England because the Bill does not address properly the concerns of people living in cross-border areas.

For instance, as far as I can tell, there is no proper device or procedure whereby the assembly would consult people living in England before it assumed power over cross-border areas. The Minister shakes his head; it will be interesting to see what consultation will occur with people who live in England and who will be affected by any decisions taken by the Welsh assembly. Those people will have no representation on the assembly.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said earlier—in a most telling contribution to this evening's proceedings—that we should be naive to assume that there will be no repercussions following the decisions that we are taking in granting a form of devolution to Wales. It is not just a question of the Barnett formula and, as the hon. Gentleman suggested, of people in England thinking, "We are strapped for cash, so we'll look at paring back money to Scotland and Wales."

I believe that people living in England will feel resentment when they see that the Welsh assembly has power over parts of cross-border areas.

In the past, there was talk of no taxation without representation. This is a plain case of no representation. I wonder whether the Minister understands the concerns of people who live on the English side of the border. We are not talking about the control of cemeteries in Fulham and transference of power—matters that we considered in an early debate on the legislation—with the Welsh assembly having power over Welsh people who are living and English people who were dead. I understand that that matter has now been resolved.

We are considering an issue that will have a real impact upon those who live in cross-border areas. That is why we have moved the amendments. We want to address any problems that may arise in the future. We do not wish to fuel resentment among people who live in England regarding the Welsh assembly. We appreciate that the assembly will be a reality, and we wish it godspeed. We want to ensure that it works in the best interests of the people of Wales. If the Bill remains unamended or the concerns of those who live in England are not addressed, it will have a detrimental effect on good relations between people living in England and in Wales, and particularly among people in cross-border areas.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): It may assist the House if I put the amendments into context and explain the situation. I thank the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) for the way in which he has moved them. In so doing, he made some constructive and important points that must be answered. I shall explain briefly the background to clause 23(6), which introduces the concept of a cross-border area. It is important that we have an opportunity to debate this matter as it allows me to expunge a series of phantoms and misunderstandings surrounding this question.

It is clear that the hon. Gentleman has moved the amendments not in order to be mischievous but in an attempt to secure an explanation. When I have provided one, I hope that he will accept that the situation is quite reasonable. The position now is that the Government have flexible arrangements for dealing with issues that straddle the border between Wales and England. Water, notably, does not flow neatly down a particular side of the border. The Severn, Wye and Dee rivers all rise in Wales and flow through parts of England. There are watersheds that cross boundaries.

We have had practical and sensible arrangements to deal with that for many years. The Welsh Office looks after the administration of some issues to do with water and rivers that extend beyond Wales's boundaries. Correspondingly, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions administers some matters for Montgomeryshire. I do not know what the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) feels about that, but it is a practical, common-sense approach to the problem of cross-border areas.

11.15 pm

There is no compelling reason why we should now draw a doctrinaire line down the border between Wales and England, and command the waters to part along it. I wondered whether the hon. Gentleman was trying to play Moses parting the Red sea. I suspect that he was not, given what he said when he moved the amendment, but I shall have my say anyway. He has got his history wrong. The Secretary of State is the real Moses figure, leading the people of Wales to safety from the centralised, corrupt Tory quango state as the waters part before him to reveal a gleaming new Welsh assembly, and close after him to drown the Tories as power is decentralised to the people. The hon. Gentleman may prefer another historical figure, King Canute, holding back the tide of devolution. He says that he is not trying to do that, but if he is, he should check what happened to King Canute.

There is no reason why we should have more costly and complex administrative arrangements on the ground post devolution. Clause 23(6) allows the assembly to be given functions with respect to cross-border areas: that is, areas including a part but not the whole of England, and the whole or part of Wales.

The Government have no plans to transfer cross-border functions to the assembly unless that is the basis on which they are already operated. Subsection (6) permits the transfer order to include such functions in the order under clause 22. The transfer process must be initiated by the Government, but it cannot be completed unless Parliament, which obviously includes elected representatives from England, approves the transfer order.

The Government are considering giving the assembly cross-border functions for some bodies and functions relating to the water industry, flood defence and internal drainage that are currently exercised by the Welsh Office.

[Mr. Peter Hain]

There is nothing novel in those proposals. Section 63 of the Wales Act 1978 provided that any function exercisable in respect of the Welsh water authority was deemed to be a power exercisable as regards Wales, whereas any function in respect of the Severn Trent water authority was deemed not to be a power exercisable with respect to Wales. Both those water authorities, and their successor water companies, operate across the border.

Mr. Letwin: The Minister did not mention education. What is the position of schools in Herefordshire that come within a Welsh local education authority, and power over which the Secretary of State transfers to the Welsh assembly under the transfer of powers order?

Mr. Hain: I am not aware of any schools in that position. If the hon. Gentleman is referring to pupils whose parents choose to send to schools across the border, that is a different matter, and it is not covered by those arrangements.

As we signalled in the draft transfer order, the Government are considering transferring to the assembly various functions under the Water Industries Act 1991 with respect to the Dwr Cymru, Wrexham and the Chester-Dee valley water companies. Amendments Nos. 219 to 222 would prevent the transfer of such functions to the assembly. I am sure that that is not the intention of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley.

Mr. Grieve: The Secretary of State has said that, once the assembly comes into being, he will not be answerable to the House for what goes on in the assembly. A person living on the English side of the border may be subject to maladministration as a result of an act of the assembly, and may wish to have that matter dealt with. How can it be dealt with by the House if it is in the assembly's remit because the powers have been handed to the assembly for administrative purposes?

Mr. Hain: To the extent that those would be cross-border powers, they would be handed to the assembly to be exercisable by the authority of Parliament. Ultimately, Parliament could be held to account if the situation that the hon. Gentleman suggests were to arise.

Mr. Jenkin: Does the Minister seriously contemplate that the House will legislate to interfere in the affairs of the assembly in respect of the grievances of English constituents in cross-border areas? That is the logic of what he has just said.

Mr. Hain: With respect, that is not the logic of what I have just said. I was asked how a grievance could be redressed, and the answer is that that could be done through the constituent's representative and, ultimately, by representations to Parliament. That is exactly what happens at present. If the Welsh Office operated in such a fashion over agreements on cross-border areas with Welsh Water or some other body, representations could be made in the House. That is the current procedure.

Mr. Evans: Under current arrangements, problems can be raised in Parliament with the Secretary of State. After devolution, that responsibility will move to the assembly, and it will be a waste of time for people in England to put questions to the Secretary of State for Wales, because he will not have the power to deal with them.

Mr. Hain: I accept that the hon. Gentleman is not raising this matter mischievously. Let us assume that a constituent in Herefordshire or Shropshire found that a river was encroaching on his land and that it contained effluent that was the responsibility of Welsh Water or some other authority. He could raise the issue with his elected Member, who could take it to the appropriate Minister. That Minister could make representations to the assembly in the same way as happens with the Welsh Office at present.

Mr. Öpik: Surely the situation is hardly new, and does not require a great deal of thought to resolve. If there is an issue over the service that is provided by, say, Shrewsbury hospital to one of my constituents who lives in a different health authority area, it would be resolved by discussion. The Minister will agree that Conservative Members are putting up a paper tiger. We shall not be debating in the House the problems of a constituent who is not getting health provision from that hospital. Conservative Members are making something out of nothing.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman puts the matter extremely well, and with his usual eloquence. It is a phantom issue.

Mr. Paterson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hain: I shall do so shortly. I do not mind spending time crawling all over this issue. It uses up Opposition time, and that is a matter for them.

I should draw to the attention of the House another mechanism for redress. The Government will table an amendment to provide a Welsh ombudsman who will deal with complaints, if that is the route that a citizen wishes to take, about any of the assembly's functions. I was asked how issues could be raised in Parliament and I have answered that.

Mr. Paterson: The Minister is being grossly complacent about the matter. I have a case at present over a school in my constituency that may be damaged by the change in policy of a Welsh education authority. I can raise that matter in the House, but when the Bill becomes law I shall not be able to do that.

Mr. Hain: Again, that is based on ignorance about the consequences of devolution. The hon. Gentleman will be able to raise in questions to the English Minister with responsibility for education any matters that affect the hon. Gentleman's education authority; indeed, he will be able to raise with any other Minister any matters that affect his local constituency. If he asks the Minister to make representations directly to the Welsh assembly on a practical matter, that would be as easily resolvable as it is at present. This is a complete non-issue.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): As I represent the English constituency with the longest border with Wales, I have had to deal with several cross-border issues, particularly in relation to Welsh Water and other attitudes across the Brecon Beacons. I and, I believe, the people of Herefordshire have no problem at all with the concept of a devolved assembly in Wales. The suggestion of Her Majesty's official Opposition that that might cause a problem is ridiculous. If there were a problem with the water authority, I should take it up with Welsh Water. In the same way, if there were a problem with a cross-border issue based in England, I should expect a Welsh Member to take it up with the authority in England. We are hearing claptrap from the official Opposition.

Mr. Hain: That was an extremely helpful intervention. The hon. Gentleman explained the position exactly. Whereas Conservative Members have suddenly become completely neutered and impotent politically as a result of devolution, the hon. Gentleman—perhaps it explains why he beat the Conservatives in Herefordshire—is able adequately to represent his constituents on those practical matters. Perhaps Conservative Members could take some lessons from him.

Mr. Ancram: May I ask the Minister another simple question? He has said that my hon. Friends could raise a matter of the type that has been described with the English Minister with responsibility for education, although it was within the competence of the Welsh assembly, and that that Minister could raise it with the Welsh assembly Secretary. Is the Minister aware that, in the case of Northern Ireland, the Speaker ruled, I think in the 1930s, that such questioning was incompetent? Is he giving us an assurance that that ruling will not apply in this case?

Mr. Hain: I am giving the right hon. Gentleman an assurance that, in the case of a practical issue of representation that was raised in the House, of course any Minister will be able to make representations to the Welsh assembly or even perhaps through the Secretary of State for Wales. I do not see any problem with that. I do not accept what the right hon. Gentleman says at all. As I say, if there were a grievance that needed to be pursued, the Welsh ombudsman could do so.

"Wales" is defined in legislation as the areas of the counties created by the Local Government Act 1972. That includes any part of the sea shore to the low water mark. In Acts of Parliament, Wales does not include any part of the sea, yet my the Secretary of State for Wales exercises various environmental and fishery functions around the coast of Wales in what are UK territorial waters.

As my hon. Friend the Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger) will confirm, a recent example was the restrictions on fishing that were put in place following the Sea Empress disaster. Those restrictions were imposed by the Secretary of State even though Wales does not include the sea in which that pollution took place—precisely because of those provisions. We are talking about practical matters here, not those great constitutional phantoms that have been raised by Conservative Members.

Amendment No. 218 would deny the assembly functions that have long been administered by the Welsh Office.

Mr. Ancram: indicated dissent.

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) shakes his head, but that is a fact. It has caused no problems and devolution will not cause any problems in future. The Bill rightly allows for the possibility that functions such as those could be transferred to the assembly.

Moreover, why the official Opposition should want to prevent the assembly from being responsible for the Welsh language and culture is beyond me. I point out that one effect of amendments Nos. 218 and 222—perhaps right hon. and hon. Members will seek to justify this, if they are aware of it—is to rule out the possibility that the assembly might give support to Welsh language bodies that operate outside Wales. An example is Ysgol Gymraeg Llundain—the Welsh school in London. Of course I am not promising that the assembly will support such bodies—that would be a matter for the assembly—but the amendments would not even allow it the choice, and that is not a serious option.

The Bill contains appropriate mechanisms to reflect the fact that, while the assembly may be given functions in parts of England, it will not be elected by the people who live there. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley raised that point.

I emphasise that Parliament has to approve the transfer order before it can take effect. Elected representatives from all parts of the United Kingdom—including the hon. Member for Ribble Valley and others who have intervened in my speech—will be able to have their say on the transfer order in respect of cross-border functions.

The Government also accept that it is important for the necessary accountability arrangements to exist in the House in the limited cases where the assembly is exercising functions in parts of England. That is why clause 43(5) ensures that, where the assembly makes secondary legislation that applies to parts of England—various regulations such as those that I have described—it will continue to be subject to parliamentary procedures. I have answered that point adequately, although those on the Opposition Front Bench do not appear to recognise that.

11.30 pm

Clause 23(8) further provides that, in relation to any assembly functions in the cross-border area, which may include secondary legislation and matters such as determinations or directions, the transfer order can require that the assembly should consult or obtain the agreement of a United Kingdom Minister before it exercises the function. The transfer order will in due course set out our proposals for the use of the power.

I should like to take the opportunity to tell the House that we are looking further at the wording of clause 23, partly in the light of some of the amendments that were also tabled in Committee. It may be that some technical adjustments to clause 23 will need to be made in another place. If so, we shall table them in Committee in another place. Any such amendments will not enable the transfer order to give the assembly more functions in England than would have been possible under clause 23 as drafted, and we shall maintain the mechanisms that are already in the Bill with respect to the assembly's exercise of functions in England.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who dismissed my earlier point with some disdain. I do not have the precise quotations from Hansard, as I have not had a chance to get them, but I can refer to the Library research paper, which is normally very accurate. It states:

"The question of non-discussion of Northern Ireland affairs at Westminster finally changed with a Speaker's ruling in 1923 that questions on matters delegated to Stormont must be addressed to Northern Ireland ministers, not United Kingdom Ministers in the House of Commons at Westminster. The Speaker rejected any link between the fact that Northern Ireland continued to send members to Westminster, and the ability of the Commons to discuss devolved matters. Even before then, the Speaker had said that, as Parliament has legislated for Northern Ireland devolution, 'it is quite impossible for us to have questions and answers on a subject for which Ministers on this Bench do not hold responsibility. I cannot say more than that.'"

[Mr. Ancram]

That ruling remains valid. It would preclude what the Minister has told us would be available to my hon. Friends, and, unless he can say that the ruling has changed, he should withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Hain: I am not disputing what the right hon. Gentleman has read out quite properly in relation to Northern Ireland. However, I am not aware of any cross-border areas that England has with Northern Ireland. It is entirely different, and the right hon. Gentleman, as a former Northern Ireland Minister, must surely know that.

The points that have been raised by hon. Members, quite legitimately, relate to issues that might affect their constituencies in England. For example, they are entitled to raise issues in relation to the local education authority with an education Minister in England. If the Education Minister in England felt that some transfer order—although I cannot conceive of one in relation to education—was not operating properly, clearly the body that passed that transfer order should clarify it.

Mr. Letwin: Has the Minister consulted the Chair about whether that ruling would apply in this case? Secondly, when he returns to the Department, he will find that there are primary schools in Herefordshire which are covered by Welsh education authorities. I would be interested to know—

Mr. Keetch: Name one.

Mr. Letwin: I have the details, and I shall provide them in a letter to the hon. Gentleman.

If the Minister finds that that is true, will he assure the House that an English Member of Parliament will nevertheless be able to take the case of such a school, in Parliament, before an English Education Minister and have that Minister answer a question about the school?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before we get into deep waters and start discussing the Speaker's ruling, it should be remembered that the Chair will make no ruling on those matters until the final legislation is decided on. The House should therefore not discuss whether the Speaker has been consulted.

Mr. Hain: As I have said before, I am aware of cross-border pupils—in both directions—but I am not aware of any cross-border schools. I have had advice to confirm that. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) is scampering off to find evidence to back what he has said, I shall look at it with great interest. I am the Education Minister for Wales, among other functions, and I am not aware of having any responsibility for schools in Herefordshire.

Mr. Leigh: Is it a fair summation to say that an English Member aggrieved in this way will be able to make informal representations to a Minister of the Crown, who in turn will be able to make informal representations to the assembly; but that my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) will not be able to ask formal questions on the Floor of the House? That is our point; the Minister has not answered it.

Mr. Hain: We really are making a mountain out of a molehill. I am quite happy to keep demolishing those mountains, although it is a waste of time. If the hon. Gentleman is a Member for a constituency along the Welsh border, and an issue arises that affects his English constituency, he is entitled to raise it with the relevant English Minister. The Minister then decides what is within his power, and what representations he can make.

Mr. Keetch: I look forward to the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) finding a Herefordshire school that is administered by Wales. I hope that he is not falling into that trap simply because some parts of Wales have Herefordshire postal addresses. For instance, Hay-on-Wye, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey), is in Wales but has a Herefordshire postal address.

Many people in Herefordshire, before the election, faced the problem that my predecessor, a Conservative, was continually told by the previous Government that the problems he raised were for quangos to answer. Ministers hid behind that answer. Are Opposition Front Benchers now suggesting that the same will happen with the Welsh assembly, which will be an elected assembly, not an appointed quango?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman makes his point very well. We are getting rid of a lot of quangos and subjecting the remaining ones to democratic accountability through the National Assembly for Wales.

The Welsh Office has responsibility for Welsh coastal waters, and for certain matters in parts of England, because natural watersheds do not follow the national boundary.

Mr. Paterson rose—

Mr. Hain: I shall not give way again.

The Opposition amendments would prevent the assembly from inheriting those functions, and they disregard the sensible protection of interests in England, as well as in Wales, that the Government have included in the Bill. That is why I cannot accept the amendment, and would urge its withdrawal.

Mr. Hayes: These amendments touch again on democratic legitimacy based on proper consent. The Minister has signally failed to deal with that issue this evening. Consent must be sought before it is given, and if it is not sought from the English people who are affected—which, clearly, it cannot be in the case of the Welsh assembly—it cannot be given. The Welsh assembly will therefore act with political authority where it has no legitimacy because it has neither sought nor been given consent.

Mr. Öpik: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: I shall give way, because I am interested to hear a little more from "The Observer Book of Political Theory".

Mr. Öpik: I have not yet published such a book, but the hon. Gentleman will get a signed copy as soon as I do.

In his constituency work, has the hon. Gentleman ever sought to acquire a health service on behalf of one of his constituents in a health authority area that does not cover his constituency? If so, how does he justify his action, given that it had no democratic legitimacy whatever?

Mr. Hayes: I am torn between pity and contempt for the hon. Gentleman. The democratic legitimacy of this House is shared by all its Members in respect of areas over which the House has jurisdiction.

The Minister dealt with the Executive functions of the Welsh Office and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. However, we are discussing the transfer of legislative power and political competence, which is not equivalent to Executive power as exercised by that Department.

Mr. Hain: I am sorry that I have to waste the House's time by repeating what I have been saying over the past half an hour. Those functions are exercisable on behalf of the hon. Gentleman's constituents, for example, only because of the authority of this House in the first place. This House would not have given that authority if it felt that its Members' interests, or their constituents' interests, were being jeopardised.

Mr. Hayes: The House's authority, transferred to the Welsh Office and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, does not prevent representatives of constituencies that might be affected from taking up those issues in this House. The difficulty that arises from the Bill is not insignificant—indeed, constitutionally it is fundamental. I accept that it is a point of detail and that the number of occasions on which it occurred would be relatively small, but it covers a variety of matters such as highways, education and water, with which the Minister dealt at length. Education is probably the most worrying of those, for reasons that were given earlier in the debate.

The nub of this issue is this: what would happen if one of those issues arose and hon. Members could not make proper representations to the authority with political competence? The sort of informal representations that they could make to the Welsh assembly would be of no more import than those that might be made by an outside body of laymen. They could make no proper political representations in the sense in which the House understands them.

Mr. Grieve: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a question not just of representation but of accountability? The Minister does not appear to have heard of matters like the Crichel Down affair, where ultimately Ministers were held to account for the activities of their Department. In the case of the assembly, does my hon. Friend agree that the point about the cross-border authorities is that there will be no means of holding the assembly to account in this House?

Mr. Hayes: Formal representations such as the type to which I am referring can properly be made only to the authority that has the power to deal with them. If responsibility for those affairs were with the House of Commons, formal representations could be made to the House to deal with specific problems. However, that is not the case. Political competence is being transferred. The failure to acknowledge the transfer of political competence and its repercussions for cases in English constituencies that border Wales lies at the heart of the Minister's misunderstanding of the amendments' significance.

Mr. Keetch: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman as he is one of the more intelligent Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Keetch: I am enormously grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Would he care to give way to his hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), who referred to a Herefordshire school that is allegedly administered by a Welsh local education authority?

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman is generous not only to my hon. Friend but to the House in giving my hon. Friend that opportunity. When he has his notes in order, I shall consider giving way to him, but I gather that my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) wants to intervene.

Mr. Paterson: I thank my hon. Friend.

The Minister seems to be being wilfully obtuse. I am currently dealing with a case in which a Welsh education authority may be changing its policy in a way that will prevent 120 children from going to a Shropshire school. Today, I can bring that up in the House; in future— [Interruption.] The children live in Wales. It is a Welsh policy, which I cannot bring up with an English Education Minister. In future—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions must be brief.

11.45 pm

Mr. Hayes: I bow to my hon. Friend's intervention, in the sense that he has practical experience of the issues of which we speak. I was speaking from the perspective of someone concerned about the constitutional implications. Because my constituency does not border Wales, I have no particular casework experiences, but various hon. Members clearly have experiences of real, live issues that will be difficult to resolve because of the problems with which the amendments seek to deal.

Mr. Hain: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw your attention to the fact that it is Conservative Members who are dragging the debate out and repeating themselves so that they can subsequently claim that there has not been enough time to discuss other issues?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No hon. Member is dragging anything out. If any hon. Member did so, I would call him to order. [Interruption.]

Mr. Hayes: I must say to the Minister—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to sit down while I am on my feet.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

I must tell the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) that there should be no conversation in the Chamber when an hon. Member is addressing it.

Mr. Hayes: Again, I am extremely grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Along with you, I admonish my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) following the discourtesy that he has shown not only to the House, but to me personally. I shall expect proper recompense in due course.

Because I do not want to lend any credence to the Minister's bogus claim about drawing the debate out, let me make myself clear in one paragraph. The simple fact is that this is not just a question of the exercise of executive authority; it is a question of legislative power and responsibility. Inevitably, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) has said, responsibility and accountability should accompany the power to make decisions. Because political competence is being transferred—political competence that affects areas of England, not just areas of Wales—the amendments are essential if we are to avoid a considerable constitutional imbalance. I think that is a moderate way of describing it.

Amendment No 222 would legitimise matters by providing that the assembly should not

"exercise any function or enjoy any power in any part of England."

That amendment is appropriate and necessary in bringing back to constitutional equilibrium what I think is a considerable mess that the Minister has done little to clear up tonight.

Mr. Jenkin: I hope that I can briefly introduce some clarity to the debate, which I am afraid neither the Minister nor his Liberal Democrat associate succeeded in doing. Let me deal initially with the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). As my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) said, this is a matter of accountability. The hon. Gentleman gets satisfaction when dealing with local authorities or health authorities outside his constituency, because they are answerable for policies set down by United Kingdom Ministers who are answerable to the House. So when he tables a question in the House, whichever Minister he addresses it to, it will eventually be transferred to the Minister with executive responsibility for the health or education policy concerned. That is why the system of accountability works.

Mr. Öpik: Even so, it would still be possible for reasonable people to carry on operating in exactly the same way. Is the balance not between a pedantic terror and the common-sense world in which the rest of us live?

Mr. Jenkin: When the hon. Gentleman has been a little longer in the House, he will realise that the problems of accountability arise most acutely when people are being obstructive and denying responsibility for events. Ministers do that, and so do local authorities and health authorities—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As the hon. Gentleman has been a Member of the House quite a long time, I should like him to face the Chair, and address the Chair.

Mr. Jenkin: I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I want the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire to consider what happens when the system of accountability goes wrong. It is when people are denying responsibility and trying to obstruct accountability that difficulties arise.

It is not disputed that there will be occasions when people living in English constituencies will have grievances against the policies being pursued by the Welsh assembly. That is what the problem of cross-border areas is all about. The Minister said that an English Member of Parliament could represent an English constituent with a grievance against the Welsh assembly by tabling a question to an English Minister in the United Kingdom Parliament. The problem is that United Kingdom Ministers will no longer have executive responsibility for the activities of the Welsh assembly, so the question would be out of order.

However, the section on "Order of Business" in "Erskine May" contains, under the heading "Rules of order regarding form and contents of questions", a paragraph on "Ministerial Responsibility", on page 298, which runs as follows:

"Questions to Ministers must relate to matters for which those Ministers are officially responsible. They may be asked for statements of their policy or intentions on such matters, or for administrative or legislative action."

Sub-paragraph (3), on the next page, adds:

"It is not in order in a question to ask for action to deal with matters under the control of local or other statutory authorities".

So the exact scenario that the Minister offered us—the idea that my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) could table a question to an English Education Minister about a Welsh education policy—is false. He could not, because such a question would be out of order.

I raised the issue with Madam Speaker on 21 January, on a point of order relating to the Scotland Bill, and I referred to the ruling cited by my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) in reading out the extract from the Library briefing. I asked Madam Speaker whether she agreed that the ruling made in 1923 was unreasonable. However, she said that she was not in a position to change that ruling.

The position is therefore precisely the opposite of that which the Minister described to the House a few moments ago. There is no system for making the Welsh assembly accountable in response to questions tabled in this Parliament by English Members. That is the problem with cross-border areas. It is a matter of accountability, and what the Minister says simply will not wash.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 24

GENERAL TRANSFER OF PROPERTY, RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES ETC.

Amendment made: No. 82, in page 15, line 14, leave out

', so far as is required for continuing its effect,'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Schedule 3

PUBLIC BODIES SUBJECT TO REFORM BY ASSEMBLY

Mr. Wigley: I beg to move amendment No. 38, in page 76, line 12, at end insert—

'5C. The Higher Education Funding Council for Wales.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 51, in page 76, leave out line 32.

Mr. Wigley: The amendments deal with the vital issue of higher education. Higher education is of central importance in developing our economic well-being in Wales. Education has played a considerable part in Ireland's economic miracle. Higher education is also critical in advancing the cultural identity of Wales and in maximising the cultural fulfilment of individuals and communities. Higher education is the key to creating a new quality in all walks of life in Wales.

The national assembly will help to mould and assist the healthy development of higher education in Wales, both for what it is in its own right and for what it can do to advance Wales as a nation. It is against that background that we have to ask why the Higher Education Funding Council for Wales is listed under part III of schedule 3 among the bodies which may only gain functions. It should be listed under part I, among the bodies which may gain or lose functions. That is what the amendments would achieve.

The House is well aware that the Further Education Funding Council for Wales already appears in part I, so why should higher education be treated differently? They should both be co-ordinated, because there is a considerable overlap. They should be treated together for these purposes, particularly in the context of lifelong learning.

We need greater co-operation between the higher education institutions in Wales rather than that they should guard their own vested interests. The national assembly has a role in creating the conditions for that co-operation. Many higher education institutions in Wales are small and suffer diseconomies of scale. In a world where competition for finance is so acute, co-operation is needed. The University of Wales has adequate critical mass. If there were collaboration between the two levels, they would be much more effective.

On research funding, Wales's track record, except, possibly, for that in Cardiff, has been fairly limited. We have nothing like the 5 per cent. proportion of UK funding of research councils that we might expect. Therefore, we hope that the assembly will be able to co-ordinate the work of higher and further education, for which purpose the two bodies should be put on an equal footing. That is what the amendments provide.

Mr. Livsey: I support the amendments. I was a member of the Welsh agricultural college, a higher education body, before I came into the House. It is now part of the Welsh Rural Institute and of the university of Wales. The Welsh agricultural college was founded with the help of the Welsh local authorities. The matter of higher education should be considered by the assembly.

Mr. Hain: I accept the sincerity with which both the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) have spoken to the amendment, and I agree with many of the points that they make. Higher education makes a vital multi-billion pound contribution to the Welsh economy. It is also a part of our lifelong learning strategy. I want to see the barriers between HE and FE broken down as much as possible. That is crucial to delivering our strategy.

We want to co-ordinate the provision of higher and further education more effectively, and the Welsh assembly will enable us to do that. The higher education sector is ultimately accountable to the Welsh assembly even though we have given it the independence that is provided for in the Bill, in reflection of the traditional independence of the universities. Successive Governments have for decades left decisions on universities' funding to specialised arm's-length bodies—the University Grants Committee and now the Higher Education Funding Council for Wales.

It being Twelve midnight, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [15 January] and the Resolution [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Amendment negatived.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Clause 35

STAFF

Amendment made: No. 83, in page 21, line 24, leave out subsection (4) and insert—

'( ) Section 1(2) of the Civil Service (Management Functions) Act 1992 (delegation of civil service management functions vested in a Minister of the Crown to any other servant of the Crown) shall have effect as if the reference to any other servant of the Crown included the Assembly.

( ) Section 1(2) and (3) of the Superannuation Act 1972 (delegation of functions relating to civil service superannuation schemes by Minister for the Civil Service to another Minister etc. and consultation by that Minister or another Minister) shall have effect as if the references to a Minister of the Crown other than the Minister for the Civil Service included the Assembly.'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 41

POWER TO MAKE DIFFERENT PROVISION FOR WALES

Amendments made: No. 154, in page 22, line 31, leave out from 'enactment' to 'in' in line 33 and insert

'confers or imposes a function exercisable'.

No. 155, in page 22, line 34, leave out

'(so far as exercisable in relation to Wales) the function is'

and insert

'the function is to any extent'.

No. 156, in page 22, line 38, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) Subject to subsection (4), the enactment shall be taken to permit—

(a) the exercise of the function by the Assembly whether or not it is exercised otherwise than by the Assembly, and

(b) the exercise of the function differently by the Assembly (on the one hand) and otherwise than by the Assembly (on the other).'.

No. 157, in page 22, line 41, leave out from 'to' to 'in' in line 42 and insert 'a function exercisable'.

No. 158, in page 23, line 1, leave out from 'includes' to 'in' in line 2 and insert 'a function exercisable'.

No. 159, in page 23, line 9, leave out from 'to' to end of line 12 and insert

'exercise a function in relation to Wales whether or not it is exercised in relation to England, or to exercise a function differently in relation to Wales and England, where the function is not (to any extent)—'.

No. 160, in page 23, line 15, at end insert—

'( ) In this section "enactment" includes an enactment—

(a) contained in an Act passed after this Act, or

(b) made after the passing of this Act.'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 43

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURES FOR SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION

Amendment made: No. 236, in page 23, line 27, at end insert 'by, or'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 45

REGULATION OF PROCEDURE

Amendment made: No. 124, in page 25, line 18, leave out from 'orders' to end of line 20.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 52

ASSEMBLY FIRST SECRETARY

Amendment made: No. 125, in page 27, leave out lines 3 and 4.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 55

DELEGATION TO COMMITTEES, SUB-COMMITTEES AND STAFF

Amendment made: No. 126, in page 27, leave out lines 25 to 42.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 56

SUBJECT COMMITTEES

Amendment made: No. 127, in page 28, leave out lines 2 to 8.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 57

MEMBERS OF SUBJECT COMMITTEES ETC.

Amendment made: No. 128, in page 28, leave out lines 9 to 43.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 58

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

Amendment made: No. 129, in page 28, line 44, leave out from beginning to end of line 15 on page 29.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 59

SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION SCRUTINY COMMITTEE

Amendments made: No. 161, in page 29, leave out lines 32 and 33 and insert 'relevant Welsh subordinate legislation.'.

No. 162, in page 29, line 35, leave out

'subordinate legislation made or proposed to be made by the Assembly' and insert 'relevant Welsh subordinate legislation'.

No. 163, in page 29, line 45, at end insert—

'( ) For the purposes of this section "relevant Welsh subordinate legislation" is any subordinate legislation—

(a) which is made or proposed to be made by the Assembly, or

(b) which, or a draft of which, is (or but for paragraph 2(4) of Schedule 6 would be) required to be confirmed or approved by the Assembly.'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 60

MEMBERS OF SCRUTINY COMMITTEE ETC.

Amendments made: No. 130, in page 30, line 13, leave out

'to a sub–committee or a member of the Assembly's staff'.

No. 164, in page 30, line 14, at end insert—

'( ) The standing orders may include provision for securing that, in circumstances specified in the standing orders, any function of the subordinate legislation scrutiny committee which is so specified may be exercised—

(a) by the member who chairs the committee, or

(b) in the absence of that member, by any other member of the committee authorised by that member.'.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Clause 61

AUDIT COMMITTEE

Amendments made: No. 131, in page 30, line 31, leave out '(or further delegate)'.

No. 165, in page 30, line 32, at end insert

'except as provided by section 94(3A).'.

No. 132, in page 30, line 33, leave out subsection (7).—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

Bill, as amended, to be further considered tomorrow.

Mr. Paterson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Could you report to Madam Speaker that because the guillotine has been imposed today, we have had a farrago of parliamentary inspection of the Bill. Perfectly sensible points were made on the question of Cabinet arrangements and the Secretary of State made no answers. He merely read out a crib from his civil servants. On cross-border co-operation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. To be helpful to the hon. Gentleman, I can tell him that what he is doing is further debating the Bill. He will have a chance tomorrow.

BBC (Scratchcards)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jon Owen Jones.]

12.2 am

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this matter this evening. I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport for his personal courtesy in being present to respond to the debate.

The situation to which I wish to draw the attention of the House is simple and deplorable. By screening the programme "National Lottery Big Ticket" next Saturday, the BBC is, in the most specific terms, violating its charter. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I will not allow this to happen in the Chamber. A right hon. Gentleman has an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Kaufman: To be precise, the BBC is violating section 7 of its charter. The charter says:

"It shall be the function of the Governors to exercise the powers and discharge the duties of the Corporation in accordance with this Our Charter and in particular (but without limitation) to:- . . .

(f) . . . ensure that the Corporation and its employees and all programme makers engaged by the Corporation comply with the provisions of any code which the Corporation is required to draw up for the treatment of controversial subjects with due accuracy and impartiality and comply with any other code or guidelines applicable to programme content and standards".

The "Big Ticket" programme violates the BBC producers' guidelines and therefore the charter. In a letter to the Secretary of State, the chairman of the BBC governors, Sir Christopher Bland, denies this. He denies it in a letter 10 pages long, in the course of which he says several times that the BBC has taken counsel's advice. Taking counsel's advice implies that one had doubts about the legality of what one has been doing—it is rather like a woman taking a pregnancy test to prove that she is a virgin—but those are the lines on which the BBC is acting.

In his letter to the Secretary of State, Sir Christopher Bland denies my statements that ITV companies would be prohibited from broadcasting a programme equivalent to the one to which I refer. On page 6 of his letter he says:

"The BBC believes that the format of the BBC programme would be allowed under ITC codes."

However, I have here a letter sent to me this week by Peter B. Rogers, the chief executive of the ITC. He says:

"last summer Camelot approached the ITC and asked about the terms upon which we"—

the ITC—

"would allow the National Lottery to feature in ITC's licensed television services."

The note attached to the letter states:

"A programme could not be based upon a National Lottery game or include such games. It would not be possible for games to be based, for example, upon National Lottery scratchcards ("Instants")."

So the chief executive of the ITC totally contradicts the chairman of the BBC.

Richard Eyre, the chief executive of ITV, wrote to me on 23 March. He said that the programme to which I refer "confers a benefit on Camelot in that the audience for the show will be selected on the basis of a lucky number from a Lottery competition. The ITC would not permit this on ITV because it would compromise the editorial independence of the broadcaster. This is particularly the case with Lottery show programmes where the audience actively participates in the show", as they do in this programme. Mr. Eyre continued:

"In fact, this issue of editorial independence was of concern to ITV and the ITC when, in 1993, ITV and the BBC were bidding for the rights to broadcast the National Lottery. Then, as now, Camelot proposed a method of audience selection based on a Lottery draw. ITV withdrew from the negotiations to broadcast the programme . . . if "TV Dreams" were to be broadcast on ITV, the ITC would require at least half the audience to have gained a ticket in non-Lottery related ways. Such tickets would have to be as accessible to the general public as Lottery tickets or cards."

In other words, ITV says that Sir Christopher Bland is not telling the truth.

Also on 23 March, I received a letter from Ray Gallagher, the director of public affairs for British Sky Broadcasting. He says:

"neither BSkyB nor any other ITC licensee could, unlike the BBC, have set up a programme in cooperation with Camelot based on scratchcards."

Therefore, Sir Christopher Bland makes a statement that is blatantly untrue, and expects the House to accept it.

In his letter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, Sir Christopher says that the producers' guidelines have not been broken. Let me draw the House's attention to those guidelines. With reference to prizes, they say:

"BBC programmes should normally pay for the prizes they offer in game shows and viewer and listener competitions. Programme makers should aim to offer original, rather than expensive prizes."

The prizes in this show are paid for by Camelot, and go up to £100,000. The guidelines continue:

"Cash prizes should usually be avoided in viewer and listener programmes".

Cash prizes are offered, in violation of the guidelines. Anthea Turner, in the press conference launching the programme on Monday, said that the new show's attraction was that viewers would be able to see people winning enormous sums of money. She said:

"This is serious money, this is money that can make and change someone's life."

The guidelines state:

"Donations of more substantial prizes are only permissible in exceptional circumstances which do not bring the BBC's editorial integrity into question. For example it might be possible to accept a more substantial prize if offered by an educational institution or research foundation."

I do not think that Camelot claims to be either.

The guidelines state:

"If programmes accept donated prizes, the changes should be rung to ensure that the BBC does not appear to favour any institution or company."

However, the changes are not rung; Camelot presents all the prizes.

The guidelines state:

"Occasionally, a viewer or listener competition may be run jointly with a suitable outside body such as an academic or artistic institution. Programmes should not mount viewer and listener competitions in conjunction with commercial organisations."

That is exactly what is happening in this case.

[Mr. Kaufman]

The guidelines state:

"The BBC should pay a substantial part of the cost of any prize given. Only modest donated prizes may be accepted from a third party for a jointly organised competition."

That guideline is violated.

The guidelines state:

"A competition must not risk being interpreted as gambling or a lottery."

It is perfectly clear that the use of scratchcards is gambling.

The guidelines state:

"The Act may be contravened if a viewer or listener competition is based on a game of chance and some sort of donation, purchase or contribution is made to enter."

To enter, one has to buy a scratchcard for £2.

Sir Christopher says in his letter that the guidelines do not apply to competitions and programmes organised under the national lottery. There is nothing whatever in the guidelines, which I have examined carefully, that says that the guidelines are somehow invalidated in the case of the national lottery. They run alongside the national lottery guidelines—the national lottery guidelines are additional, but not contradictory.

Let us look at the national lottery guidelines. They state:

"The BBC retains editorial control over all BBC programmes and promotions featuring National Lottery draws or games."

However, it not the BBC which is in control. As was pointed out in The Guardian last week:

"The 40 contestants chosen to appear on the programme, who each immediately win £1,000 . . . have to enter a competition . . . to get a chance to be on the programme."

So it is the scratchcard which decides who is on the programme, not the BBC. As a result, the guidelines are violated again.

The guidelines say:

"BBC programmes should not actively promote the purchase of Lottery tickets or Lottery scratchcards."

Sir Christopher Bland denies that the programme violates that. He says, on pages 4 and 5 of his letter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State:

"The BBC's Controller of Editorial Policy confirms that the programme devised by the BBC does not breach any of the BBC's editorial policy guidelines".

Well, he would, wouldn't he? Later in his letter, he states:

"BBC programmes must not convey the impression that it is promoting any service, product or publication: The proposed BBC programme will not promote sales. Viewers will not need to have purchased a scratchcard to enjoy the programme."

That is all very well, but if we want not just a contradiction, but a total controversion of that statement, let me read the following to the House:

"The show is closely linked with the lottery's new £2 TV Dreams scratchcards, which offer three ways to win: instant cash prizes of up to £1,000; prizes of up to £50,000 for a new TV Home Play game; and a chance to join the studio audience for the new show, including the chance to win a special £100,000 jackpot . . . anyone who matches three TV symbols on their ticket is eligible for the TV Home Play game; they win if the numbers on a second scratch-off area on the ticket match those drawn on the show.

To get yourself on TV you have to match the three-star symbols on your ticket—then you can join the National Lottery Big Ticket, as well as win a guaranteed £1,000.

Once in the studio, 40 winners will form into four teams of ten, each team rooting for the pair of contestants playing on their behalf. At the end of the show, one member of the winning team of supporters will compete for the £100,000 jackpot."

I emphasise this part:

"The BBC's difficulty is that the show will indeed promote scratchcard sales: that's its job. When they were first launched, lottery scratchcards sold at the rate of 44 million a week—far more than even Camelot expected. But last month they were down to 15 million a week. The new show is a crucial part of Camelot's strategy to revive scratchcard sales by as much as 20 per cent, and so far it seems to be working: three million extra cards were sold in the week TV Dreams first went on sale."

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Kaufman: If I have time, I shall certainly give way, but I should like to complete this argument.

That quotation does not come from me, or from some prejudiced journalist; it comes from the newly published issue of Radio Times. It is the BBC's own journal, saying that the show promotes scratchcard sales, and that that is its job.

The author of that article, totally exposing and controverting the chairman's claim that the BBC is not violating the guidelines and, therefore, the charter, is none other than Nick Higham, the BBC's media correspondent. So if anything demonstrates the lack of truth in what Sir Christopher Bland has been saying to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, it is the BBC itself, through its media correspondent and Radio Times.

The Radio Times listing of the programme says:

"the new extended show . . . offers members of the public the chance of a cash prize of up to £100,000 in addition to the regular National Lottery draw."

